Mr. WILLIAMS. But, Senator Wolcott, we worked out the soviet scheme of government the other day. You made a very good criticism of the scheme, but it certainly became apparent to you that through these voting agencies they have a regular system of election, and they are expressing their will: and I have shown you that the natural, spontaneous feeling of the people is toward this new sort of state apparatus. I mean, if the one thing that lingered in the minds of western people with regard to Russia at this time was an election, a grand constituent assembly like we have here, that we believe in, that if the American people, for example, would be convinced that in a great general election the people had a vote, whether they believed in a soviet or not a soviet, I am sure that the soviets of Russia would be willing to stand before the whole world and say, "Let us have an election of that kind, and decide the kind of state apparatus we are going to have, whether we shall have one like England or America, or Germany, or one like we have over here." Now, if that is the thing that rests back in your mind, that there ought to be a great general election all over Russia, I feel sure that such a representation could be made to the soviets through the delegates to Prinkipo—Mr. White and Mr. Herron. They would present to them very positively that the chief objection to the soviet government is the belief here that it represents nothing but a minority, that it has simply superimposed itself upon the people, and if the question were asked, "Are you willing to hold, openly and freely, an election in Russia in which the people will decide which form of government they want?" I am quite sure that the soviets of Russia would be willing to go to the country with such an election.

Senator WOLCOTT. It looks to me very much like a case where a political party has gotten complete control, and they have told the people what kind of government they are going to have, and they have accepted it because there is nothing else to do. That does not appeal to me as a very good situation.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that the reason that the constituent assembly was dissolved was because it represented the whole mass of the Russian people, 85 per cent, or approximately 85 per cent, of whom were peasants, and, as you stated a moment ago, the policy of the Bolsheviks is to give to the city control and domination equal to the control and domination and influence of the peasants themselves?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I think the reason that they dissolved it was as I have stated. We ought to remember how rapidly in revolutionary times come these changes in the minds of the people, as I have illustrated in the case of the peasants. To show how much changes went on in Russia, remember that there were only 100 Bolsheviks in the first All-Russian Congress of Soviets. In the second congress the Bolsheviks had become the majority. In the third congress they were still overwhelming. In the fourth congress they began to drop back a little. Their strength is changing constantly. When the constituent assembly was gathering the peasants were moving over to the left. This radical attitude was not reflected in the constituent assembly. The constituent assembly had only about two-fifths of its members who were for all power to the soviets. It is one of the theories of all statecraft, is it not, that after revolutions the people in power are the ones who make out the rules for the convocation of the constituent assembly? The laws calling for the constituent assembly were made out by the elements in control after the March revolution. If the people in control after the November revolution had been making out the rules, they would, for example, not have made the suffrage for those over 21 years of age—I believe that was the age limit fixed for the constituent assembly—but they would have fixed the suffrage at 18 years of age, because practically every person between 18 and 21 would have voted originally on the left tickets. By this change of rules in voting for the constituent assembly, the soviet parties would have had a large increase in delegates to any constituent assembly.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not important for the Bolshevik control that the workmen, so-called in the cities, should have representation equal to the peasants, in spite of the fact that they only have 15 per cent of the people represented in the organization?

Mr. WILLIAMS. You see, the soviet revolution, the November revolution was made by the soviet workmen and soldiers. The peasant soviet had little or nothing at all to do with it. Then the peasant soviet, the great national soviet, wanted to join the workmen's and soldiers' soviet. The latter said, "You can come in and help to run the government, but you can only have 80 delegates to our 102." The peasants replied, "No, we demand the same voice in the government of Russia as the workmen and soldiers." They finally agreed that the peasants should have just the same standing as the workmen and soldiers. Of course, we know that ultimately the peasants are the ones that are going to decide what the condition of Russia is going to be, and I do not for a moment believe that this present governmental system—

Senator WOLCOTT. How can they ever get to decide that when they are not going to be in the majority, if they are denied a majority?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe that in the end the fair sense of the people will change that so that the peasants will have proportionate representation. The ultimate solution will be that they will have a larger proportion of votes than they now have. In revolutionary times you have got to have a revolutionary organ with flexibility and plasticity like the soviets. The sailors and soldiers, with some of the workmen of the city, were the chief factors in making the revolution, and during the first days they had altogether a disproportionate representation in the soviet. Now it has been extended so that the peasants have entered into it. I am sure that within the next two years they will have one vote for 100 per cent of the people over 18 years of age.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Williams, is it not a fact that even in the so-called constitution of the soviet republic the representation of the cities is based upon 1 to every 25,000, while among the peasants and in the provinces it is 1 to every 125,000?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; that is just the point I was making.

Mr. HUMES. In other words, in the fundamental law itself the cities have five times the representation that the peasants do, in proportion to their population?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Precisely. That is the point I brought out in trying to make the situation very clear.

Mr. HUMES. By incorporating that into the constitution for the future government of the republic, is there anything to indicate that there is a purpose on the part of the present government to equalize representation and to give the peasants equal representation with the cities, with the sailors and workmen?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The true objective of the Russian soviet republic, as I have just stated, is that they want within the next two years to give one vote for every person over 18 years of age, and if Russia gets a stable government during this time and gets a constitution, I am quite sure that the disproportionate representation will be changed, otherwise Russia can not stand before the world as a true republic.

Mr. HUMES. That is a promise of the future, however.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; it is.

Mr. HUMES. Now, proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know how much further to proceed. I was just stating, Senator Wolcott, my contention that I want to bring home as far as possible, without in any way trying to gloss over any cruelties or any disorders, or trying to minimize any evils, the fact that over there in Russia there is a certain government called the soviet government; that it is a government that is functioning and manifesting a certain definite power; that it has a strong hold over the masses of the people, and that it is the only possible government for them—the only one that can function as a government.

I just want to bring out one or two things. First of all, what has this government done? Well, I think that we in America, who are being staggered by the great job of demobilizing something like 4,000,000 soldiers, ought to have a little bit of sympathy with the task that was suddenly thrown upon this soviet state apparatus—the job of demobilizing 12,000,000 soldiers. That demobilization went on without unnecessary disorder beyond the shooting up of perhaps two or three railway stations which occurred here and there, making for the dislocation of the railway industry.

Senator WOLCOTT. That went on, as a matter of fact, rather automatically, did it not? They demobilized themselves?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is exactly the point.

Senator WOLCOTT. There was no burden thrown on the soviet government to demobilize them. They just quit.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is just the point. Suppose we let 4,000,000 soldiers loose over here. What do you suppose would happen, if we just turned them loose, to the Government apparatus that we have, as finely organized as it is?

Senator WOLCOTT. The problem was not to demobilize them, but to take care of them after they were demobilized, and the soviet had no great problem thrown on it to demobilize those soldiers; they demobilized themselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the proposition for a soviet organization, to bring out certain integrating forces, organizing certain natural latent forces which we do not utilize. I would like to present here, as I will to you afterwards, one of the pamphlets that were given to the soldiers who demobilized, as they were going home from the trenches. It was written by a man who understood the soldiers. They resolved they were not going to fight any more, so they were provided with a certain pamphlet called the "Organization of Villages." The soldiers were largely peasants. This pamphlet says, first of all, to the soldiers leaving the trenches, "You will go to Moscow or Petrograd. Do not spend all your time riding around on street cars. Street cars are too crowded already. Go to a certain place and there you will find the peasant headquarters. Ask for some literature. If you can not read it, ask a workingman to read it to you. If this fellow who has been working hard all day gets irritated, do not get mad at him." Then it says, "Go up to the soviet; it is your government, and if you can not shake hands with Lenine or Trotzky remember they are busy and are engaged with other things. Do not get angry at them."

Then the pamphlet says: "Soldier on the train, do not spend all your time playing cards. Try to find two or three men from your local village and talk with them over the situation. If you can not read the pamphlets you have, ask some one who can read."

Then, section 3, "Arriving in the village. Rest a day or two. Remember that the people in the village have been far away from Moscow and Petrograd. You must not try to tell them everything you know at once. Try to find out what they are doing about vodka. Be sure that no vodka is being brought into the village to make the people drunk. See what you can do to organize a local military detachment. See what the people are doing to their grain. Try to make them understand that the workmen in the cities are busy fighting their enemies, and they can not make plows, hoes, and rakes for the peasants, and that the peasants ought, therefore, to give them their bread, even though they can not get plows, hoes, and rakes until next summer," and so on like that.

It was explained in the simplest fashion how they should demobilize and how they should go home, and for that reason that wonderful return of 12,000,000 men was accomplished with the minimum amount of looting and killing. Of course, there was some. I have ridden on trains where they had smashed the windows and where they would ride up on top of the roof of the car, but it was a wonderful tribute to the organization of the soviet that it could absorb back into the land and into industry 12,000,000 people.

I will bring this talk, shortly, to a close. As I say, that is one of the burdens thrown upon the soviet state apparatus.

I saw Prof. Lomomosoff in Chicago on Thursday, and he handed me a lot of stuff that has come over from Russia in reference to the constructive work that is being done by the soviet government.

Senator WOLCOTT. Who is he?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Prof. Lomomosoff was one of the three men who were sent over under the Kerensky administration. He is a man who has written 15 volumes upon railroad administration. He is a Menshevik, which is an anti-Bolshevik party. He has written some articles, showing why all Russians should cooperate with the soviet. He himself has worked out and has presented to me a whole lot of stuff on what the soviet is doing over there. I am just going to leave this with you.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are those things that are projected?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Some are projected, and some are accomplished. You may look them over.

Senator WOLCOTT. You want to leave them, do you, for the committee to examine?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want the committee to examine them, or anyone else who wants to know about what is happening in Russia at the present time to examine them.

To pass on to the next thing, I said very definitely that there were 12,000,000 soldiers demobilized, as one of the tasks of the soviet. The second great task was the development of the cultural life. Here is a statement that was made by Maxim Gorky. I read it to you before, but if you will listen to it again, I can almost quote it. It seems to me a very strong statement. He says in effect this:

I have as much right as any man in Russia to speak for the Russian people. I make the assertion that although I have been an opponent of the soviet government, and I am now in antagonism to many of its methods of work, I still state before all the world that the historians of the future will marvel at the cultural and creative work that the Russian people have done during the course of a year. This is no exaggeration. I know that the scope and the length and the depth of real, educational development that has been manifested under the soviet régime during this year will call forth the admiration of the world.

In the second place, I would like to tell you what I saw of the cultural development in Russia. I would like to have brought before the committee a certain Mrs. Tobinson, who comes from Habarok. Her husband was president of the Far East soviets. She will tell you in detail how they worked out the educational organizations there. She will tell you, for example, that they requisitioned all the pianos from the rich and they put them into a great building, and then into this great building they invited the peasants and workers' boys and girls. They assembled there and inside of three months they had a group of something like 500 students in that conservatory of music. She will tell how these teachers, who were only 18 or 20 years of age, worked out, away back up there in the woods, a Montessori system of education, and then put it into practice. I think you would be very much interested to hear her. There is the statement of Maxim Gorky, which was made 10 days ago, that Russia, under the greatest handicaps and under the greatest disorganization, has made tremendous strides in cultural and creative work, so that it will absolutely amaze the world when they know about it. We can bring you here very shortly some of the publications and magazines to show what has been produced in Russia during the last year or so.

May I add to that this other statement, the statement of Lloyd George, that any man who saw the figures that were involved in intervention would not for a moment consider it, because the Bolsheviks, as he called them, are a strong military power, and they are growing. In answer, then, to a great many of the statements that have been made here by different men, who said that Russia is largely disorganized, and that anarchy and chaos reign, I submit that a great, growing cultural work, according to the testimony of Maxim Gorky, and a great and growing military power, according to the words of Lloyd George, simply can not subsist upon the sort of conditions described here before this committee.

You asked for something in a little reconstructive way. I am going to read you something which will probably get from one side of any people that read it the accusation that, after all, I am very much of an opponent to the soviet government, and it will get from the radical side and the socialists the accusation that I am a traitor and a renegade and ought to be ousted from their midst, but I will read you this because I think it has a little to do with reconstruction as we face it here in America.

Senator WOLCOTT. This is along what line?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is along the line of reconstruction.

Senator WOLCOTT. In America, here?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Senator Overman asked me as I left, "Well, have you any reconstruction ideas to offer?" I have written out this thing, but it does not concern America so much, but only concerns the solution of the problem of discontent.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not know what was in Senator Overman's mind. Unfortunately he is not here, and I can not speak for him. This committee is appointed to investigate Bolshevik propaganda in this country, and how your views in regard to reconstruction in America can be at all pertinent to that inquiry I can not see. If what you are about to say is along that line you might leave what you have written here and let Senator Overman see it, and if he wants it to go in, of course I shall interpose no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Really, it has nothing to do with reconstruction in America. I took his request more as a spring board to jump from.

Senator WOLCOTT. In other words, Mr. Williams, while I am always interested to get people's views about different things, frankly I do not want to go outside of the limits of this investigation, because I want to get done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This summarizes the Russian situation, and that is the reason I would like to read it instead of meandering all around it. I thought I could present it in a very complete form, and it would probably answer a few of your questions. It has nothing to do, practically, with America.

Senator WOLCOTT. All right, I am relying on you to keep your testimony within the bounds of this investigation, and I have told you what it is—Bolshevism in Russia and its propaganda in this country. I will rely on you to observe good faith with me and keep within those limits.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All the agitators in the world can not stir up discontent in this country unless the soil is ready for the sowing of the seed of discontent.

Unemployment is the chief danger threatening. People are unemployed because shops close down. Shops close down because the capitalist owners lack markets in which to sell their products.

The socialist solution of this problem is to give each man the full product of his labor in order that he may have the means of buying back as much goods as he produces. Then there is no great surplusage which needs to go seeking foreign markets.

But since we have no general present disposition to try socialism, let us consider the possibilities of capitalism.

Capitalism is essentially expansive and under the present system it must seek outside markets for its manufactured goods and must gain access to raw materials.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not want to hear that. You will have to submit that to the committee, and if the committee wants it to go in, all right. Personally I am not interested in your views as to what should be done in this country. I do not recall that we have had any witness who has given his views as to what ought to be done in this country, and I do not want to open up that field.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, all right.

Senator WOLCOTT. Understand, I do not want to shut you off on anything you have to say about Russia and Bolshevik propaganda in this country. I would not undertake to shut you off in the slightest degree about that, and I think you will agree that the committee has allowed you a free hand. We want to continue to do it. But that is not within the scope of the inquiry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I will read you this other thing about Russia.

Senator WOLCOTT. How would it do for you to leave that statement here with the stenographer and let Senator Overman see it? It may be something he had in mind. Then let the committee say whether we want to put it in the record.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Prof. Lomomosoff, the railway expert of Russia, furnishes the following figures, just compiled. Russia has 17 per cent of the coal of the world, 37 per cent of the naphtha, 50 per cent of the iron, 56 per cent of the rye, 79 per cent of the hemp, and 27 per cent of the wheat.

After five years of war and revolution Russia needs every conceivable manufactured article. She can take all the output of America for a long time to come, and she is able to pay for it in raw material, either here or at the American industries on the spot.

True, the present soviet government is a handicap to the free, unlimited play of capitalistic interest in Russia because of the drastic laws for the protection of labor, but still it is the government of Russia, and we should examine the possibilities that lie in that situation.

In the first place, the soviet government puts a tremendous value upon American technicians, engineers, administrators, etc. There is nothing in it which precludes the development of industrial life in Russia on a tremendous scale. Men of action, like Col. Thompson, find nothing terrifying in the soviet. On the contrary, big men with creative instincts find in it an instrument admirably fitted for the accomplishment of big things. They see distinct advantages in the soviet. The thing that killed Harriman was not the managing of a great railroad, but its financing. Under the soviet system he does not need to worry about that. Great economic power is delegated to him precisely as we delegate great political power to outstanding individuals. The soviet puts its estimate upon big brains and genius by voting 50,000,000 rubles for foreign technical experts business administrators, engineers, etc., and it will give a free hand to these.

It is apparent that the soviet system calls out the latent enthusiasm of the people, effecting a release of the creative constructive energies of the masses. No one can say that of our system where the workman is interested more in his wages than in his work.

Russia under the soviet offers, then, not only its vast wealth to work upon, but also the labor force, enthusiastic and alive, to work it with. With us the creative forces of big business, brains, and labor run at cross purposes. Under the soviet the energies of men instead of being spent in quarreling over the division of the product can be wholly liberated for the task of bigger production.

In the second place, admitting the impossibility of America dealing with visionaries and fanatics, is that a correct view of the soviet government at present?

The World of February 6 says:

The main fact in the new situation is that the so-called nationalization of Russian industry puts industry back into the hands of the business class, who disguise their activities by giving orders under the magic title of "people's commissars." In theory the bourgeoisie are disfranchised, but actually they are fast drifting back into control of Russian industry and active participation in the state.

Strangely enough all the revolts against the soviet are now directed from the anarchists and extremists who hold that the soviet has become too conservative, centralized, and disciplined.

Maj. Thacher, of the Red Cross, who had business dealings with the soviet government, even during the days of its headstrong and irreconcilable youth, found a quite possible relationship with it, and furthermore, can testify that large transactions were carried through in an honest and efficient manner.

In the third place the Russian people have been particularly kindly disposed toward America.

Lenine himself has such a leaning toward America that he has often to fight with his party the charge of playing into the hands of American capitalists. Not that he loves American capitalists better than other capitalists, but he sees plainly that the safest alliance for Russia is one with distant America. He realizes that America has many things to teach the new industrial democracy of Russia, and we see him taking over the Taylor system and putting it into the new Russian order.

While Russia was shocked to see America advancing with Japanese troops against the workmen's and peasant's government, still it realized that America had long delayed the invasion into Russia and laid a retarding hand upon it. Russia will not forget that England and France were the chief aggressors against her.

America has many potential agents in soviet positions. While it is not true that 265 out of 379 members of the Petrograd soviet came from America, there are perhaps 20 or 25 there, and in almost every soviet there are one or two immigrants who hold positions of influence.

America has in Russia probably 100,000 immigrants, 5 per cent of whom, perhaps, hold positions of influence in the soviet. Their anti-American utterances were often for the consumption of the detectives and retainers who ran back to the consulates with tales of the blasphemous anti-Americanism of these ingrates. But, in any event, there are probably 5,000 American agents, knowing the American language, American machinery, and American business methods, and bound back to America by a thousand different ties, placed at the strategic points in Russia.

If Germany or Japan had such assets, would they not seek to use them rather than antagonize them?

Senator WOLCOTT. These Americans you speak of who were engaged in anti-American outcries, you say did so in order to have the tales carried back to America?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are various reasons for that, Senator Wolcott; some of them had certain grudges, some of them had suffered undoubtedly very much, and when they came back to Russia they told tales of what they had experienced.

Senator WOLCOTT. They did engage in anti-American talk?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, they did; but they were more anticapitalistic than anti-American. But I know that these people are bound by a thousand ties back to America.

Senator WOLCOTT. They show that in a very queer way. They show their ties to America by abusing America. That is strange to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They went back home and related what they had experienced in America. Lincoln Steffens was asked this same question. They said to him: "Is it true that Americans who have returned to Russia have told adverse tales about what they went through in America?" Lincoln Steffens replied—I think this was in the Chicago City Club—"Yes; I heard all of these tales, but I never heard any that were not true. Maybe some of them did harbor grudges which they ought not to have, but I know they very often said these things in the presence of a regular Government agent, in order to nettle or pique him. I know, on the other hand, that really most of the immigrants, while openly holding this position toward America, yet in their hearts took an entirely different attitude. They often boasted what America had done and what America could do, and said how a real alliance ought to be effected with America. No matter how much they said against America, they always said ten times more against Germany, or against England, or against France." The suggestion I am bringing to you, Senator Wolcott, is this—if it is true that there are, say, 5,000, 10,000 or 25,000 men who have been in America and know America and know American business methods, and know American machinery, I think that, from a business standpoint at any rate, America's job is not to antagonize them, but to utilize them in every possible way. I am sure that if Germany had 10,000 agents in soviet Russia—and they had their agents there, undoubtedly, I am not denying it; she must have had them—if Germany had that number of trusted agents in Russia, I am sure that she would utilize them.

Senator WOLCOTT. Let me get your point. Your idea is there are ties in Russia connecting her with America; that these ties consist of men who have immigrated into Russia from America, and through those ties America could make valuable connections with Russia; and yet these ties, which are of such value in building up intimate connections between Russia and America, are at the same time engaged in abusing America. That seems to be, boiled down, your logic.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The point is that they have abused America, but I have heard some of them——

Senator WOLCOTT. And yet we can hope to have them bring Russia and America close together?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The point, Senator Wolcott, is that they abuse the abuses of America; they abuse the evil things in America; but they know that more evil things exist in France, in England, or in Germany. Therefore they have a certain great influence in affairs. The point is, Can America utilize these men?

Senator WOLCOTT. In other words, they dislike America less than they dislike others?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is a very frail tie, I should say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am just pointing out a possible use of them. The question is whether America is to antagonize them or whether America is to utilize them.

In the fourth place, it is probably true that under the soviet government industrial life will perhaps be much slower in development than under the usual capitalistic system. But why should a great industrial country like America desire the creation and consequent competition of another great industrial rival? Are not the interests of America in this regard in line with the slow tempo of development which soviet Russia projects for herself?

Senator WOLCOTT. Then your argument is that it would be to the interest of America to have Russia repressed?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not repressed——

Senator WOLCOTT. You say, Why should America desire Russia to become an industrial competitor with her?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is speaking from a capitalistic standpoint. The whole interest of America is not, I think, to have another great industrial rival, like Germany, England, France, and Italy, thrown on the market in competition. I think another government over there besides the soviet government would perhaps increase the tempo or rate of development of Russia, and we would have another rival. Of course, this is arguing from a capitalistic standpoint.

Senator WOLCOTT. So you are presenting an argument here which you think might appeal to the American people, your point being this, that if we recognize the soviet government of Russia as it is constituted we will be recognizing a government that can not compete with us in industry for a great many years?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a fact.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is an argument that under the soviet government Russia is in no position, for a great many years at least, to approach America industrially?

MR. WILLIAMS. Absolutely. It has no great chance under any government. It has no chance to develop industrially for years and years to come. But the point is that the people of the soviet governments are not obsessed with the idea of a great industrial country. They do not want to build it up suddenly. They are perfectly content to let Russia remain agricultural to a large extent in the future. In other words, they are content to produce certain raw materials, like wheat and other grains, etc., but their hearts are not set upon building up a great industrial factory life. Peter Struve put it forcibly when he said that the Russian moujik is not anxious to be cooked in a factory boiler. We find now in Petrograd and Moscow at the present time that large numbers of the workmen who have lived there in the factories, and who have tasted factory life, are forming themselves into little unions of ten, fifteen, or a hundred people and moving back into the country again; because, while we here for three generations have got used to industrial life, they have not. The Russians instinctively react against it, and they are not anxious to have a rapid growth in the industrial organization over there.

MR. HUMES. Mr. Williams, do you know Oscar Tokol?

MR. WILLIAMS. I met him in Finland: yes.

MR. HUMES. What was his connection with the soviet government there?

MR. WILLIAMS. In Finland he has been a leader of the socialists and been also a speaker in the house. I know his case very well.

MR. HUMES. He has left the soviet form of government and denounced it as impracticable and impossible.

MR. WILLIAMS. Oscar Tokol never had the soviet form of government in Finland. He made a trip to Russia and lived there about three months or so, and then at the end of that three months he issued a statement from Archangel, which was directed to Nuorteva, of the Finnish-American Bureau in America, to tell to the American-Finnish Socialists that he did not regard the condition in Russia at that time as being anything but very chaotic and very hopeless, and that the best thing to do was to make some sort of arrangement with the allies.

MR. HUMES. In other words, you left Russia in May, and on the 10th of September this man wrote a letter to the representative of the Finnish Government in this country, in which he made the following statement [reading]:

You over in America are not able to imagine how horrible the life in Russia at the present time is. The period after the French Revolution surely must have been as a life in a paradise compared with this. Hunger, brigandage, arrests, and murders are such everyday events that nobody pays any attention to them. Freedom of assemblage, association, free speech, and free press is a far-away ideal, which is altogether destroyed at the present time. Arbitrary rule and terror is raging everywhere, and, what is worst of all, not only the terror proclaimed by the government, but individual terror as well.

Now, that is a work of a man that has been in touch with the operation of the government and with the conditions in Russia three months after you left Russia.

MR. WILLIAMS. Quite so.

MR. HUMES. Do you question the truth of his statement as to conditions over there?

MR. WILLIAMS. I question it very much, knowing something about his mental state, yet knowing that what he saw would be an accurate reflection of that. But, of course, that was in September, and, naturally, things there were very chaotic. I think things were probably at their worst in September and October—very bad.

MR. HUMES. They were worse in September and October than they were when you left in June?

MR. WILLIAMS. I think probably they were.

MR. HUMES. Are they not now as bad as or worse than they were in September?

MR. WILLIAMS. The only thing that I can do——

Senator WOLCOTT. You do not know, do you?

MR. HUMES. But from your information?

MR. WILLIAMS. That is a fair statement—a fair reading of the thing. The only information I have is from the people that come from Russia. Mr. Yarros, of the Associated Press, and Mr. Keddie, who left on December 20, and they make statements about the situation as they saw it there in Russia at that time. I think Mr. Keddie would be the most valuable of all witnesses, because he is a Quaker. Most of the time he has lived with the peasants. Tokol's letter was dated September 10, as you say, or probably a little bit later. But here we have, February 6, the last man that has come out of Russia, Robert Minor, who is an anarchist. He has written some letters to the New York World in which he says that he is perfectly disgusted with the whole program, because there has come a change over the soviet government. It is represented in these letters as bringing discipline and order into the life of the people; and he is disgusted with it. I would like to read sections from those letters or leave the letters with you.

Senator WOLCOTT. Suppose you leave them here.

MR. WILLIAMS. Those give a different view of the conditions that prevail. He said that the most marvelous thing was that inside of the last eight weeks the whole people had submitted themselves to hard discipline, and that the former bourgeois merchant class was turning into managers of factories and stores, and that particularly in the military forces the whole machine worked like clockwork. He refutes the picture that Tokol gives. If it is a true picture, then the statement of Maxim Gorky showing Russia with a great and growing cultural life, and the statement of Lloyd-George showing Russia as a great and growing military power, could hardly be true. Tokol's letter must be taken as a reflection of the awful period they passed through in September and October, when the reign of terror was on. This is probably the fair way to adjust the discrepancies between different witnesses.

MR. HUMES. Mr. Williams, just one or two more questions. Did you go to Russia as a newspaper correspondent or as a writer—in what capacity?

MR. WILLIAMS. On the credentials of the New York Evening Post.

MR. HUMES. Were you financed by them?

MR. WILLIAMS. No; I was not.

MR. HUMES. You were in Russia for a year?

MR. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. How much of that time were you in the service of the Russian Bolshevik government?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just about five weeks; maybe eight weeks.

Mr. HUMES. You testified Saturday that you had received 300 rubles for certain work that you did?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Did you ever receive any other compensation from the Russian government?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not exactly sure. I think 536 rubles would cover it. Perhaps the right to stay in the National Hotel at a reduced rate, and perhaps a reduced rate on a ticket on the Trans-Siberian line.

Mr. HUMES. That is the only compensation you received, and the rest of your expenses you financed yourself?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to incriminate Maj. Robins or have him shoulder me, but I owe him 6,000 rubles, borrowed from him in Russia, and which he has my note for. I am hoping that the price of rubles will go down.

Mr. HUMES. I was not concerned as to whom you borrowed money from. I was interested in whom you were employed by. Were you employed by him, or were your relations purely that of a loan?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was a loan.

Mr. HUMES. Then, while you had credentials from the New York Evening Post, your compensation all came from the Bolshevik government or from Mr. Robins?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The outside compensation that I got from the Bolsheviks would be $60. The only reason I took that was to get inside the organization and to operate inside the propaganda department in getting literature over into Germany and to organize this International Legion against the Germans. So that represents the totality of my income and the totality of any expectations of the Soviet government.

Mr. HUMES. You expected further compensation from them when you opened an information bureau?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I opened an information bureau, the money was to be supplied through American channels, and was to come in regular diplomatic relation. Everyone knows that the salary of every commissar in the Russian Government is 600 rubles, which is about $60. In other words, you know the theory of the present order of society over there is that no man shall have cake until everybody has bread, and that if a man shall not work neither shall he eat. There is one of the great holds of the Russian soviet commissars on the people.

We do not understand that, but it is true that under the Kerensky régime the workingman demanded higher and higher wages, but under the soviet government they put a stop to that immediately. The commissars were receiving at the outside $60 a month, and so people turned to the workmen demanding higher wages, and said, "Do you want a larger salary than Lunacharsky or Kollontay or Lenine or Trotsky?" That put a stop to this constant demand for higher wages. In the National Hotel, where I once lived, they had elaborate menus. But when this hotel was taken over by the soviet government and Lenine and other commissars lived there, the policy was changed. We had for our meals either soup and kasha or soup and meat. They had tea, of course. Without tea the revolution and everything else in Russia would go to pieces.

Mr. HUMES. Has the government taken over all the hotels?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Three hotels in Moscow.

Mr. HUMES. To run commercially or to be used by government agents?

Mr. WILLIAMS. For the government commissars and soviet delegates, although, I think, possibly some of the hotels have now been taken over by the government to run commercially.

Mr. HUMES. There has been a good deal said here with reference to contributions that were exacted by these $60-a-month men. What do you know about that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. You mean whether, after all, if the soviet—

Mr. HUMES. Graft, as we call it in this country. I notice they use the more dignified term "contributions" in Russia.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, concerning all the leaders of importance, I think most everybody that has been before this committee will say that they are men of absolute integrity. They are absolute idealists, whether you agree with them or not. They were not afraid of responsibility, not afraid to die, and not afraid of work—which is the most remarkable thing in Russia. Against these men no one can point the finger of accusation. Now, to what extent is there a basis for the charge of "graft"? Speaking in general terms, when the soviet government took over the power of the government there rode into office those people who got jobs simply because they could read and write. At the beginning, as has been pointed out, the soviet government was sabotaged by the intelligentsia. They did not help the peasants and workers in their great task. So there came into the soviet many grafters and criminals. It is undoubtedly true that these men, carrying soviet credentials, went around and levied some of these contributions, so called. You can call them "contributions" or "graft." The large bulletins themselves announced that 40 per cent of the men who were shot during the red terrors were soviet officials who had been found guilty of bribery or theft.

Senator WOLCOTT. Do you know of your own knowledge of any that were shot?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do, indeed. I went one time to a building on Gowchovaya. My host had two or three bottles of champagne on the table and was talking with great éclat to his comrades across the way. With dramatic importance he said, "We will all go down in history as makers of this revolution." He went next day to a moving-picture show and closed it up. About two days later the proprietor came around to him and gave him two or three thousand rubles and he opened up the moving-picture establishment again. I know that four days after that they took him and three other culprits off to prison. Later on some of these men were very ruthlessly and summarily shot. The official notices state that 40 per cent of the people shot in the red terror were corrupt soviet officials. The last word we have now is that any soviet official found drunk or under the influence of liquor is going to be shot. There are many cases of that kind.

Mr. HUMES. Do I understand that capital punishment is to be inflicted for drinking?

Mr. WILLIAMS. So far as the soviet officials are concerned. No man who is a soviet official can be found drunk. The law is as drastic as that.

Mr. HUMES. Is not that a pretty severe law for the government that fought its predecessor because it had in effect capital punishment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very severe, undoubtedly, because very difficult circumstances sometimes demand very severe and drastic measures. I have heard a great many of the tales and stories that have been told about Russia and what happened in some of the soviets of the Bolsheviki, but some of the best tales have never been told. For example, there is a story of a commissar that went down to the town of Rostof. He felt highly elated over the fact that he had got a great commission from Trotsky to take care of the military affairs, so when he got into the town of Taganrog he walked into the soviet with a brace of pistols. He held a pistol in his hand as he read a proclamation. At the end of every sentence he shot a bullet into the ceiling to punctuate his remarks. That is a good story that comes with a sort of grotesque thrill out of the dead gray level of the Russian revolution. But it is absolutely untypical of what, in general, is occurring over there.

What is happening over there is this: A great people, numbering 150,000,000, have suddenly broken their fetters and come into the light. They were blinded by the light for a while, but with earnestness they have gone into this grim, hard business of reorganizing human life upon a basis of justice, and with the ideal of a new brotherhood of man. Some one said, I believe, in the testimony, that they are aiming at heaven, but they are going through hell to get it. Well, I think there is a measure of truth almost in that statement, just as we know to deliver a child into the world there are tremendous throes of suffering and sacrifice. We know that in our own revolution this country was in a state of disorganization for something like eight years, but out of those birth throes there did come a better order. So that anyone who will focus his mind only upon the lunacy and the horrors incident to the revolution is doing himself an injustice. While he gazes upon these superficial things he has not discovered the real thing—the great elemental, spontaneous movement of the people toward justice.

It is a most remarkable fact that all the Americans that went out really to help the Russian people, who went into the soviet and worked with the soviet, who had first-hand knowledge, who knew the leaders in the soviet, although they know all the stories of the anti-soviet witnesses, yet will give you an interpretation of what happened in Russia different from those Americans who did not know the soviet from the inside. They will come here and tell you that the soviet government is a tremendously honest effort to reorganize society. All men love the things they help and understand them better. At the time that the workers and peasants armed themselves, and as the Red Guard went out to fight the Germans, Jerome Davis, of the Y. M. C. A., went out with a car of supplies. Another man named Humphries actively participated. These men went to help the people, and therefore had a good chance to understand them. They knew what was really going on in Russia, and therefore will come here and give you different testimony from what you have received. The American Red Cross distributed tens of thousands of cans of condensed milk. They gave other things to the people, working directly through the soviet. It is a remarkable fact that in working through the soviets the Red Cross men not only came to understand the soviets, but they have attained an attitude of sympathy and belief in the soviets. Most remarkable is the work of the Quaker society. The Quakers get closer to the people than anyone else. They live out among the peasants. They try to help the people. And all those Quakers, without exception, are strong, fine men, who see a big human field for work in the soviets. Every one of them has faith in the soviet as an institution. Mr. Keddie, in his report, says that the peasants through this institution during the last two years have absolutely changed their attitude toward life; he says that it is most interesting to see how the masses of the peasants have learned to express themselves for the first time. The mere fact is that all the people, without exception, who helped the Russian people and co-operated with the soviets, and got down under the skin of the thing, give different testimony from those who merely stood off and looked upon it as a spectacle, but did not get into it.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not recall that any witnesses have found fault with the soviet form of government. I do not recall that any witnesses have assailed that form of government, except perhaps the crowd that is running that government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They have.

Senator WOLCOTT. Your view is that those practices are not so extensive—sufficiently extensive—to be characteristic? Is that your view?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Precisely.

Senator WOLCOTT. The other witnesses take a different view.

Mr. HUMES. Now, Mr. Williams, you have been quoting Jerome Davis. I call your attention to a sentence or two from an official report of Jerome Davis. [Reading:]

In traveling on the trains and in the villages and on the steamers, one can almost never find any one who is in favor of the Bolsheviki régime. Even many of the Bolsheviks who are in power realize that their days are numbered, but content themselves with the thought that the longer they hold the power, the more chance there is of a revolution in some foreign country. For this reason many of the prominent Bolsheviks have sent their wives out of the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the date of that, Major?

Mr. HUMES. I can not tell you the exact date. It is after he left Russia.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is very interesting. May I ask you, is it possible to call him in here and let him give the whole general view of the situation? He very specially states that he is not a Bolshevik. I know that in the last article he wrote in the Survey, about working with the commissars, he gave a different viewpoint from what you have read. One can take out isolated sentences here and there from a report, but they would not be characteristic.

Mr. HUMES. Would there be any reason to believe that an official report of Mr. Davis put into this record would not be as authentic as his testimony if he appeared? Is he not telling the truth in official reports that he makes to the Government of the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; if you put in the whole report it will be fair, but not to put in isolated parts of the report. I traveled about upon railroads and steamships and other lines of travel, and I came out over the Trans-Siberian line. I talked with people I met along the line—the officials—and I found a great many with anti-Bolshevik sentiments. When I arrived in Vladivostok I talked with an attaché at American consulate. He told me that his impression was that the railway men were anti-soviet as a whole. I told him that I had precisely the same view. Then I looked up the matter, and I found that the so-called Vikzhidor, which is the central committee elected by all the railroad workers, was composed of 42 members. In it there were 28 Bolsheviki, 10 left social revolutionists, and 4 from the parties of the right. Thirty-eight out of 42 were for the soviets. Why was it that I got that impression of anti-sovietism and he got this impression, which was just contrary to the truth? Well, it was simply that we talked with a certain upper-class group—the station men, the conductors—and those men reflected their class sentiment. But the masses of the workers that were down below, whom we never got in contact with—the track hands, switchmen, and freight men—those men held an entirely different viewpoint. They had a different color of mind. It is true that if you go upon the railways and the steamships in this country, go upon any train and pick up the first 10 men that you meet with and ask them about the soviet government of Russia, 8 out of 10 might tell you that those men ought to be strung up. But go down into the industrial section of the city, go to a labor meeting, and talk about the soviet government of Russia, and you will find a different reaction. Workmen particularly feel that the soviet is something that is working toward a better society. So it is in Russia. Talk with a traveling man and he has a certain viewpoint, a point which is expressed by those men whom he has come in contact with on trains and in the hotels. But take the great mass of workers, and the masses of the lower people; they have another point of view.

Senator WOLCOTT. How are your lecture tours financed in this country? I mean, of course, by lecture tours, to confine the phrase to those in which you engage in talking upon Russia, concerning the Bolsheviki and the soviet government. I do not know whether you talk on other subjects or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I felt that the one thing that I wanted to do was to put over the Russian situation to the American public, and in putting it over to the public my attitude has been this. For example, here is one man telling one part of the situation. Well, now, it is very nice to go in and take a general all-around view of the situation. It is like rowing a boat with two oars; that is the normal way. But when everybody is rowing on one side one ought to get in and row with all his might on the side where no one else is rowing. I have been rowing on the side where nobody, or very few, have been rowing. There are only a few of us that have been emphasizing the constructive and positive side of soviet government. That is not a very popular side to take, because, as a rule, you can not get on the lyceum-chautauqua bureaus, etc. On the other hand, there has been such a desire to find out the facts that there has been a continuous demand for my services. So I have talked particularly to the middle class, educated audiences. The Military Intelligence, if it desires to find out all the facts in the case, ought to look over my books and see where my checks come from. If you do that you will see that most of my checks come from economic leagues, forums, city clubs—not very much from the city clubs, though, but from different organizations of the people. The city of Washington, for example, has done very well by me. For the Poli's meeting they gave me a good stipend. The next day after the article appeared in the newspaper here "Urges red America," which even the Attorney General said was not a true statement of the Poli meeting, there were so many people that felt indignant over the misrepresentation of the situation at the Poli's meeting that they came to me on the street and gave me money. One was a captain of the American Army. He gave me $10, and he said: "I would like to back up that sort of thing, trying to tell the truth as a man sees it." So I have received sums of $10, $25, and $30 from people who say they want me to go on with the work of trying to tell the truth about Russia. For example, I have been in Chicago this last week. There was a big meeting there of the Workers' Institute. They charged 15 cents admission and about 5,000 people paid it. They were very much interested in the Russian situation. From that meeting I received $150. And then in the Chicago City Club, where assemble the businessmen, who could afford to pay for the meeting, I spoke the next day, and I got a 65-cent dinner out of it.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not know what you call it in the Army, this intelligence service of the Army, and I do not know what records they have. Have you any information along that line concerning the financing of Mr. Williams, so to speak?

Mr. HUMES. I have made no inquiry at all.

Senator WOLCOTT. You see, an order was issued some time ago by the Secretary of War directing all members of the Military Intelligence not to give out any information unless the Secretary of War approved it, and I have no information what their files show.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So you want me to constitute myself an intelligence bureau and report upon myself to the committee?

Senator WOLCOTT. I want to know. You have mentioned the Economic League, of Boston; you say you get contributions from people who are interested—like the captain of the Army whom you spoke of—and you get a fee or stipend from such meetings as that which was held in Chicago. Now, is there a regular source?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; it is a very irregular source. The most regular income is from a certain pamphlet called "The Bolsheviks and the Soviets," from which I think I get one-half a cent a copy for every one that is sold.

Senator WOLCOTT. That is from the sale of your writings.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I have a certain income from articles I have written for the New Republic, Nation, etc.

Senator WOLCOTT. You get paid for the articles you write, generally speaking?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Senator WOLCOTT. Is there any other organization that supplies you with funds?

Mr. WILLIAMS. None at all.

Senator WOLCOTT. The Boston Economic League has, has it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; that is merely a fee. We had a Russian night up there in which Mr. Mansfield, of the Russian-American Chamber of Commerce, and Mr. Thacher and Mr. Olgin and myself were invited—a symposium.

Senator WOLCOTT. It is not a regular salary they give you?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. I am asking you these questions not out of any idle curiosity. It is the duty of the committee to find out how any propaganda, if there is any such, is supported, and the sources from which any funds for its support may come.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So far as I know, there has not been one cent ever arrived in America from Russia for propaganda purposes. I understand that Mr. Nuorteva received $10,000 from a Finnish source, that probably came ultimately back from Moscow, which was sent here and which went into the hands of the Naval Intelligence, and then went under control of Secretary Polk. I do not know whether he has or has not decided that Mr. Nuorteva can have that $10,000; but if there is any question of Bolshevik propaganda in America he is the man who knows about it and can give you an account, and he is the man I think you ought to hear before the committee, if I may presume to make any suggestion.

On the other hand, may I ask if the scope of the hearing was not to take in all political parties and what they are doing for propaganda in America? We know that there exists a tremendous propaganda——

Senator WOLCOTT. Have you a copy of the resolution here?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. I do not recollect that the resolution is that broad.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe that it is as broad as that. What a great section of the American public are interested in knowing is, what are the sources of the propaganda funds that have been used so largely toward stirring up intervention in Russia, which everybody now believes has become such a futile thing and such a fiasco.

Senator WOLCOTT. That certainly is not within the scope of the resolution. My idea is that the resolution covers Bolshevism and any propaganda that might be carried on in this country in its favor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood that the resolution was so worded that it says, "any political group in Russia that is agitating in America."

Senator WOLCOTT. No; I do not think it is as broad as that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I may be wrong on that; but while you are speaking of the propaganda funds—has anyone here a copy of the resolution? May I just say again that your investigation, if it goes down to the root, will probably find that $10,000 has been sent to America for an information bureau to state the facts about Russia and Finland; and on the other hand, the people of the country are very much interested in knowing about whence the so-called Russian information bureau, which has conducted a tremendous propaganda on the other side, derives its funds, and how it expends its funds, and who are its agents; and there is a demand in certain parts of the country to know whence those funds are forthcoming and for what purpose they are being issued.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know whether or not any of the—I think it was—2,000,000 rubles that was appropriated for propaganda purposes was expended in this country?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The 2,000,000 rubles were voted in 1917 and the International Propaganda Bureau was established, of which Reinstein was made the head. They published, with those 2,000,000 rubles, three pamphlets in French and English. They are pamphlets which explain the situation in Russia. I do not know of but one of those pamphlets ever coming to America. Of those 2,000,000 rubles, 99.9 per cent—I have worked it out to a figure—were spent upon literature in the languages of the German and Austro-Hungarian Empires. The theory of the soviets' propaganda was this: "A relentless warfare we will wage against those who wage a warfare against us." They waged warfare only against those attacking them. The propaganda was concentrated against Germany and Austro-Hungary. They have tried to get some into France and England, because these countries were leading the attack upon the soviet government. There has never been any particular attempt to get propaganda into America because the soviet government regarded America as not maintaining any great threat against them. They realize that America has taken an attitude of fairness and tolerance, on the whole. Therefore they have exempted her from the scope of their propaganda.

Of course you know, Senator Wolcott and Mr. Humes, that it is hard to distinguish between a propaganda bureau and an information bureau. I was specifically told that if the Russian soviet government should ever establish a revolutionary information bureau in America it should not in any way voice the idea of any Russian political party, but that it should explain exactly the constructive and creative work that is going on in Russia under these circumstances. For that reason they prepared in Russia a great moving-picture reel, which all the artists of the Moscow Arts Theater cooperated in producing, and it is a very beautiful and a very interesting thing. It shows the backgrounds of Russian life. The Military Information Bureau has also two reels showing what is going on in Russia now, the building of railroad stations and the drilling of the new army, and the various undertakings of the cooperative societies.

Mr. HUMES. I think we discussed those railroad stations on Saturday, did we not? I have forgotten whether they were under discussion while you were on the stand or whether it was with one of the other witnesses.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Probably some other witness. I do not remember.

Mr. HUMES. One of those railroad stations is in Moscow, is it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know about the details of the film.

Mr. HUMES. You have not seen it? You do not know what is on that subject?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that there are films of that sort.

Mr. HUMES. If it is the Moscow railroad station on that film, it is now in the same condition as it was in when the great war broke out, is it not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; if that is the case; probably.

Senator WOLCOTT. Are there any other questions? Mr. Williams, do you want to say anything further?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that I have said about everything that is in my mind. The only thing is, if I can enter a plea——

Senator WOLCOTT. You are not on trial, you know.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, if I could enter a plea to the members of the committee it would be a plea that at this time—I can imagine, for example, in England during the French Revolution a committee listening to all the reports upon the situation in France at that time, and I can imagine the difficulties of them making any final decision, making any final report, upon the situation, and I know what a terrible judicial responsibility they had. We know that 100 years after that event happened, at this time, we regard it as a momentous and tremendous event in history which has had, despite its cruelties and brutalities, a great effect, and conferred a great blessing upon human society. Most of the committees in London at that time would have pronounced it as being a good deal of an orgy of violence and bloodshed. I hope that this committee will hear enough witnesses to get a different interpretation of the events that have gone on in Russia, and so that our country will not have, 50 years from now, to be shamefaced, or have to apologize, for a judgment upon the Russian revolution which was a judgment made upon the appearance, upon the sounds and externals, and which was not a right judgment, or was a judgment that missed the real spirit and the real ideal of the Russian revolution. That is all. I only hope that the Senators will some way or other find it possible to call some of these witnesses that we have asked for.

Senator WOLCOTT. Assuming that this committee should make some kind of a finding, I am afraid that your estimate is much higher of the historical value of it than 50 years from now it will probably have. I rather think that 50 years from now whatever this committee may find will have been forgotten.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know, Senator, but it is of tremendous consequence at the present time, when the American people are hearing stories on one side and then hearing stories on the other side. They do not hear the judgment of men who have heard all the stories from all the sources, so that any judicial utterance which you would make upon the situation in Russia at the present time would be of tremendous value in setting their minds aright. Then we could take some definite action to some definite purpose; because we are faced not with a theory but with a set of facts, and the facts at the present time are that intervention has been declared out of court.

I have heard no reference to what is being prepared for Russia in various ways, but I think, on the whole, most people in this country think that intervention has been declared a failure.

The second suggestion made is to draw a sort of cordon around Russia and hold her, as it were, incommunicado, and slowly tighten the strangle hold on her until she will have to give up.

Senator WOLCOTT. This committee is certainly not inquiring into the proper thing to do with Russia.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was only hoping that we could get the truth about Russia so that the people who did not want either one of these policies might have the material at hand so that they could determine on another policy.

Senator WOLCOTT. But if there is anything further you want to say about conditions in Russia under the soviet rule, we will be glad to have you go ahead and do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I think, Senator, that I have given most of my views, and I will just submit to you some of these printed papers, which you can use or not use, as you choose.

Senator WOLCOTT. Pick out from your files what you want and hand them over to Mr. Humes. These articles from the New York World you want, I take it.

Senator Overman does not know when he wants to call the subcommittee again?

Mr. HUMES. No, sir.

Senator WOLCOTT. We will now stand adjourned, subject to the call of the chairman.

(Thereupon, at 4.45 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned, subject to the call of the chairman.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 5, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), Nelson, and Sterling.

On March 3, 1919, the Senate agreed to the following resolution (S. Res. 469), which had been submitted by Mr. Overman on February 26, 1919, and on February 27 reported, without amendment, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, conducting, by subcommittee, under resolutions of the Senate numbered three hundred and seven and four hundred and thirty-six, investigations of German propaganda and Bolshevik propaganda, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to continue said investigations until the expiration of one calendar week from the commencement of the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress; to sit in Washington or elsewhere during the period between the end of the Sixty-fifth Congress and the beginning of the Sixty-sixth Congress and thereafter during the sessions or recesses of the Senate, and to report in the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress; and the authority for the incurring and payment of the expenses of said investigations, whether incurred in Washington or elsewhere, is hereby extended for the same length of time.

Senator OVERMAN. Miss Beatty, are you ready to go on now?

Miss BEATTY. Yes, sir.

TESTIMONY OF MISS BESSIE BEATTY.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Mr. HUMES. Where do you live, Miss Beatty?

Miss BEATTY. In New York; 132 East Nineteenth Street. I am from San Francisco originally.

Mr. HUMES. How long have you resided in New York, and what is your business?

Miss BEATTY. I am editor of McCall's Magazine. I have resided in New York since August of last year.

Mr. HUMES. It is my understanding that during the last few years you have spent some time in Russia. During what period of time were you in Russia?

Miss BEATTY. I went to Russia in the spring of 1917, leaving San Francisco on the 2d of April, and I came back in February.

Mr. HUMES. That is February, 1918?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. I assume that you mean that you arrived in this country in February?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. When did you leave Russia?

Miss BEATTY. I left on the 26th of January, immediately after the dissolution of the constituent assembly.

Senator OVERMAN. You do not mean last January?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; January, 1918.

Senator OVERMAN. Immediately after what?

Miss BEATTY. After the dissolution of the constituent assembly.

Mr. HUMES. By what route did you leave Russia?

Miss BEATTY. By way of Finland, and then through Sweden and Norway.

Mr. HUMES. By what way did you enter Russia?

Miss BEATTY. By Siberia.

Mr. HUMES. By way of Vladivostok?

Miss BEATTY. No; by Harbin, through Korea.

Mr. HUMES. You were in Russia for eight months, then, practically?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. When did you arrive, with reference to the March revolution of 1917? It was after that?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; it was after that. I arrived early in June. I think it was the 3d or 4th of June that I reached Petrograd.

Mr. HUMES. Then you were there only between six and seven months?

Miss BEATTY. No; I was there eight months.

Mr. HUMES. If you arrived early in June and left on the 22d of January—

Miss BEATTY. I arrived during the first week of June and left the end of January. That is eight months, is it not? June, July, August, September, October, November, December, and January; eight months; yes.

Mr. HUMES. Now, during your time in Russia what localities did you visit?

Miss BEATTY. I lived in the war hotel in Petrograd. That was the Astoria, the military hotel. I kept my room there for eight months. I went across Siberia first of all; and then I went to Moscow and down the Volga River to Nijni Novgorod in the summer time. I spent two weeks on the Russian front, part of the time in the trenches with the regular Russian Army.

Senator NELSON. You say you went down the river to that place—what is it called?

Miss BEATTY. No. I went to Dvinsk; to what they called the western front.

Senator NELSON. On the western front?

Miss BEATTY. Yes. From there I went to Maladetschna, where the woman's regiment was stationed, and was in barracks with them for nearly a week.

Mr. HUMES. What was the situation in Russia when you arrived there? Economically, from the standpoint of government, and from the standpoint of military rule, military control, the question of terrorism, disorder, what was the general situation?

MISS BEATTY. The general situation was pretty bad. The country was, of course, economically broken down. It had been broken down by more than three years of war and the further breaking down that goes with revolution. I believe that 50 per cent of the rolling stock of the railroads was out of commission at the time of the March revolution, and, of course, that made things very bad. Kerensky was the head of the ministry, the premier, and there were daily clashes in the cabinet, with men resigning and new men coming in all the time.

From the military standpoint, the country was in a very bad way. The day I arrived they tried to have a patriotic demonstration for the purpose of keeping Russia in the war, but it was a total failure. The Russians had made up their minds that they were not going to fight, even as early as that.

Senator STERLING. Was this in Petrograd?

MISS BEATTY. Yes; in Petrograd.

Senator STERLING. This demonstration?

MISS BEATTY. Yes; just in front of the war hotel, where I stayed. This was the day I arrived.

Senator STERLING. This was in June, 1918?

MISS BEATTY. Yes; about June 4.

Senator STERLING. June, 1917, I mean.

MISS BEATTY. 1917; yes.

Senator NELSON. How long did you stay there at that hotel?

MISS BEATTY. I stayed there eight months—kept my room there all the time I was in Russia.

Senator NELSON. How did you get the chance to go to these fronts that you speak of?

MISS BEATTY. I went in and out. I went to the front and came back to Petrograd, and I went to Moscow and came back to Petrograd. Petrograd was the center of everything. It was the seat of all these changing governments, so we made it our headquarters.

Senator NELSON. You spoke about Dvinsk. Where is that?

MISS BEATTY. It is on the western front—to the west.

Senator NELSON. On the border of Poland, is it not?

MISS BEATTY. No; it is to the side of the border of Poland. Vilna was the nearest point on the front in Poland. That had been taken by the Germans; was held by the Germans at this time.

Senator STERLING. Was this Russian regiment of women you speak of the famous so-called Battalion of Death?

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. There was a lady here—what was her name?

MISS BEATTY. Botchkareva. She was the commander of the regiment.

Senator OVERMAN. Was she the same lady that came to this country?

MISS BEATTY. Yes, Senator.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you heard that she had been killed since she was over here; that she had gone back to Russia and had been killed?

MISS BEATTY. No.

Senator OVERMAN. I heard that she had been.

Miss BEATTY. I do not know about that.

Senator OVERMAN. What was the other name that she was called by?

Miss BEATTY. They called her the natchalnik, which means commander.

Senator OVERMAN. This is outside of the question, but let me ask you, did these women as soldiers fight pretty well?

Miss BEATTY. Very, from all accounts. I visited the hospital after the battle. I saw a great many of them in the hospital who had been wounded, and everybody said they fought very well. One of the girls I knew there was only 16. She was wounded in 16 places, and died of her wounds in the hospital.

Senator STERLING. How were they equipped? How did that regiment seem to be equipped with arms?

Miss BEATTY. They were equipped just as the men were. The equipment was very slow in coming. I was in barracks when they expected to get away, and each day the equipment was delayed. The whole thing was an adventure, and was based on an entirely false premise. The women thought that by shaming the Russian men they could make them fight. They failed to understand that the men had a philosophy underneath their refusal to fight. They said, "Why should we fight our brothers in Germany? They were whipped into the trenches by their ruler, the Kaiser, just as we were whipped into the trenches by our ruler, the Czar. Let them make a revolution, as we have done, and then we will all live peaceably together." That was the point of view they had. It was not a question of cowardice; it was just a difference of philosophy.

Senator STERLING. From what kind of philosophy and what kind of an organization did that point of view emanate? What class of people were they, socialists?

Miss BEATTY. You see, in Russia practically everyone is a socialist. You have probably heard of the constituent assembly. In the constituent assembly the men were as far apart as the North Pole and the South Pole, but everybody was a socialist. Except for the little group of people at the top, they are all socialists. The question is simply what kind of socialist you are, rather than whether or not you are a socialist.

Senator STERLING. But all were in favor, apparently, of a constituent assembly, were they not; that is, all in the Duma, anyhow, including the strong or radical socialists in the Duma, were in favor of a constituent assembly?

Miss BEATTY. Yes. The disagreement about the constituent assembly came always with the people in power. Kerensky was afraid to call a constituent assembly because he was afraid he would lose power; and at that time the left wing, the group led by Trotsky and Lenine—

Senator STERLING. Those were the radical socialists?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; they always speak of them over there as the right and the left, you know.

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Miss BEATTY. The left wing was always asking for a constituent assembly, and it was put off from day to day. The group in power always thought they had the power, and the thing to do was to defer the constituent assembly, because they did not know how the delegates would act.

Senator NELSON. Was not the Duma in session under the Kerensky government? Is not that the legislative body of Russia?

Miss BEATTY. The Duma was the so-called legislative body of Russia during the Czar's régime, and, I think, for a certain period after the March revolution.

Senator NELSON. Yes. What dissolved that?

Miss BEATTY. The Duma was dissolved because——

Senator NELSON. By whom?

Miss BEATTY. By the soviet; at least, virtually by the soviet.

Senator NELSON. Not by the Kerensky government?

Miss BEATTY. Well, it is difficult to say what was the Kerensky government and what was not. The soviet was the council that was formed immediately with the March revolution, and there were in the soviet various elements. There was a left wing and a right wing, all struggling for power. As the left wing dominated more and more, they demanded more and more the representation of the radical group in the cabinet, and they said that the Duma was a representation of the old Czar order and not of the new revolutionary order.

Senator NELSON. That was the contention of the Trotsky and Lenine crowd?

Miss BEATTY. It was pretty much the contention of the groups that were more to the right, too. I mean, it was not only Trotsky and Lenine who felt that the Duma was not representative. The Duma was acceptable to the Czar.

Senator NELSON. I do not understand. There was no soviet government organized there until Lenine and Trotsky came into power and conducted their revolution. You speak about a soviet government. I do not understand—I never heard—that Kerensky organized a soviet government.

Miss BEATTY. Let me explain that to you. Perhaps I can make it a little bit clearer.

Senator NELSON. I think that it requires explanation.

Miss BEATTY. It seems to, Senator Nelson. You see, "soviet" is the Russian word for council, meaning merely a meeting, and the soviet of soldiers and workmen was formed immediately upon the March revolution, and that organization acted as a body of pressure on whatever government was in power. Now, the soviet did not take over the government until the November revolution, but the soviet was, nevertheless, in existence from the very beginning. The left wing in the soviet advocated that the soviet should take control of the government.

Senator NELSON. There was no soviet government until the November revolution?

Miss BEATTY. There was a soviet in existence all the time, but the soviet did not take over the government.

Senator NELSON. No.

Miss BEATTY. Until the November revolution.

Senator STERLING. But it was really the council until that time?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And that soviet that you speak of, that was in existence, was simply a local soviet in Petrograd?

Miss BEATTY. No——

Senator NELSON. It was not the soviet composed, as the subsequent revolutionary government attempted to create it, of representatives from local soviets throughout Russia.

Miss BEATTY. No; you are just a little bit wrong about that, Senator Nelson. It was the soviet of all of Russia. You see, there were two soviets, the Petrograd soviet, which was a local affair, and this national soviet, which met from time to time. This was the representative body of all of the soviets of all of the country, and had its effect on the government; just as the Republican Party here, though it is not running the government, nevertheless affects the government.

Senator OVERMAN. How long after Lenine and Trotsky took charge of affairs were you there?

Miss BEATTY. I was there for about three months after Lenine and Trotsky came into power; not long enough, of course, to be able to pass upon the things that have happened recently, but long enough to know something of the men, and to try to find out what they were working toward.

Senator OVERMAN. Then you were not there during what the witnesses call the reign of terror?

Miss BEATTY. No; the reign of terror did not begin until the revolution was nearly a year old. The reign of terror did not really begin until after allied intervention. The first note of the reign of terror that I ever heard sounded was at a convention of railway men in Petrograd, when Nikolas Tchaikowsky, at one time the leader of the peasants, got up in the meeting and made an attack against the Bolsheviks. He said, "We know how to fight tyrants. We have used the red terror against the tyrants in the past, and we will use it again." That was the first time I ever heard "terror" threatened. There were vague rumors about, everywhere. People were talking of terror. One of the men among the soviet leaders I went to one day when there was this rumor about the terror around—he was a man whom I knew quite well, whom I had come to know quite well through going to the meetings of the soviet—and I said, "Surely, there is going to be no red terror here. Surely, the world has advanced too far since the French Revolution to permit of that. You are not going to restore the death penalty, are you?" He said, "No; we will never restore the death penalty." And then he added, "Unless we have to restore it for traitors in our own ranks; and what can you do with a man who is a traitor in your own ranks?" Since that time those men have instituted the red terror; and it seems to me that we ought to find out what drove them to the red terror.

Senator NELSON. Are you a socialist?

Miss BEATTY. No. The only political——

Senator NELSON. Are you affiliated with any section of the socialists?

Miss BEATTY. No. The only political affiliation I ever have had was in 1918, when I took the stump in California for President Wilson.

Senator NELSON. No; what are your sympathies now and your political affiliations? Are you a socialist at heart?

Miss BEATTY. It depends on what you mean by a socialist. I have been a social worker.

Senator NELSON. You ought to know, because you have described, as you say, all these Russian socialists.

Miss BEATTY. There are 40 degrees of socialists in Russia alone—40 different degrees.

Senator NELSON. Are you a socialist, and what is your degree?

Miss BEATTY. What is your definition of a socialist, and then I will answer you?

Senator NELSON. No; you define it yourself.

Miss BEATTY. I will tell you what I am, and then perhaps you can decide whether I am a socialist. As I say, I have never affiliated with any group politically except this group that helped to elect President Wilson.

Senator NELSON. You do not mean to imply that Wilson was elected by a group of socialists? Do you mean to imply that President Wilson was elected by a group of socialists?

Miss BEATTY. No; the group I affiliated with in California was—

Senator NELSON. Oh, never mind what you were affiliated with.

Miss BEATTY. Senator Nelson, I shall have to insist upon answering your question in my own way.

Senator NELSON. Tell us what you are.

Miss BEATTY. The group with which I was affiliated in California was a group of women in the College Equal Suffrage League of Non-partisan Women, who went out to help elect President Wilson at the last election. That is the only group with which I have ever been politically affiliated.

Senator NELSON. That was a woman-suffrage association?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Do you belong to what we call the picket club, here?

Miss BEATTY. No; I do not. I want to try to tell you what I am. For 12 years I have done social-service work of different kinds; and if you have ever been a social-service worker you have a great passion in your heart to do away with poverty, and you feel that every child born into the world should get an education, have enough milk, and all that sort of thing.

Senator NELSON. Yes; but you know the social end of the Trotsky and Lenine government is going to do that job.

Miss BEATTY. I do not know just how it is going to be brought about, but I am interested in any program which may help to bring that about.

Senator NELSON. The soviet government—tell us what is the nature of that government of Lenine and Trotsky?

Senator OVERMAN. Have you finished your statement as to what you are?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; if Senator Nelson is satisfied, I am. I do not know, myself, what I am.

Senator NELSON. I have a suspicion that you do not, yourself, know it. I am inclined to concur with you.

Senator OVERMAN. Pardon these interruptions. We do not mean to be disrespectful, at all.

Miss BEATTY. That is quite all right, Senator Overman.

Senator NELSON. I am anxious merely to get your point of view.

Senator OVERMAN. I want to explain to you that Senator Nelson is one of the finest men in the world, and he does not mean, by his voice or manner, to be disrespectful to you.

Miss BEATTY. I assume that Senator Nelson means no disrespect. If the Senator were disrespectful it would be the first time that any man has ever been disrespectful to me.

Senator NELSON. What I would like to hear you on is, what you know about the government of Lenine and Trotsky; what their propaganda and plan is.

Miss BEATTY. Perhaps if I tell you a little bit about the course of development of things in Russia, that will help to clarify it a little. I went to Russia thankful that there had been a revolution, because I had been for a long time a student of Russian literature and I knew what the lives of the masses of the Russian people in the past had been. I think that I shared the feeling of most Americans, that it was a very wonderful thing that Russian autocracy had been overthrown. When I went there I was very much interested in what Kerensky was trying to do; my sympathies were all with him, and I felt that American influence should back him.

Senator STERLING. Were not your sympathies with the men who were trying to control, and form a democratic form of government, before Kerensky came into power? You said that you sympathized with the overthrow of the Czar.

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. As we all did. But were you not in sympathy with those leaders of the Duma, like the president of the Duma and Miliukov and other able men, who were in favor of a democratic form of government?

Miss BEATTY. When I arrived these men had already been overthrown.

Senator STERLING. Did you not have sympathy for the others who were trying to form a democratic form of government?

Miss BEATTY. Of course, I had sympathy with their efforts. I had always had sympathy with the fight that they were making. But when I got there Rodzianko had been overthrown. Most of them wanted a constitutional monarchy. The people of Russia were fighting for a democracy. Rodzianko and Miliukov were overthrown when I got there. When I got there the man in power was Kerensky himself. The people said, "We do not want a constitutional monarchy. We want something more than that."

Senator STERLING. Did you hear anything about Kerensky having ordered a relaxation of discipline in the army while you were there?

Miss BEATTY. The relaxation of discipline in the army came immediately with the overthrow of the Czar.

Senator STERLING. But did not Kerensky issue some order under which it was understood that the enlisted man was not to show any particular respect to this superior?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Or to salute him?

Miss BEATTY. What they call Prikaz No. 1 was the order which abolished saluting and many of the regulations for the soldiers.

Senator STERLING. Were you in sympathy with that extreme view of army discipline?

Miss BEATTY. I was in sympathy with the abolition of the death penalty, because I have always been in sympathy with that.

Senator NELSON. Did you have any sympathy with the extreme view that the enlisted man should not be required to salute or pay proper respect to his superior officer?

Miss BEATTY. I was in sympathy with Kerensky's attitude on that. This was the situation. They had all said, "The Czar is gone, and we do not have to do this." I mean that it was not Kerensky that created the lack of discipline. The lack of discipline already existed. It was a question of trying to get the Russian soldiers to realize that though this change had come, there was still need for responsibility among them.

Senator STERLING. Did not that disrespect for authority and semblance of authority create havoc in the army and tend to hasten the dissolution of the army?

Miss BEATTY. No; that came after the dissolution had already taken place.

Senator STERLING. You mean after the revolution had taken place?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; and I say that the soldiers said, "We do not want to fight any more."

Senator STERLING. Was it not intensified by Kerensky's decrees later on?

Miss BEATTY. I do not feel so. It may have been.

Senator STERLING. You know that to be the view of a great many?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; but I do not think those people understand the Russian situation. I do not think they realize that the masses were rushing along so fast that no leader could hold his power who did not make concessions to them. For instance, the army itself made a certain effort not to break down discipline, but after it had gone on there was a complete breakdown as soon as the revolution came. These men said, "Why should we fight? What is the use of freedom to a man in his grave?" and they began gradually to have disrespect for their officers. It was an effort to do something, to crystalize them, to carry things on, that, I think, made Kerensky do that. He felt that he could not control his people unless he did that. Then came the July revolution, and that was the first time the Bolsheviks appeared at all. I had just come back from the front when that took place.

Senator STERLING. You distinguish the Bolsheviks from the socialists and from the soviet council?

Miss BEATTY. No; the Bolsheviks are the left wing of the soviets. They are at present the controlling element of the soviets. They are not the entire soviets. They are in control, just as in the last Congress the Democrats were the controlling element here. The Bolsheviks now hold the control in Russia. But at that time, in July, they did not.

Senator STERLING. How did they come to be called the Bolsheviks? What is the origin of the term?

MISS BEATTY. The term means simply "majority," and it originated in the Swiss conference—about 1903, I think—when there was a split in the socialist group. Some of them went to the philosophy of Lenine at that time, the Bolshevik philosophy being merely the shortest cut to socialism.

Senator OVERMAN. While you are an American and had nothing to do with it, yet in your feelings you are not a partisan of the Bolsheviki?

MISS BEATTY. Not at all.

Senator OVERMAN. You are an American citizen?

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. You are not a partisan in your feelings or in your sympathies?

MISS BEATTY. No. I am merely an observer of Russian affairs. My feeling is that we ought to understand what produced the Bolsheviki; what they are trying to do; what there is that is good about them and what there is that is bad.

Senator NELSON. What are they trying to do? Will you tell us that? That is what we want to find out. I mean this government that is now controlled by Lenine and Trotsky.

MISS BEATTY. Lenine said, "We have entered into the transition period which will lead to socialism." He said, "We have the beginnings of a socialist state; but you can not avoid a transition period, and we have entered into that period."

Senator NELSON. A sort of purgatory?

MISS BEATTY. A swinging of the pendulum to the opposite extreme. In the days of autocracy the pendulum was away back here, and the people were all oppressed. When they got freedom, the logical thing was for the pendulum to swing to the other extreme. The course of all social progress is in an attempt to get here and get there, and you try to go farther than you can go.

Senator OVERMAN. You go to the other extreme in trying to get to the middle?

MISS BEATTY. Yes; exactly.

Senator NELSON. What is the plan of government?

MISS BEATTY. Their plan of government is just a national council based upon representation of all of the local councils.

Senator NELSON. I mean more particularly their economic plan and not their political scheme.

MISS BEATTY. Their economic plan is control of industry and socialization of land. Those are the two chief ideas. The plan was to give the land to the peasants and the control of industries to the workers.

Senator NELSON. Is not their program nationalization of land?

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That all of the land is to belong to the state?

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And that the people who are to till the land are to be not even tenants, but simply men who occupy the land and use as much as they occupy and cultivate, and no more?

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And they get no kind of title?

MISS BEATTY. No; all of the land goes into a common land fund, and that common land fund is administered by a local committee under the jurisdiction of the national committee. A man may have as much land as he and the members of his family can use without employing any labor.

Senator NELSON. They must not have any hired help?

MISS BEATTY. No. A man can hold the land as long as he can work it. The nearest thing to land tenure that there is in Russia is his right to suggest who his successor shall be on that land. If he becomes disabled the neighbors work his land for two years, and beyond that time the land goes back into the common land fund, and he is put upon a pension, the idea being that there shall be no land in Russia which is nonproductive.

Senator NELSON. And no land in private ownership; that the peasants should not even own the land?

MISS BEATTY. You can have all the land that you can use, but you can not use another man on that land.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it the idea that a man should not accumulate, but just live?

MISS BEATTY. Their idea is to take the earning capacity out of money. They say that money is just stored labor power. They say at present there are only two kinds of power in the world—the labor power and the power of capital, which is stored labor power.

Senator OVERMAN. They are against capital?

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. And against accumulation?

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. And if a man has a family of a dozen children, let us say, and they work on the farm and accumulate money, they will not allow them to have that money. They just want him to exist. Is that the idea?

MISS BEATTY. No; that is not entirely it. They say that he can not make money out of his money. He can do anything he likes with it, but he can not make his money earn money for him.

Senator OVERMAN. The idea is that it is to go back on the farm? Let us say that a man makes $1,000 in a year on the farm.

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. What does he do with that?

MISS BEATTY. He can buy food, and travel, and buy clothes. He can spend his money in any way he chooses, but he can not put it out to earn more money.

Senator OVERMAN. Outside of buying his clothes and subsistence and living, let us say that the man and his family accumulate on the farm $1,000. What becomes of that thousand dollars?

MISS BEATTY. He can keep that money and use it in any way he likes, at any time, but he can not make that money earn money for him. He can not do as we do, put the money out at interest and make the money earn.

Senator STERLING. Could he not buy a horse and wagon and use them on the farm, and thus make money?

MISS BEATTY. Yes; he can do anything of that sort; anything that will develop; anything that will not interfere with the product of somebody else. That is the whole idea. The two fundamental things.

are that no man shall eat who does not work and that no man shall exploit any other man.

Senator STERLING. He could not lend the money made on the farm to another man who wanted to borrow the money to equip his farm?

Miss BEATTY. I believe not.

Mr. HUMES. He could not invest the money in cattle?

Miss BEATTY. Oh, yes; I think he can.

Mr. HUMES. Have not all cattle been nationalized; and do not the laws of the soviet republic provide for the nationalization of cattle and stock?

Miss BEATTY. I do not know about that. That had not been done up to the time I left. I do not know whether that has been done since or not.

Senator OVERMAN. It was testified to by a lady who was the wife of a consul over there—or she has given me the idea—that the cattle were nationalized. She said that they took all of the cattle away from her mother, who was a widow. It seems that her mother had a fine breed of imported cattle—118 of them, I believe—and 100 horses. They took them all away from her mother and gave her a piece of land, and left, perhaps, one cow and one horse. It would seem their idea is to nationalize cattle and horses.

Miss BEATTY. Of course, their idea is as nearly as possible to equalize, pretty much, everywhere. I mean that it is their idea to bring people pretty much to the same level.

Senator STERLING. And in order to put them on the same level, they just reverse the order of things. They put the laborers and the peasants at the top.

Miss BEATTY. Practically that. They are lowering the 10 per cent and raising the level of the 90 per cent.

Senator NELSON. Do you favor that kind of socialism?

Miss BEATTY. That is also a very difficult question to answer. I favor some sort of system——

Senator NELSON. No, no. Do you favor this system of nationalizing land as the Russians do—as the Bolshevik government does?

Miss BEATTY. If that is a system——

Senator NELSON. Do not evade the question, now. Give us a categorical answer.

Miss BEATTY. Senator Nelson, you see black and white in very much more distinct terms than I do. I think the truth always lies between black and white, in the gray; and one can not say yes or no to things of that sort. I could not answer that question truthfully by saying either yes or no.

Senator NELSON. I have a suspicion, from the way in which you evade my question, that you are a good deal of a Russian socialist at heart.

Senator STERLING. You have described this nationalization of the land in that process and its results?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. I should think that you could answer yes or no to Senator Nelson's question as to whether or not you believe in it.

Miss BEATTY. I am perfectly willing—I would like to see an experiment of it. I do not know whether it will work or whether it will not work.

Senator STERLING. You believe in it enough to want to see it tried, do you?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; in Russia. By that I mean that that is what the Russian people—

Senator NELSON. Why do you have such evil wishes for the poor Russian people, that you would like to have this tried on them? Would you like to have it tried on the American people?

Miss BEATTY. No.

Senator NELSON. Why would you have the poor Russian people try something that you would not advise Americans to try?

Miss BEATTY. Because the Russians want it. As soon as the Americans want it, I shall be in favor of their trying it. I believe people have the right to have what they want.

Senator NELSON. Even brimstone?

Miss BEATTY. If they want it; yes. I think that that is the theory upon which our democratic government is based.

Senator OVERMAN. What becomes of the common loafer who gets the land and will not work it? What becomes of him?

Miss BEATTY. He can not live; because he has to eat, and he can not eat if he does not work. There is no room for the loafer at any end of the line in Russia. You have to work to eat.

Senator OVERMAN. He will starve unless he works the land?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. And under this Russian system they call those who have never worked before, who have not had to work because they have had the means, or because they occupied such stations in life that they did not have to work—they are, according to this Russian system; I mean the Trotsky and the Lenine system—the loafers, and they propose that they shall have nothing to eat unless they work?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; that is true.

Senator NELSON. They reverse the order of nature, then. The hoboos and the tramps are classed as capitalists over there, are they not?

Mr. HUMES. Miss Beatty, may I correct a statement that you made?

Miss BEATTY. Certainly. I should be very glad to have you do so.

Mr. HUMES. Senator Sterling asked you if it would not be possible for a man who had accumulated a thousand dollars to buy a horse or to buy stock. I want to call your attention to one of the provisions of the constitution of the soviet republic:

All forests, mineral wealth, waterpower and waterways, as well as all live stock and agricultural implements, are declared national property.

Is it not a fact under this scheme that no man can own a horse, no man can own a cow, no man can own live stock of any kind, or a plow or a harrow or anything else, but he simply has the use of the land itself, and he must negotiate with the state in order to secure the horse to work his farm and the plow to plow it, or the cattle for his domestic uses? Is not that a fact?

Miss BEATTY. Just one moment. You will recall that I said that I did not know whether the cattle had been nationalized or not, because that had happened after I left.

Mr. HUMES. But Senator Sterling asked you about buying a horse, and you said yes, that he could buy a horse. Now, horses are live stock, and if they have been nationalized the farmer could not have a horse.

Miss BEATTY. It is not a question of whether you can have it or not. You can have it without buying it, in Russia. You can have it by needing it. I mean it is for the common good of every one. With a man's labor he can buy or get—whether you call it buying or not, he can get—the things that he needs.

Mr. HUMES. Now we are getting down to the point that was inquired about. Under the application of this form of government in Russia, how does a man secure the live stock that is necessary to work his farm? How does he secure the cattle that are necessary in caring for his property, or in furnishing meat and provisions for his family, providing milk for his children? How is that handled under this system?

Miss BEATTY. Knowing what I know about the rest of the system, I should say that all those things become a part of the common fund.

Mr. HUMES. I gather that you are just speculating on that. You do not know how they are handling it.

Miss BEATTY. I told you that I am speculating. I say, judging by what I know of the rest of the things, I should say the distribution of farm implements, the use of farm implements and cattle and all that sort of thing, is handled in the same way that the use of land is—co-ownership. It can not be very different. That is the soviet ideal.

Senator OVERMAN. If a man needed an extra horse for his farm, how would he get it?

Miss BEATTY. I should think—remember, I have not been there in the last few months and can not tell you, but knowing what I know of the rest of the system, I should say—that he would go to the live stock committee and say, "I have six acres of wheat to plow to-morrow, and I need an extra horse," and he would get his extra horse.

Senator OVERMAN. In other words, he would get it from the state or the body that represents the state?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. That is, if the state agreed with him that he needed it.

Miss BEATTY. Oh, but you see he is the state.

Senator STERLING. And he determines, then, for himself?

Miss BEATTY. Yes. In every locality they work out every little problem in their councils or committees. I am afraid that I am not making it quite clear to you. You see, in each community they have so much live stock and so many farm implements. For instance, I know that in some communities they have tried to buy farm implements. They have all gotten together and decided that they need a reaper or a harvester, and they buy that for the community; and they work out how that shall be utilized, they work out their need for it. They decide that Jones needs it to-day and Smith can take it to-morrow, and so on.

Mr. HUMES. Is that under the soviet government?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; they have the local councils.

Mr. HUMES. Who pays for these implements? You say the community buys them. Is it paid for by popular subscription, or does the state buy it and pay for it?

Miss BEATTY. The soviet and the people of the community are one. The local council and the people of the community are one. The local soviet is a part of the national soviet, which is the whole state. It is just the perfectly simple old system of cooperation.

Senator OVERMAN. Let us trace it out. The community gets its implements somewhere. Where do they get them?

Miss BEATTY. When I was in Russia they were having a difficult time getting them anywhere. They were getting whatever they could from the International Harvester Co.

Senator OVERMAN. I am talking about the time when we would have no International Harvester Co.

Miss BEATTY. They put their money together. In one village I know of—I have forgotten the name——

Senator OVERMAN. How did they get the money?

Miss BEATTY. Oh, they still have money in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. In the future how are they going to get it; by taxation?

Miss BEATTY. I presume so. By some agreement or plan, and I suppose taxation will be the plan.

Senator OVERMAN. But suppose a man does not pay anything to it.

Miss BEATTY. Then he could not have the farm.

Senator OVERMAN. Suppose he can not get the farm; then he just dies by starvation, by action of the state.

Miss BEATTY. I should think so.

Senator NELSON. There is one thing that puzzles me. Let us say that there is a Russian peasant who sit down to milk a state cow. It is not his cow; it is a cow that is furnished to him by the state. Who owns the milk? Does that belong to the state?

Miss BEATTY. I am afraid, Senator Nelson, that you are facetious this morning?

Senator OVERMAN. We are going into this, and we want to find out how this thing works. I think you can see our attitude.

Miss BEATTY. Indeed, I am delighted, and I wish I could do more to inform you.

Senator STERLING. The more important question, Senator Nelson, is, Who gets the cream?

Senator NELSON. You have gone over this land question. What about the industries of the country? What is their plan? They are nationalizing all the factories and the industries of the country. That is, the state is to take them over. Is that the plan?

Miss BEATTY. That is their ideal. Lenine says that for the time being they will have to pass through a capitalistic period in which they will have to permit outside control of some of their industries. They say that is not an ideal thing; that it is not in accordance with their ultimate plan.

Senator OVERMAN. What is their plan?

Miss BEATTY. Their plan is complete nationalization of not only land but industry.

Senator NELSON. And that the workmen in these industries are to run and control them?

MISS BEATTY. Yes; but they have a broader interpretation of the term "workman" than we have. By workman they mean any man who works, either with his brain or with his brawn.

Senator NELSON. But they make a distinction in their food supply as between men who work with their hands and those who work with their brains. When they give them food cards, they make a distinction.

MISS BEATTY. That is true. They did that in the days of the Czar, and all through the war period.

Senator NELSON. And they do it now.

MISS BEATTY. They have always done that upon the basis that a man who works with his hands needs more food than a brain worker does.

Senator NELSON. And so he gets more food?

MISS BEATTY. Yes. It was true all the time I was in Russia. It was true during the war. Their food cards called for more bread for the laborer. And also in that time it should be remembered that bread was the chief source of food for the laborer. We, for instance, could buy caviar and all sorts of other things, but the laborer could not, and they figured that he was entitled to a larger amount of bread.

Senator NELSON. I do not care to go into the details of it, but I want to simply ask you this question: Did they not also have a scheme for nationalizing women, as they call it?

MISS BEATTY. I think I can tell you two or three things that will probably convince you that that is not true. One of the witnesses here, I believe, introduced a document purporting to have been passed by the anarchists' soviet of Saratov. At that time Mr. Jerome Davis, who was one of the Y. M. C. A. men in Saratov, went to the anarchist soviet and asked whether they had passed that decree. They flatly denied it, and posted proclamations denying they had passed it. The anarchist soviet and the Bolshevik soviet were at war, and the anarchist soviets were afterwards put down by machine guns by the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. Now you have brought in a new distinction.

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. You speak of the Bolsheviks and the anarchists.

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. There are two elements of these socialists?

MISS BEATTY. There are many elements; about 40 in all.

Senator NELSON. I mean of the Bolsheviks. There is the anarchistic element and another element?

MISS BEATTY. No. The philosophy of the anarchists and the philosophy of the Bolsheviks are very different. The anarchist does not believe in government at all. The Bolsheviks believe in a highly socialized form of government.

But to get on, to this decree. One of the Russian papers, an official organ, published a statement relating to the decree or order of the soviet government suppressing for all time, and charging a fine of 25,000 rubles against, a newspaper which had published what they called this false decree—this outrageous and shameful false decree, as the Russian translation is. Those two things, I think, ought to help to indicate that that is not a general thing in Russia. I personally do not believe it was issued, and neither does Mr. Davis, who was there. One other reason for not believing it is that women have a vote in Russia, and I do not believe that women anywhere will vote to nationalize themselves.

Mr. HUMES. You say that Sartov decree was never issued by this anarchistic soviet?

Miss BEATTY. I say they deny ever having issued it.

Mr. HUMES. Either Mr. Williams or Mr. Reed testified the other day, stating that it had been issued, but only the first four paragraphs were a part of the original decree and the rest was obscene matter that had been subsequently added with the intent of adding some humor to the situation.

Miss BEATTY. I do not know as to that.

Mr. HUMES. Are you correct in saying that it never was issued, or is the former witness correct in saying that only the first four paragraphs were really a part of the decree?

Miss BEATTY. I am correct in quoting Mr. Davis to the effect that it never was issued. Mr. Davis said that he went to the anarchist soviet in Saratov. They were very indignant, and they flatly denied issuing that decree and posted that denial all over the city.

Mr. HUMES. What do you know about the decree that was issued at Vladimir?

Miss BEATTY. Personally, nothing; except that I can judge the attitude of the soviet authorities to such decrees by the suppression of this newspaper.

Mr. HUMES. In that same connection, what do you know about the nationalization of children, or the taking over by the state of children of certain ages, for the purposes of education?

Miss BEATTY. I know that when I talked to Alexandra Kollontay, who is commissar of public welfare, she told me a great deal, at length, as to what her social program was, and there was nothing of that sort in that program. Her idea was that an orphanage was a bad place in which to keep children, and that it was best to get them away from that sort of control. In order to make it possible for women to keep their own children, they formulated a plan by which a mother should have eight weeks of liberty from her factory position previous to the birth of her child and immediately after.

Mr. HUMES. That is in order to encourage woman labor; in order to protect and encourage woman labor in the factories?

Miss BEATTY. No; these are the women who always had to work, just as our women here work in factories, whether they have children or not. This was to protect the woman from hurting herself before and after the birth of her child.

Mr. HUMES. Is it true that this Madam Kollontay married the man whom she did marry, and with whom she went to the Scandinavian countries, because of these regulations or requirements for the nationalization of women and compulsory marriage?

Miss BEATTY. I am quite sure that she never did anything under compulsion.

Mr. HUMES. I mean that she went there to avoid the compulsion that was incident to the enforcement of the decree.

Miss BEATTY. I should say that that was absolutely untrue. I was present at Smolny at the soviet when the marriage decree was passed, and I heard the discussion of it.

Mr. HUMES. What is the marriage decree? What is the ceremony?

Miss BEATTY. It provided separation of the church and state. Up to the time of the revolution the church marriage was essential in Russia. The soviet decree advocated that church marriages should be optional. One could marry in the church or not as one chose, but the state marriage was obligatory.

Mr. HUMES. How is it performed?

Miss BEATTY. By going before a marriage commissioner, or what would be in this country a justice of the peace, and registering your desire to be married—in other words, by taking out a license. At that time there was considerable discussion upon how many divorces should be granted.

Senator NELSON. You speak of taking out a license. Was it a license generally or a license to marry some particular person?

Miss BEATTY. The two people who were to be married went to the marriage commissioner and took out a license for their own marriage, just as we do here.

Senator OVERMAN. How could they separate?

Miss BEATTY. They could separate by going before a marriage and divorce commission and declaring their desire to separate, saying that they no longer wished to be married.

Mr. HUMES. Can not either one of the parties to the marriage secure a divorce?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; either one can.

Mr. HUMES. By agreement; or either one of the parties can secure a divorce on application?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. If they get tired of one another, they can just quit?

Miss BEATTY. Yes. They also formulated a plan as to what should become of the children. Unless there was a common agreement as to who should support the child, made outside of court or commission, alimony was granted to the mother in such sum as the judge believed was necessary.

Mr. HUMES. For the support of the child?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Was that alimony paid by the state or by the father?

Miss BEATTY. By the father, as it was planned then.

Senator NELSON. Were you out in the country among the peasants while you were in Russia?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; a little bit. Not as much as I would like to have been.

Senator NELSON. What was the form of the peasants' government before the revolution broke out?

Miss BEATTY. There really was no peasant government, you know. I mean there was none in Russia but the Czar's government, really. The zemstvos had a certain amount of control, and there were the cooperative societies.

Senator NELSON. Do you not know, now, that the peasants were settled in villages and communities called mirs, and had their local government, and that their lands were owned as community property, and that those mirs assigned the cultivation of the lands to members of the community?

MISS BEATTY. That is true in some communities; not in all communities.

Senator NELSON. No.

MISS BEATTY. That was quite the generally adopted custom, however, among the Russians.

Senator NELSON. They live in villages and not out on their farms, as they do here?

MISS BEATTY. No; they live in villages and go out to work on their farms.

Senator NELSON. And those lands belonged to the mirs, as they called them, the village communities?

MISS BEATTY. Not altogether. In some places the lands were privately owned.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

MISS BEATTY. You see, up to the time of the freeing of the serfs, the peasants had no ownership in their own land, and they worked the land of the estates. They were given the use of a certain amount of land in return for the service that they gave to the landowner—to the estate holder or to the slave owner. At the time of the decree which freed the serfs, the peasants believed they were going to get the land. They have a phrase over there, they say that the land is God's and the people's, and they believed that the Czar gave them the land, but the landowners kept it away from them. That made them very bitter toward the landowners. They began, back in the seventies, to burn barns and destroy property. When the revolution came, the attitude of these men was merely that they were taking something which belonged to them, something which Alexander had given them long, long ago, but which the landlords had kept from them.

Senator NELSON. What they got under the Czar's government when they were set free, the land that was assigned to the village communities, is confiscated by this new government and taken away. It does not belong to the community but it belongs to the state, now; and the whole system of the mir assigning lands to the members of a community will be obsolete now, under this government, will it not?

MISS BEATTY. No. In some places they do just as they have always done. The present land law of the soviet was formed from a codification of the land regulations made by the peasants themselves in something like 240 villages. In nearly 240 villages the peasants had already taken their land during the Kerensky régime. They had not waited for the government to do anything about it. They had said, "The land is ours, and we are going to have it," and they took it without any formal national land law. These methods used in the various communities were gone over, and a new law was passed upon plans that the peasants themselves had worked out.

Senator NELSON. Under this new system of nationalized land, the land will be taken from these communities, will it not, as community property, and also from private owners, and it will all become the property of the state? It makes no difference whether it is community or private property—individual property—it will become the property of the state?

MISS BEATTY. Yes; but, you see, the community and the state are one.

Senator NELSON. Oh, there is a great difference between saying that this ground here, between this building and the Union Station, belongs to the city of Washington, and saying that it belongs to the Government of the United States. There is a great difference in that.

Miss BEATTY. Yes; there is a difference here, but there is not a difference in Russia.

Senator NELSON. No; I perceive. I perceive there is not much difference in Russia.

Miss BEATTY. Perhaps our telegraph system here or our mail system will serve a little bit better to illustrate it. You see, our mail system belongs to the Government, and yet it belongs to each of us as individual members of the state. We all share in it.

Senator NELSON. Yes. Now, what is to become of all the people who do not themselves work on the land, and what is to become of people who do not work in the factories or in the industrial enterprises? What is to become of them in Russia?

Miss BEATTY. Everyone in Russia has to work; not on the land or in the factories, necessarily, but they have to make some contribution; they have to produce something.

Senator NELSON. Their theory is that everybody must work?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Work at what?

Miss BEATTY. At anything which is productive for the good of the nation.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Miss BEATTY. You see, they contemplate not only organizing distribution, but also production.

Senator NELSON. The farmer has no right now to hire any help?

Miss BEATTY. No.

Senator NELSON. He can not hire any hands on his farm?

Miss BEATTY. No.

Senator NELSON. And a woman can not hire anybody to help her milk the cows or do any of her work?

Miss BEATTY. No; but any number of farmers can combine and work their land in common, which is the same thing. Any number of men can till their land in common.

Senator NELSON. There is no room, then, in Russia for a farm laborer unless he has a piece of land to till himself?

Miss BEATTY. No; none at all.

Senator NELSON. No one can have a hired man on his farm?

Miss BEATTY. No; there are no hired men.

Senator OVERMAN. There are no hired women, either?

Miss BEATTY. No.

Senator OVERMAN. Suppose the community will not help a man to till his land? Suppose the community will not help a woman milk her cow?

Mr. HUMES. The state owns the cow. The woman does not have the cow.

Senator OVERMAN. The cow that the state lets her use when she wants to use it. Suppose she can not get anybody to help to milk the cow or to make the butter, or do other work, when she is not well, for instance? How is she going to do that?

Miss BEATTY. You gentlemen make it very difficult. [Laughing.] This is the A B C of economics, upon which dozens and dozens of books have been written.

Senator NELSON. As I understand, your mental state is this—see if I misapprehend you: While you are not clear that this form of government would be good for our people, you have an idea that it is just the thing for the Russian people?

Miss BEATTY. That is not entirely the fact.

Senator NELSON. Can you qualify it?

Miss BEATTY. I should like to.

Senator NELSON. With limitations?

Miss BEATTY. I feel that the Russian people have the right to work out any sort of system that they choose. I think that they have demonstrated that they want to try to work out this system. Of course, we have the right to work out any kind of system that we choose, and if we ever want to work out any other system than that we have, we will do it; and we, as democrats, have got to allow to Russia or any other country the right to work out its own problems according to its own ideals. And the ideals of America and the ideals of Russia are different. We are entitled to our ideas, and Russia is entitled to her ideas.

Senator NELSON. And you think that the ideal of the Bolshevik government is what the Russian people want?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Yes; and they ought to have it?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That is your idea?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. It has been testified here by various persons, and I see from the papers, that there are only about 5 or 10 per cent of these people that favor the Bolshevik plan, and therefore, if that is so, you would not be in favor of this system for Russia?

Miss BEATTY. No; absolutely not. You see, I do not believe that that is so, for a number of reasons. Harold Williams, who was correspondent of the London Times and is a very conservative man as to figures—I mean, I do not think that he could be swept off of his feet to believe that the Bolsheviks were in control of Russia unless they were—said, some months ago, that the Bolshevik movement has completely swept the country.

Senator OVERMAN. Right there; they all testify that they have control of the government, but that they have it by reason of German soldiers and Lettish soldiers, and tramps and criminals; that they have freed every criminal in Russia, and that all the criminals are members of the Bolsheviks; and they have the reign of terror there, by which the peasants are overawed and terrified.

Miss BEATTY. Do you think that a million or two or three million could dominate and overawe one hundred and eighty million people?

Senator OVERMAN. I thought of that, too; but they say that they have taken their guns and all their arms away from them, and they shoot them down on the farms, and in the villages, in the streets, if they resent the Bolshevik idea. Of course, by having all the guns and ammunition, and with the army, they can do that for a time; and it has been testified that that is what they are doing, and that the people themselves are not in favor of it.

MISS BEATTY. I would like to give you a little more evidence of the fact that the people themselves are in favor. I had a long talk with Tchaikowsky. He told me how he had tried to work with the workmen's and soldiers' council, but left them after three weeks' time. Then he organized the first congress of peasants; and the peasants finally all went to the left, leaving him and his committee alone. He said they had gone past him in their ideas. And he, too, told me that Bolshevism had completely swept the country. He said, "We can not do anything with them. We can not keep them in control at all. Every time we send a delegate back to the village we find that the villagers have gone over to the Bolsheviks."

MR. HUMES. It has been testified that the Bolsheviks go in and select anybody they want to, and take them out and kill them.

MISS BEATTY. Has it been testified by anybody that they ever saw anybody killed?

MR. HUMES. Many cases have been specified and testified to—many specific instances.

MISS BEATTY. Where they saw these things?

MR. HUMES. Yes.

SENATOR NELSON. Did you see anybody killed over there?

MISS BEATTY. No; I never saw anybody killed. I was in the midst of machine-gun fire many times.

SENATOR NELSON. The machine guns did not go off while you were there, then?

MISS BEATTY. Oh, yes. I saw one man wounded. I was under siege in the telephone exchange for five hours at one time, and I saw a man there wounded.

SENATOR NELSON. European Russia is about as big as the United States?

MISS BEATTY. Russia is one-sixth of the whole earth's surface.

SENATOR NELSON. No; but European Russia is about as big as the United States?

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

SENATOR NELSON. Now, where did you go in Russia? You were at Petrograd, at Moscow, and at Nijni Novgorod. What other places did you go to?

MISS BEATTY. I wish I had a map so that I could show you. I went across Siberia—

SENATOR NELSON. Oh, yes; but Siberia is not European Russia.

MISS BEATTY. You see, I also went across European Russia to get to Petrograd.

SENATOR NELSON. You went from Perm, over there in Siberian Russia?

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

SENATOR NELSON. That is all.

MISS BEATTY. Yes.

SENATOR NELSON. Is not most of the peasant country south of that?

MISS BEATTY. I did not go into the Ukraine at all.

SENATOR NELSON. Did you go into Little Russia?

MISS BEATTY. That is the Ukraine, you know.

Senator NELSON. Did you go into White Russia?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; I went into White Russia.

Senator NELSON. What part?

Miss BEATTY. It was in White Russia where I went to the western front.

Senator NELSON. You went out to the battle front at Dvinsk?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; and Maladetschna.

Senator NELSON. How long did you stay there?

Miss BEATTY. Two weeks.

Senator NELSON. Did you communicate with the peasants or the soldiers?

Miss BEATTY. Both.

Senator NELSON. In that country?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Is that all you saw of Russia—those places?

Miss BEATTY. I went down to Nijni Novgorod and up the Volga River and stopped at Yaroslav.

Senator NELSON. Did you come across any Cossacks there?

Miss BEATTY. I came across Cossacks there.

Senator NELSON. Do you not know that the land tenure of the Cossacks is different from that of the other lands?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Do you not know that they have lands assigned to them in fee for military service?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; I do know that.

Senator NELSON. Look here; suppose you were a stranger dropped down here from the clouds, from Europe, and that you came over here and visited New York, Hoboken, Philadelphia, and Washington. What would you know about the American people from just seeing these towns? What would you know about the American people and the feeling of the American people, and of the American farmers in the Mississippi Valley, by visiting just those two or three towns?

Miss BEATTY. But, you see, you do not quite understand the geography of Russia, or you would see that I covered a great deal more ground than you think. But the thing that I feel is the difficulty with so many people who are witnessing on the question of Russia is that they have never come into the slightest contact with what is the most important thing there. I mean, most of them have never even met a Bolshevik.

Senator NELSON. You saw a live Bolshevik, then?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; I spent a great deal of time at the soviets.

Mr. HUMES. I thought that practically all of the 180,000,000 people of Russia were Bolsheviks. I thought that was the statement that you contended for, that the vast majority of the people were Bolsheviks, so that you could not go anywhere without meeting a Bolshevik.

Miss BEATTY. You know, you can spend your time entirely in the American colony in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. Yes; but there were quite a number of Bolsheviks there, were there not? How many of those that you might term of the American colony, that came from America, were members of the government, or were in part of the Bolshevik government, in Russia?

Miss BEATTY. There were only two men whom I know who took any part in the Bolshevik government in Russia, and the only part that they took was in German propaganda. They went in there to try to create German propaganda to help dethrone the Kaiser.

Mr. HUMES. Who was that?

Miss BEATTY. John Reed and Albert Rhys Williams.

Mr. HUMES. Did you ever meet Mr. Reinstein over there?

Miss BEATTY. Yes. I was thinking of men who had been born in America. He was a Russian.

Mr. HUMES. He was an American citizen, was he not?

Miss BEATTY. I was thinking of American-born.

Mr. HUMES. I am talking about the people who got their education and training, such as it was, in this country.

Miss BEATTY. I was thinking of men whom I had met at dinners and dances.

Mr. HUMES. Then, by the American colony you do not mean the Americans—

Miss BEATTY. Not the Russian-Americans.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that there were more Americans who were part of the Bolshevik government than you have testified as part of the American colony?

Senator OVERMAN. Miss Beatty has kindly consented to give her testimony. I understand from her own testimony that she was there only eight months. There is no use in asking her about these places where she has not gone. It is impossible for her to know about these places which she has not visited.

I want to know if there is any statement that she wants to make, and I will allow her to make it.

It is evident to my mind, and I think the committee agrees, that she is not sufficiently informed, having been there only eight months, a certain time in Petrograd, a certain time on the front, and a short time in Moscow, and it is impossible for her to know the conditions over there now—as they exist to-day.

Miss BEATTY. It is impossible, except as one knows what the forces are that are at work.

Senator OVERMAN. That is your viewpoint, and what you have gathered from the newspapers since you have been there.

Miss BEATTY. It is impossible except from what I have learned from Russian papers and from people who have returned, and from what I know of the people whom I met there, and the forces at work. No little incident that happens from day to day is the important thing, Senator Overman. I mean, if we are to understand the subject of the Bolsheviks, we need to know what has happened all these years in Russia much more than the number of people killed. The important thing in the European war was not how many people were killed but what were the causes behind it.

Senator OVERMAN. We want to know what is going on there—the condition of the people. That is what we are more interested in.

Senator NELSON. You only gave us what you have picked up from newspapers and from interviewing those American Bolsheviks that you have referred to over in Russia?

Miss BEATTY. No; you are entirely wrong.

Senator NELSON. You do not know anything of your own knowledge, and you were not there when the reign of terror broke out?

Miss BEATTY. You are entirely wrong when you say I do not know anything of my own knowledge, because I do. I was in the soviet night after night.

Senator OVERMAN. The point I make is this, if I may interrupt you, that you can not possibly know what the sentiment of the people now is, except of the 5 per cent or 10 per cent of the Bolsheviki, because sentiment could be changed over night. It is impossible for you to know what the public sentiment is there now.

Miss BEATTY. Yes; that is true, Senator Overman, except to judge things of the present by the past. I was there at the time of the Korniloff revolt. In American newspapers it was stated that the streets ran rivers of blood, whereas one single officer was killed, and he shot himself.

Senator STERLING. On what occasion?

Miss BEATTY. The Korniloff revolt, when Korniloff tried to become dictator of Russia. So, I say, if the reports then were so very much exaggerated, then it is not at all unlikely that they are exaggerated now.

Senator STERLING. Miss Beatty, witnesses have testified here. I recall one in particular, who had been in two different Russian prisons under the Bolshevik government. He testified that day after day Red Guards would come in, members of the Red Guard, and march out a man to be shot. Do you discredit that?

Miss BEATTY. I do not know whether that is true or not. I think it is not at all unlikely, for this reason—

Senator STERLING. You say it is not at all unlikely?

Miss BEATTY. Yes; for this reason. I was reading in one of the Russian papers a dispatch concerning conditions in one of the villages. The dispatch was to the effect that the White Guards took the village in the evening and sentenced something like 26 members of the soviet to die, and executed them on the spot. They sentenced 150 more to die the next day. The next morning the Red Guards came in and recaptured the village and executed the White Guards.

Senator STERLING. You show a disposition, I must confess, to shield the Red Guards of the Bolsheviki. Now you are saying that the Red Guards are no worse than the White Guards; and you have excused the Red Guards for some of their atrocities by telling what the White Guards had done.

Miss BEATTY. You understand that everything is logical, that nothing happens without a cause.

Senator STERLING. We are talking about the manifestations, the evidences that we have, of atrocities. You think that the evidence of the atrocities amounts to little; that it is just immaterial. You want to philosophize, and you want to go to causes always—

Miss BEATTY. Do you not, Senator?

Senator STERLING. Are we not justified in tracing the relation between the atrocities, these outward manifestations, these murders and this starvation, to the spirit that is behind and that goes to the cause?

Miss BEATTY. You are justified if you are going to start way back in the past. That is the thing. I have been doing that. There are many witnesses who have come here. One of them left Russia some months before I left. Even before the Bolshevik revolution these men testified to what they had heard. They told stories that I knew to be discredited when I was in Russia. But they are telling the same stories here that were told when I was there. What I contend is that you do not want to try to get at the truth by that sort of thing.

Senator OVERMAN. You speak of people who left there before you did. However, we have had witnesses—witness after witness—here who left a long time after you did. They corroborate those things, and make them worse, and they were eyewitnesses to the things, not speaking from hearsay testimony.

Miss BEATTY. Perhaps all the evidence has not been published in the newspapers, but most of the things that I have read in the newspapers have been hearsay evidence; and I know I have read things that were told over there that were proved not to be true.

Senator OVERMAN. Is not the evidence that you are giving us hearsay?

Miss BEATTY. Not at all.

Senator OVERMAN. But you do not know conditions since you left, except what you have gathered from the newspapers?

Miss BEATTY. I do not offer that as my own evidence.

Senator NELSON. What else have you told us except that?

Miss BEATTY. I think the fact that I am here, quite safe, after eight months in Russia, is a slight evidence of the fact that things can not be quite as terrible as has been reported.

Senator OVERMAN. Let me say, with respect, that what you have said is hearsay and argumentative. Is not that true?

Miss BEATTY. I am sorry if I am argumentative.

Senator OVERMAN. You are fine in that line.

Senator NELSON. Are you directly or indirectly connected with the Bolshevik propaganda that is carried on under the auspices of Williams and these other men?

Miss BEATTY. I am not.

Senator STERLING. Do you know Lenine?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Did you meet him?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Talk with him?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. And Trotsky?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Talked with both of them?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Have gotten their viewpoint?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator STERLING. How well acquainted were you with them?

Miss BEATTY. Not very well.

Senator STERLING. You had frequent interviews with them?

Miss BEATTY. Enough to get their viewpoint.

Senator NELSON. And you agree mainly in their viewpoint?

Miss BEATTY. No; not entirely. I disagree very much. I do not approve of suppression of the press, suppression of free speech, and many other things which the Bolsheviks have done.

Senator NELSON. In the main, you think they are on the right track?

Miss BEATTY. All that I am, and all that I will permit you to say that I am, is a student of affairs in Russia. I am deeply interested in affairs in Russia, and I could not have found out anything about Russia if I had not gone to the soviets and met Lenine and Trotsky. They are the men in control of that country, and I was interested in knowing what their plans are.

Senator OVERMAN. They told you what their plans were and what they were proposing to do; and yet it has been asserted that they have not carried out all their glorious promises.

Miss BEATTY. I will say that they have not put into effect the system in which they believed.

Senator NELSON. Is not your purpose in appearing before this committee to sort of justify the Bolshevik government before our people?

Miss BEATTY. Not at all. My feeling is this, that I think we have no right to intervene in Russia, and I want very much to have the American troops brought out of Russia. I want to let Russia alone.

Senator NELSON. In other words, you want the Bolsheviki, or Lenine and Trotsky, to have a free hand there. That is what you want, is it not?

Miss BEATTY. If you prefer your words to mine, Senator Nelson.

Senator NELSON. I have not been able to get a direct answer from you on anything.

Mr. HUMES. The fact remains that the press is suppressed, does it not?

Miss BEATTY. In a measure; yes. At least it was when I was there.

Mr. HUMES. And free speech is not permitted?

Miss BEATTY. In a measure that is true.

Mr. HUMES. And the constituent assembly has never been permitted to meet?

Miss BEATTY. It met, but was dissolved.

Mr. HUMES. By force?

Miss BEATTY. The leaders were told to go home.

Mr. HUMES. By force?

Miss BEATTY. I would say by force. No force was used, because it was not necessary. They were told to go home.

Mr. HUMES. But armed guards came to advise them to go?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. They were under duress, in other words?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Therefore the Bolsheviki have suppressed the press and prohibited free speech, refused to permit the people to determine the form of government that they would have under the regularly elected constituent assembly, and since that time there has been no effort made to give the people a voice in the government through a constituent assembly?

Miss BEATTY. Not through a constituent assembly. You see, they no longer believe in the constituent assembly as a form of government.

Mr. HUMES. In other words, they are opposed to equal representation of the people?

MISS BEATTY. They are opposed to representation based upon political control.

MR. HUMES. In other words, the Bolshevik government is not free to permit the 80 per cent of the people of Russia, to wit, the peasants, to participate in the affairs of the government equally with the other people, because they know that the peasants would not permit Bolshevik rule to long continue. Is not that so?

MISS BEATTY. I do not think so. I think that is not a fact. I think if you had been in Russia you would know that it is not.

MR. HUMES. Why did they not give the peasants equal representation in the government?

MISS BEATTY. When the peasants joined the national soviet I was present. In that body the peasants won every point. They got all their demands. At first Lenine and Trotsky stood out against these demands, but ultimately the peasants were admitted to the national soviet under their own terms.

MR. HUMES. But the fact remains that the representation is five to one against them in the all-Russian soviet or the all-Russian council, is it not?

MISS BEATTY. I do not know.

MR. HUMES. Do you not know what the basis of representation is?

MISS BEATTY. No.

MR. HUMES. Have you ever read the constitution of the soviet republic?

MISS BEATTY. No; I have not.

Senator OVERMAN. Miss Beatty, we have examined you thoroughly—about all we want—and I want to give you the free opportunity to state anything you want to state. If you desire to make any statement in addition to what you have said in response to our questions, if you desire to make any statement to the subcommittee, you may feel free to go on without interruption.

MISS BEATTY. I do not know that I have a great deal to say to the committee, except that I wish we might make an honest, open investigation of this subject, because I think it is so serious we can't afford to be bigoted. It is a pity that I have to argue here. I do not want to argue.

Senator OVERMAN. That is the reason we sent for you to come down. You represent what some have referred to as the other side.

MISS BEATTY. I do not admit that it is a question of side. In a sense I do not represent the other side. One member of the other side will not even speak on the platform with me because he says I am a bourgeois. So you see I am not a partisan in this thing.

Senator STERLING. If you will permit me, does not that position of the person of whom you speak illustrate the fatal defects in the Bolshevik system?

MISS BEATTY. Well, that is an individual defect. There are many revolutionists who are very disagreeable people. But there are many of us in all walks of life who are very disagreeable.

Senator OVERMAN. I do not want the gentlemen here to ask her any questions until she has had an opportunity to make a full statement. If you do not represent the other side, or what people have called the other side, they have asked to have you here, and we take great pleasure in having you here to make any statement that you desire, without interruption. Of course, we might have to interrupt if you should go outside of what we think is proper, but I know you will not do that.

MISS BEATTY. Senator Overman, I want to say that during my eight months in Russia I met a number of men, some of whom have testified here. Some of those who have testified here know nothing about the masses of the Russian people. I met them at dinners and I met them at dances, but I never met them anywhere where the masses of the people were gathered.

Senator OVERMAN. And you did not expect to meet them?

MISS BEATTY. No; absolutely not. I only want to say that we should try to know—we can not know, but we should try to understand—what the Russian people are thinking, what they are driving at, what are the ideals that actuate them.

I personally spent just as much time with one group as with another. I had friends among princes and friends among peasants and workers. Up to August, 1917, I had never met a Bolshevik. One day I heard something about one which made me think that he must be honest and an idealist, and I asked to meet him. I became convinced that he was honest and an idealist, and I asked to meet more and more of them.

When I went to Russia I was in favor of the Kerensky government. I thought Kerensky was the man who could best amalgamate the Russian forces and could best help to win the war, and I was deeply disappointed that he had to be overthrown. I believed that he was going to be, because everywhere I went I found evidences of this. For instance, I went to Helsingfors and visited the central committee of the Baltic fleet. Up to the time of the Korniloff revolt there were 18 Bolshevik members and no anarchists in this committee. But a little after that there were 45 Bolshevik members and 3 anarchists in a total membership of 60. This was before the Bolshevik revolution, you see, and it seemed to me that this was an indication of the movement of the masses. They were sweeping away from Kerensky; and at the time of the Kerensky revolution America was practically the only country standing by him. The Russian masses had deserted him, and the other allies were trying to place Savanikof in power. Kerensky was quite alone. It seemed there was nothing to uphold his power. I wished that he might have been backed, because I thought he would work out an orderly government.

Then there was this soviet. I said, "This is a fact. You can not know the Russian situation without knowing the facts, and the soviet is a fact." I tried to find out what its power and force was. For a time I did some work with the Red Cross, and I prolonged my stay in Russia for that purpose longer than I had intended, to try to find out what people were thinking. I was out among the crowds, with interpreters, day and night.

Senator OVERMAN. You do not speak Russian?

MISS BEATTY. Just a little; not as you have to speak Russian to get along. But I did feel that they were misrepresenting things even at that time, over there. Being a newspaper woman, I knew how news is made, and it is very difficult to get at the facts. For instance, in Petrograd it was reported that there was a riot down in the Caucasus and that thousands of people were killed. A week later some one who was there reported that this was not true. But denials were never wired.

There undoubtedly is red terror in Russia, and it must be frightful; but I think it material that we should know what are its causes as well as its effects—what it is—do you see? And I feel that we can never work out any solution that will avoid trouble in this country or any other country in the world unless we face all the facts; unless we will see what the working people want and what can be done to give them what they need—what they must have. There will be clashes that will mean disruption and disillusionment and terror for all of us. I think that if you note the quantity of space the newspapers are giving to this whole question of economic unrest, you will feel that it is a most important thing which you are now investigating. I do not think that a committee could be faced with a more difficult task or have a greater reason for analyzing testimony, for hearing every witness, and getting all the facts.

I admit and claim that having come away from Russia a year ago I can not know all that is going on. But I do claim that I can better judge what is going on there than people who never have been there, because I was closely associated with the working people and know perhaps better how they will react to certain things than I would know if I had never got close to them.

I do not think I have anything else to add.

Senator OVERMAN. We are very much obliged to you. But I would like to know one thing. We are glad to have you here, and we asked the Senate to continue these hearings so that the other side might be heard, because we want to get the truth, as you say. But I want to ask you what is the extent of this menace, as I would call it, of bolshevik propaganda in this country? What do you know about it? Is there any such thing? Do you think there is such a thing going on as trying to get our people to adopt the methods of the Bolsheviks?

Miss BEATTY. I think there is a great movement on the part of the masses of the workers in many of the cities to bring about such a thing as that. I do not believe there is any very extensive amount of propaganda done to create that situation. I know there is a man here, a Finn—an American-Finn—who is conducting a bureau of information, of Russian information, who is getting out a bulletin.

Senator NELSON. What is his name?

Miss BEATTY. Mr. Nuorteva.

Senator NELSON. Where is he located?

Miss BEATTY. In New York.

Senator NELSON. Headquarters there?

Miss BEATTY. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Whom has he cooperating with him?

Miss BEATTY. I do not know.

Senator OVERMAN. It is shown here that we have a great many bulletins—papers of all kinds. Do you know how they get the money to print them? Do you have any idea, of your own knowledge, how they get the funds?

Miss BEATTY. I do not believe there are any funds to amount to anything. The people whom I know, who have been speaking in favor of the soviet government, are all poor and have not any money.

Senator OVERMAN. It takes money to do this.

Miss BEATTY. That is why I say I do not believe there is any very extensive propaganda in this country.

Mr. HUMES. Do you now know that Nuorteva is receiving money from Russia and Finland?

Miss BEATTY. I heard that he received one check from Russia, but that is all I know about.

Mr. HUMES. Do you not know that the Russian government made an appropriation for the purpose of undertaking to interfere politically in the affairs of other countries than their own, and doing a thing that you say this country ought not to do in Russia?

Miss BEATTY. I know that there was an appropriation of 2,000,000 rubles for foreign propaganda.

Senator OVERMAN. We are very much obliged to you, Miss Beatty.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Keddie.

TESTIMONY OF MR. FRANK KEDDIE.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Senator OVERMAN. Your name is Frank Keddie?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. How old are you?

Mr. KEDDIE. Thirty years.

Senator OVERMAN. Are you an American?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I am Scotch.

Mr. HUMES. Where do you reside?

Mr. KEDDIE. Edinburgh.

Mr. HUMES. How long have you been in this country?

Mr. KEDDIE. I have just come. I have been here about six weeks, I think, from the end of January when I arrived in Seattle.

Mr. HUMES. Is this the first time you have ever been in this country?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. What organization were you connected with in Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. The Society of Friends. I was working with the Society of Friends in Russia. I have been there since the fall of 1916 and left last December.

Mr. HUMES. Were you the representative of the American Society of Friends?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; we were working together.

Mr. HUMES. How did you happen to come to this country instead of going home?

Mr. KEDDIE. Because I had business to do in Vladivostok; and of course I could have gone from Shanghai around by Marseilles, but I wanted to come this way.

Mr. HUMES. You are just in this country on your way back?

Mr. KEDDIE. I am on my way home.

Mr. HUMES. During what period of time were you in Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. From the autumn of 1916 until December. I left Vladivostok last December.

Mr. HUMES. When did you leave European Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. In October, last.

Mr. HUMES. What part of European Russia were you in during the time that you were in Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. Well, I was in charge, most of the time, of the industrial unit work. We had a unit of about 36 people. I was in charge of the industrial end of it. In the course of my work I traveled about a good deal. I stayed in Petrograd and in Moscow, Nijni Novogorod, Samara, and I have stayed in Omsk, in Irkutsk, Harbin, and Vladivostok. I had a year's lessons in the language before I went to Russia, and I can speak Russian fairly well.

Mr. HUMES. Where were you at the time of the March revolution?

Mr. KEDDIE. In the town of Samara on the Volga.

Mr. HUMES. Where were you at the time of the Bolshevik revolution in November?

Mr. KEDDIE. I was down on the way to the town of Uralsk, in the Cossack country district of Uralsk.

Mr. HUMES. You were back in Petrograd after that time?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. When did you go back to Petrograd?

Mr. KEDDIE. I was there at the time of the peace parley at Brest-Litovsk. That was about the beginning of the year 1918.

Senator OVERMAN. What were you doing over there?

Mr. KEDDIE. With the Society of Friends, doing relief work among the refugees. When the German troops advanced into Poland, there were something like seven million refugees scattered over Russia. The Russians had no organization to take care of them.

Senator NELSON. What organization?

Mr. KEDDIE. The English Society of Friends. They are Quakers.

Mr. HUMES. For how long a period of time were you in Petrograd after the Bolshevik revolution?

Mr. KEDDIE. I stayed there about three weeks.

Mr. HUMES. About three weeks?

Mr. KEDDIE. About three weeks.

Mr. HUMES. That would be in January, 1918?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; about that time.

Mr. HUMES. Was that the last time you were in Petrograd?

Mr. KEDDIE. The last time I was in Petrograd.

Mr. HUMES. Were did you go from Petrograd at that time?

Mr. KEDDIE. I went down to Moscow.

Mr. HUMES. How long were you in Moscow?

Mr. KEDDIE. About the same period; perhaps a little longer; a month about. I have been in Moscow a few times, but this particular occasion for about a month.

Mr. HUMES. Where did you go from there?

Mr. KEDDIE. Back to Omsk in Siberia.

Mr. HUMES. Back into Siberia?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. How long were you in Siberia?

Mr. KEDDIE. Perhaps it would be more useful if I stated exactly how it happened.

Mr. HUMES. No; I just wanted to locate you during this period of time, first. How long were you in Siberia?

Mr. KEDDIE. Well, I have been there, back and forwards, several times. I stayed there perhaps in all about two months.

Mr. HUMES. About two months?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; in all.

Mr. HUMES. How much of the time since you went to Moscow have you been back to European Russia on these trips that you have made?

Mr. KEDDIE. The bulk of my experience is drawn from the Samara government. I stayed there in that particular government longer than in any other one place.

Mr. HUMES. The Samara government?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. You have little knowledge of the conditions in Moscow and Petrograd after February and March, 1918, from your personal observation?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes. The bulk of my experience is drawn from the peasants.

Mr. HUMES. Now, what was the situation in Petrograd during the two or three weeks that you spent there in January, 1918, during the peace conference?

Mr. KEDDIE. The situation was rather bad, and the food question was very bad and the people were very divided as regards making peace—a separate peace—with Germany. The real people of Russia have all the time, I think, been just as anti-Prussian as any other people.

Senator NELSON. What was this last statement?

Mr. KEDDIE. The Russian people have been anti-Prussian all the time, and antimilitaristic.

Senator NELSON. Anti-German?

Mr. KEDDIE. Anti-German. They were not against the German working people, but against the German military system.

Mr. HUMES. What was the situation in January, 1918, in Petrograd in reference to the situation of the Bolsheviks?

Mr. KEDDIE. Well, of course, they were not properly in the saddle of government then. There was considerable difference of opinion. Of course those who had property were against the Bolshevik movement.

Mr. HUMES. Now, wait a moment. You say they were not in control of the government then?

Mr. KEDDIE. Excuse me, if you would listen to what I say—I say they were not properly in the saddle of the government. They had not, so to speak, properly got hold of the reins of government.

Mr. HUMES. When would you say that they properly got hold of the reins of the government?

Mr. KEDDIE. The whole situation has been developing all the time.

Mr. HUMES. Do you mean by that that they are not properly in control of the reins of the government now?

Mr. KEDDIE. They are now.

Mr. HUMES. When did they get proper hold of the reins?

Mr. KEDDIE. After they had actually made the separate peace; after Lenine had made the speech in Moscow describing what his policy was, that they were against making a separate peace, the terms were so hard, but that they considered it was something like having an interval to get breath.

Mr. HUMES. When was that?

Mr. KEDDIE. Well, that was, I think, about March, just after I had been in Petrograd, when I went down to Moscow.

Mr. HUMES. While you were in Moscow?

Mr. KEDDIE. After the government came from Petrograd. They came from Petrograd and went down to Moscow and took over the National Hotel and the Hotel Metropole.

Mr. HUMES. Tell us what the actual condition was as to there being terror or being peace and good order during and up to the time that you went to Moscow, during this period that you say the Bolsheviki did not have a proper hold on the reins. What was the internal situation?

Mr. KEDDIE. The internal situation with regard to atrocities—take that point first. I think, to make that clear, it is necessary to bear in mind the military situation as it was at that time.

You remember how Lloyd George sent over Arthur Henderson to Russia. Kerensky had sent word saying Russia was played out; Russia could not fight any longer from a military point of view. Lloyd George sent over Mr. Arthur Henderson, one of the labor leaders. He laid his head together with Kerensky, and suggested the Stockholm conference; suggested a peace by negotiation.

Arthur Henderson went back. He resigned from the government. He was in favor of a peace by negotiation. He resigned from the government in England; and while this was going on, this talk about a separate peace, a peace by negotiation, Lenine had come back. Lenine had come through Germany. Lenine was making speeches in various parts of Russia. The newspapers were saying—some newspapers said he should be shot; other newspapers said he ought to be put in prison. But he continued to speak. Kerensky had been the popular idol for something like five months. As his power gradually waned, so did the power of Lenine gradually rise. For instance, Lenine was the only man in the country who advocated peace, and land to the people.

Lenine went to——

Mr. HUMES. Now, wait a minute.

Mr. KEDDIE. I am leading up to this point of atrocities. Would you excuse me just a second?

Senator OVERMAN. Answer his question.

Mr. HUMES. I can not let you go on because I think you have made a misstatement, and I want to see if I understood you correctly. You say that Lenine was the only man that advocated peace and land to the people. Had not Kerensky already turned the land over to the people?

Mr. KEDDIE. Kerensky did not advocate peace at that time, because Kerensky——

Mr. HUMES. But he had turned the land over to the people?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; at the time of Kerensky's revolution, at the first revolution, it had not penetrated down, for instance, in the Samara government, where I was, because the people had not taken the land over. The people did not actually take the land over until Lenine brought out his decree to nationalize the land.

Mr. HUMES. That is, where you were they had not taken the land over?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. All right; go ahead.

Mr. KEDDIE. Now, to go back to where we were. Lenine, I say, was taking his life in his hands, because the newspapers were writing against him, saying he should be put in prison; some said he should be shot; and being a man who advocated peace and land to the people, of course, the people listened to him. Lenine devoted a great deal of his time to Helsingfors. Helsingfors was the headquarters of the Russian Baltic Fleet. The sailors of the Russian Baltic Fleet have been worse treated than the sailors, I believe, of any other fighting service in the world. I have talked with some of those sailors. I have had the opportunity of living with them—not for very long; just for about three days or so.

These people, when they heard Lenine's message of peace and land to the people, they said, "That is the man for us." Then you have heard this morning about this bid for power that Korniloff made. Gen. Korniloff, a Cossack general, made one bid for a military dictatorship. The idea was supposed to be that there was some plot between Korniloff and Kerensky. Kerensky was to be the premier; Korniloff was to be the dictator. At any rate, he was to march with a division—a Dika division, it was called, a wild division—from Pskof, and take Petrograd.

This scheme collapsed somehow or other, and these Helsingfors sailors came to Petrograd. The Aurora, a little Russian gunboat, came up the Neva, and by force Kerensky was compelled to leave, and the soviet simply became the government.

The point I want to make here is how it simply evolved. First of all, you had the Czar, who was forced to abdicate. Then you had a government made up of men like Prince Lvoff and Miliukov and Rodzianko, men who in the days of the Czar were known as cadets, or liberals. They were liberal capitalists, however; they were landed proprietors. The peasants knew their land policy. The soviet had come to life again, the soviet, which had been created in 1905, and was playing a rather important part in criticizing and adopting a kind of watchful attitude on the policy of Prince Lvoff and Miliukov and Rodzianko. The latter could not hold together, because at this time the newspapers—for instance, the Russko Slovo—were writing that Russia must have Constantinople. The newspapers were referring to it as Czargrad. Now, the average Russian peasant did not know where Czargrad was. He did not know where Constantinople was, and did not care. Of course, Miliukov was the foreign minister at that time and was considered to be an able man. Many of the more or less bourgeoisie elements throughout the country believed in Miliukov.

He tried to carry on. But it was unsatisfactory. There was a good deal of difference of opinion between the government of landed proprietors and the soviet, and Kerensky became gradually one of the important men associated with Miliukov. Then the newspapers still were crying about one more offensive. It was always "One more offensive, and the Germans will be beaten"; always "One more offensive"; and the people in the villages, of course, were beginning to grow war weary.

Things continued to drift along. Then the people came out in the streets of Petrograd and shouted, "Away with Miliukov," asking him to resign. He resigned, and then Kerensky took on other men of similar ideas to his own; men like Tseretelli, Tereshchenko, and Skobelev, social revolutionaries. They tried to continue the war policy. They were what you would call moderate socialists, but they were in favor of carrying on the war.

Senator NELSON. Against Germany?

Mr. KEDDIE. Against Germany; yes. They were in favor of carrying on the war; and then it was, at this time, of course, that Arthur Henderson had come. He conferred with Kerensky, and Kerensky advised him that Russia was played out; that Russia could not fight any longer; that Russia wanted peace by negotiation. Then Kerensky's government had drawn up its peace terms, something like President Wilson's 14 points in some ways. For instance, they wanted a peace without annexations and without indemnities.

Senator STERLING. Arthur Henderson was a labor leader in England?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; that is right, and he advocated this Stockholm conference. He went back and reported to Lloyd George, and they had some difference of opinion, and he resigned.

While all this was going on, while Kerensky was tied to the allies—he was being financed by the allies—he went down to the front, trying to get the soldiers to make another offensive. He made one or two compromises. For instance, he allowed the soldiers to abolish the death sentence. The death sentence was not carried out as formerly, and of course the soldiers began to think a little more. There was not the same chance of the soldiers being shot. They began to think just a little more, and of course when they were thinking a lot it was rather difficult for them to fight a lot. So things developed like that, and it was at this time that Lenine was taking his life in his hands and going about the country speaking. I have referred to how the Helsingfors sailors played such an important part, coming there to Petrograd and very largely by force holding Petrograd up, more or less, and the soviet simply became the government. So the one thing evolved out of the other, very largely owing to the war weariness of the people.

Mr. HUMES. Finally the Bolsheviki had their revolution in November, and took control of the government, did they not?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Tell us what the conditions were following that, up to the time you left Petrograd.

Mr. KEDDIE. When they got into power and became the government, and when they made the separate peace, it is rather important to know, of course, that they—

Senator NELSON. I think he should state those preliminaries. Go on in the way you were.

Mr. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. KEDDIE. Thanks.

Senator NELSON. Go on and state the connection.

Mr. KEDDIE. Thanks very much. I think it is rather important, Senator, to try and get how the one thing leads on to the other, because that is the whole situation in Russia, as I believe it.

When they made the separate peace, for instance, many of the people were against the terms that Germany imposed on them; the terms were so hard. First one delegation went to Brest-Litovsk, and then they came back and reported the hard terms the Germans wanted. Then Trotzky went back again. Trotzky was one of those of the second lot.

Senator NELSON. Let me call your attention to this. There was first a preliminary effort to make a treaty, and the Bolshevik government would not agree to it.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And then the Germans made an advance and got within 50 miles of Petrograd.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And then they went to work and made the final treaty?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; they went back again.

Senator NELSON. Go on.

Mr. KEDDIE. And Trotzky made this effort. He sort of threw out—like a little David, he threw out the stone of an idea at the big German Goliath, and said, "Well, advance if you dare, if the German democracy will allow you to advance." At Petrograd I saw a procession of German prisoners who carried a banner saying that they protested against the terms which Germany was imposing, the terms were so hard. Well, this caused a great deal of talk throughout Russia, and of course you know in the end (I do not want to delay you too long) they signed the peace treaty.

Then the soldiers began going home. America, I believe, had something like 4,000,000 troops under arms, and the authorities say it will take about a year to demobilize scientifically. Russia had something like fifteen million troops under arms, and they demobilized in a month. It was not demobilization at all; it was simply one mad rush home. They got on the tops of trains, inside the trains, on the buffers, on horseback, and in carts—any way possible. They sold government property. They sold anything to anybody so as to enable them to get home; they were so war weary. They set off along the roads; and when their money was finished and their food was finished they would knock at some castle gate for food (the house of some big man or a house in a village).

Sometimes the watchman in this house would fire on them, and, of course, these Russian soldiers fired back. They had got a kind of iron cross if they killed a certain number of Germans. They were rather brutalized when they got back. When they were coming home and could not get food and the watchman fired at them they fired back, and a good many atrocities happened in that way—a good many so-called atrocities. Then these men actually returned home to their villages. I have seen many of them arrive in the villages. They brought their rifles back with them.

When they got home they found their cottages in a very wretched condition. Of course, during this transition period the Russian Government had not been paying separation allowances in the proper way. Things had broken down a good deal, and the soldiers' widows had had a hard time to get along. Prices had been rising. Everybody was away fighting, and those who were not fighting were making munitions, and consequently food got dear and prices continued to rise. The soldier's wife might have sold her horse or her cow or a few sheep, if she was rich enough to have any, and when she sold her horse, of course, she could not work the land very well. Then she would sell something else off in order to keep the home going, and the home became rather denuded and rather poor. It was a condition something like that that the soldier found when he got back to his home, very often after fighting two or three years, sometimes without an arm, sometimes without a leg, having been wounded three or four times, having been rather badly fed and badly treated. So he goes back and he finds his home in this wretched condition. So he says to himself, "What is it all about, anyway? Whom have I been fighting for? Have I been fighting for Russia? Well, that means Russia is mine."

At this point I would like to digress just a moment. If you consider the story—the Bible story—of the rich man who fared sumptuously every day and clothed himself in purple and fine linen, and the beggar, Lazarus, who sat on the doorstep, and the dogs came and licked his sores, and he lived on the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table; something like that was going on in Russia. Ninety per cent of the people were living on the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table. They were sent away to fight. They were like cannon fodder. They did not know what it was all about. Then they came back, and instead of being content to live on the crumbs which fell from the rich man's table they simply rose up and upset the table; and that is something like the condition that has taken place in Russia.

Now, with regard to the villages, when these soldiers did get back, about this time the news came out of Lenine having nationalized the land. The decree was published. Now, when you talk about the land question I would just like to go back to 1916. When I went there, about the end of 1916, I was being driven along by a Russian peasant in one of these Russian carts which they use in the Samara district—a tarantass. He was an old man, about 68 or 70, perhaps, a tall, thin, spare man, a typical Russian peasant, with a long, flowing beard, and fine features, a fine-shaped head; the kind of a man Moses must have been; rather a commanding presence he had. So I asked him about the land system. He explained to me the land system around there as it was in the Samara government. He said: "It is just like this. The peasant works the land." Of course, all the peasants live in the villages, and they all live adjoining each other. They do not live on their farms. The average Russian village is usually one long street. "When he goes to work on his land he has to go 10 or 15 versts on the one side one year, and he camps out there in the springtime, does his sowing, and he does his harvesting in the summer time. Then the next year he goes 10 or 15 versts upon the other side, and then the next year he goes 10 or 15 versts on the other side. There is no inducement for him to improve the value of his land." So I asked this old peasant, I said, "Why do you have such a stupid system?" "Well," he said, "we peasants are fools. We are blind." And he put his hand up to his eye, and he said, "Before the Russo-Japanese War we were blind." And he said, "After the Russo-Japanese War"—and he put up his hand to his eyes, and he half opened his eyes, and he said—"that is how we were after the Russo-Japanese War; and then after this war"—and this was while the war was going on—he put his hand up to his eyes and opened them as wide as they would go and opened his mouth as wide as it could go, and he said, “That is how we are now.” By opening his mouth he meant to say that he wanted a little more of the good things of life.

Now that was about the situation with regard to land tenure. The system of land tenure was bad. The landed proprietors were to blame—something like 7 per cent, or, at most, say, 10 per cent. You see, Russia is an agricultural country. Ninety per cent of the people are the hewers of wood and the drawers of water. They have continued to work and work and work. They have really been expropriated from their real, lawful rights for the last 300 years. The prerequisites of revolution were already there. It only took a war where the Russian infantry were mowed down by Hindenburg’s heavy artillery and Hindenburg’s machine guns—it only took a war to bring things to a head; and so the situation developed.

Now, with regard to these soldiers, when they got back to the villages, and when the land was nationalized by Lenine, they would go up to the landed proprietor, and very often he had about half a dozen estates, and if the landed proprietor had been a decent man to them and treated them well in years gone by, the peasants would go up to him and say, “Now, we do not want to turn you out. We know you have been a decent man. You have got half a dozen estates. You can only live in one house at a time. You keep one and we will take over the others;” and that same thing has happened all over. Then there would be the other type of landed proprietor, a very decent man, but narrowminded, the kind that could only see his point of view. Very good hearted he was, really, but owing to the narrowness of his education he could not see the case for the other 90 per cent. He thought the peasant was made of inferior clay, and he would not talk to the peasant, it was beneath him to talk to the peasant, and his argument usually consisted in pulling out a revolver and firing it. Of course when it came to firing a revolver all the force was on the other side, because the soldiers had brought their rifles home with them, and it sometimes happened that so-called atrocities of that sort occurred.

Now with regard to the taking over of the land, you know that just well as I do, but I want to give my experience as I found it in the Samara government, or around the outlying districts there. All the land titles there to the land surrounding the villages were held by the village, the local mir, the village mir, or the local soviet, and you got as much land as you could work according to the number of mouths you had to feed. The average citizen there, with six in a family, got about 75 acres. Now, if you wanted to go to another village you could not sell that land. It reverted back to the village. It was yours only so long as you worked it.

Senator NELSON. The land, as a matter of fact, belonged to the village?

Mr. KEDDIE. That is right.

Senator NELSON. As a community?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; the title was vested in the village, and it was yours only so long as you would work it. You could not sell it. If you wanted to go away to another village you simply gave up your right, and they would just give it to somebody else. And with regard to the estate, for instance, the landed proprietor was treated in the same way. If he was a wealthy man and had lots of flocks and herds and horses (some of them had camels, because they use camels in the Samara government, in the winter time and in the summer; it is very strange; but the camels are very easily fed; they can eat hay and salt, and are so much easier and cheaper to keep than a horse) the live stock was very often divided up in this way. A list was made up by the village mir. A soldier's widow—and there were always a good proportion of them in the average Russian village—or a soldier without an arm, or a soldier without a leg, the men who had been hurt and disabled, and those who were poor—generally there was an order of precedence according to the need, and they received a horse or a cow or a few sheep. Now, I have been at those divisions. I have seen them.

Senator NELSON. This was under the old system?

Mr. KEDDIE. No, no; this was when the Bolsheviks came along, you see, because it was only when Lenine nationalized the land, when the soldiers got back, after making the separate peace, that it was possible for these things to happen. So that is how they did it. The list was made out according to the need, and the soldier's widow would get a cow or a horse; and a few brothers, if they had been away fighting, they would get something; and so on. It was according to the need, as a rule. There was a good deal of squabbling, it is true, but there was never any shooting. It is untrue to say that the landed proprietor, as a general rule, was shot. Very often the landed proprietor was to blame, himself. It is true to say that sometimes the peasants were to blame. You can understand the situation, if you can only put yourselves in the place of the Russian peasant, if you can only go through the psychological changes that he went through; simply sent off to fight, cannon fodder; brought up in a village where he had no school, no church, nothing done to help him. The situation was really scandalous from the point of view of these Russian peasants. They had no chance at all. They simply grew up, and the labor supply was great, the industrial system was bad, there was always plenty of cheap labor; and of course bitterness got into the soul of the poor peasant, and it is illustrated by Tolstoy's saying which the peasants understand quite well, "The rich will do everything to help the poor but get off their back." It is true, of course, that all this upheaval has come about by illiterate peasants; but still, it was not difficult for the peasant to understand that he was robbed.

Senator STERLING. Did it begin with the peasant, or did it begin with the workman?

Mr. KEDDIE. My point is, I am describing the situation in the Samara government. I only want to talk about what I do know myself, what I have seen, and not so much from the towns. I told you that my experience in the towns is not so good as my experience in the country.

Senator STERLING. Do you not understand, however, that as a general proposition it began not with the Russian peasant, the tiller of the land, but with the workmen, and that they began the trouble to begin with?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; it is true to say that it began in that way.

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KEDDIE. But, at the same time, the man who matters in Russia is the Russian peasant. If to know the Russian peasant it is necessary to live in 30 or 40 villages in European Russia, and perhaps say in about another 20 in Siberia, as I have done, I claim that I know something about what the Russian peasant is, his ideals, his aspirations. He is only asking for his lawful rights. He is only trying to create a new social order; and, after all, that is what Bolshevism is, an attempt to create a new social order in which it will be impossible for a rich man, no matter how rich, for a clever man, no matter how clever, for a hardworking man, no matter how hardworking—in which it shall be made impossible for that man to dominate to an injurious degree the lives of other men, women, and children.

Senator OVERMAN. That is what they propose?

Mr. KEDDIE. And that is what they are trying to work out.

Senator OVERMAN. Is that what they are working out?

Mr. KEDDIE. That is what they are trying to work out. Now, with regard to the conditions when the Bolsheviki got into power——

Senator OVERMAN. How do you know that is what they are trying to work out?

Mr. KEDDIE. Well, for instance, from what the peasants tell me.

Senator OVERMAN. I am not talking about the peasants. I am talking about the government that is in authority—Trotzky and Lenine.

Mr. KEDDIE. Well, they say so, too.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you talked to them?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I have not spoken to them.

Senator OVERMAN. They have made glorious promises, have they not?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. But have they carried out those promises?

Mr. KEDDIE. Well, I think they have carried out some of them.

Senator OVERMAN. Some of them?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes. They have given the land to the people.

Senator STERLING. How about the industries of Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; I am just coming to that in a little while. That is rather the weak point of the Bolshevik government, as applied to industry; but with regard to bolshevism as applied to agriculture, it has been successful.

Mr. HUMES. Let me ask you, now, in connection with the distribution of this livestock. That livestock was loaned to the people, then, was it? It was not given to them?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; it was actually given to them.

Mr. HUMES. Under the constitution of the government, all livestock is nationalized, and becomes the property of the state.

Mr. KEDDIE. That is quite true. You know quite well, sir, that when you had your Revolutionary War, when you were wise enough to govern your own affairs, what happened was that it took America something like eight years to settle down and get a start, and it will be something like the same thing in Russia. You can say anything is written in the constitution, but Russia is such a tremendously big country.

Mr. HUMES. But Russia has a constitution to-day.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. They have already adopted their constitution.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes, but you know that the railways are bad; the communication is bad. You know that it is a country about four and a half times the size of the United States, forty-four times the size of France. You know perfectly well that it is difficult to get these peasants, who are ignorant, to understand the decrees that are sent out from Moscow. What they do understand is, the land is given to them.

Mr. HUMES. Are we to understand you to say that the livestock has not been nationalized, even though the constitution provides that it shall be? Is that correct?

Mr. KEDDIE. In the Samara government it was handed over to the peasants as their personal property.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know what has been done in reference to it anywhere else than in the Samara government?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; I have seen it in some other villages around the Omsk and Tschelyabinsk districts.

Mr. HUMES. Then the Bolshevik government in operation is entirely different, or at least considerably different, from the Bolshevik government as it is mapped out on paper?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes. I think that is not peculiar to Bolshevik governments. I think every other government has a constitution of one kind; but while America has got about nine men sitting in permanent session always interpreting what the Constitution means, how can you wonder at a poor ignorant peasant not understanding exactly what the constitution is?

Mr. HUMES. I am not talking about the peasant; I am talking about the application of these laws. Well, go ahead with your statement.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you been over this country preaching Bolshevism to our people?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I have not been preaching bolshevism. I have spoken at a few meetings, but I have particularly been describing the Friends' work. I am going home to Scotland as quickly as I can get there; I hope to sail in a week or so. I have been speaking on Friends' work, and have been answering questions with regard to bolshevism because I have been in Russia.

Senator NELSON. Are you going back to Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. I want to if I can.

Senator NELSON. What do you want to do when you get back?

Mr. KEDDIE. I want to go back for the Society of Friends and do relief work.

Senator NELSON. What do you expect to do when you get there?

Mr. KEDDIE. Well, the same kind of work as we have been doing. What Russia wants is a number of teachers. Send as many people as you like, but let them be teachers.

Senator NELSON. What do you propose to teach them?

Mr. KEDDIE. What we have been doing in our villages.

Senator NELSON. I mean what do you propose to teach them, when you get back?

Mr. KEDDIE. I am going to continue—

Senator NELSON. What do you propose to do?

Mr. KEDDIE. By instituting libraries; having libraries in the villages; having trades schools for the boys and girls, so that they can learn a trade, a chance that they have not had. The great trouble in Russian villages is that in the summer time the peasant can work, but in the long, weary winter months, there is little for them to do, and they have had no education and they have had no libraries.

Senator NELSON. Here is one thing that I want to call your attention to. You complained a moment ago about the old Russian system——

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Where the land had been assigned by the mir, the community, did you not?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And that the land was simply apportioned to the peasants, to be cultivated. One year it would be on this side and the next year on the other side of the village?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Wherein does this new system differ from that—this new land system of the Bolshevik government—where the state assumes the ownership of the land and simply proposes to apportion the use of it to the workers?

Mr. KEDDIE. It differs in this way, that before, you had the landed proprietor——

Senator NELSON. No, I mean now. Do not get off the fence.

Mr. KEDDIE. I am not getting off the fence.

Senator NELSON. I refer to the village community.

Mr. KEDDIE. The village community has taken over the land of the landed proprietor.

Senator NELSON. No, no, but the land they had. Wherein does this system of the Bolshevik government, in control now, differ from the old mir system that prevailed before?

Mr. KEDDIE. I am telling you, if you will just give me an opportunity to. The landed proprietor does not exist. His land has been taken away from him.

Senator NELSON. You know that you are dodging the question. Just listen to me. Did you not say that the land belonged to these village communities?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; it is taken over and held by them.

Senator NELSON. It was held by them under the Czar's government, was it not?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes, but you must bear in mind——

Senator NELSON. Was not that so? Did not the land belong to the village communities under the Czar's government?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; it belonged to the landed proprietors.

Senator NELSON. In these villages?

Mr. KEDDIE. Very often.

Senator NELSON. There you are mistaken; that is not true. In these village communities most of it belonged to them. That was a part of the scheme when the serfs were set free.

Mr. KEDDIE. Excuse me, but you said that I said something that is not true. I am only talking of what I have seen, and what I do know, and I can assure you——

Senator NELSON. And that is in the Samara government on the lower Volga.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Is that country occupied by the Cossacks?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; the Cossacks are farther to the south.

Senator NELSON. Is not their land system different?

Mr. KEDDIE. Quite.

Senator NELSON. They own their own lands?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. They get them in fee for their military service?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes, and that is the cause of the trouble between the Bolsheviks and the Cossacks. The Bolsheviks maintain that the Cossacks should have the same system as the others.

Senator NELSON. And they propose to take the land away from the Cossacks?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. I am coming back to the mir system. Under the mir system the land was assigned to the community, and the officials of the community apportioned land for cultivation to a peasant, one year, you say, so many versts on this side and next year so many versts on the other side. Wherein does the present system of the Bolshevik government differ from that system? They had no title before—the peasants—they had no individual title before, and they get none now. They get simply the privilege of using what is assigned to them.

Mr. KEDDIE. Now they have got all the land. The landed proprietor—

Senator NELSON. You are dodging the question; you are talking about the landed proprietor and I am talking about the community.

Senator OVERMAN. He is talking about the community land, and you persist in getting back to the landed proprietor.

Senator NELSON. I want you to keep to your text. I want you to tell me when I ask, and to keep on a straight road a while.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. I know something about Russian affairs. Now you are trying to quibble. You kept on the straight road for a while, and told a good story, and now you are dodging.

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I am not. Just let me answer.

Senator NELSON. The point is this. You know that practically there is no difference between the land system of Trotzky and Lenine under the soviet government and the old system that prevailed in these mirs. In neither case was the peasant permitted to own the land in fee that he cultivated. Is not that true?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; it is not. I have listened now to you for about 10 minutes, and will you not please let me answer with regard to this question?

Senator NELSON. I want to caution you. I know something about the Russian situation, I have studied it, and if you do not tell the truth, I shall know it.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; quite. Under the Samara government we had the landed proprietor who owned, we will say, 150,000 to 200,000 acres of land, that land being very often on the railroad track, and they were holding until such time as the price would rise. Under the present system over there, you see, all this land is taken over by the peasants.

Senator NELSON. Under those landed proprietors, according to the description you gave a while ago, the land was assigned, one year so many versts on one side and the next year so many on the other; but that was not the way the landed proprietors did. That was the practice that prevailed in the mir system.

Mr. KEDDIE. The village mir was controlled by the Czar's government through gendarmes and through the representatives of the land-owning interests, and that is reversed now.

Senator NELSON. Do you not know that a large share of the land was secured by the Czar's government for these village mirs, these communities?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; and I also know that the rich landed proprietor had a tremendous amount of land and the poor peasant got the worst land.

Senator OVERMAN. He is not speaking of the landed proprietor. He is speaking of the mir land, as you call it.

Senator NELSON. I am speaking of the community land. You get back always to the landed proprietor.

Senator OVERMAN. We know that they have taken the land over. Senator Nelson is talking about the land owned by the community. What difference is there between that system and the new system?

Mr. KEDDIE. Only that he has a better choice of land. Before, the landed proprietor had the best land.

Senator NELSON. You get off the reservation. You go to the private lands.

Senator STERLING. Did the landed proprietor have any control over the community property, over the land controlled by the village or mir? Did the individual landed proprietor have any control over that—the land that Senator Nelson is asking you about and which you say was assigned by the village, the community, to different peasants, first on one side and then on another side of the village? Did the landed proprietor have any control of that land?

Mr. KEDDIE. He had control so far as his wealth and power allowed. He had bought up the best land, and therefore the peasants had to be content with inferior land. That is the difference.

Senator NELSON. That again brings you back to the land he owned, and does not refer to the village community. We are speaking about the land that was assigned to the mir, that they held as community property.

Mr. KEDDIE. The mir now has all the land.

Senator NELSON. Under the mir system the peasants did not get title in fee. They were simply assigned a certain amount of land to cultivate.

Mr. KEDDIE. Sometimes they bought the land.

Senator NELSON. Was not that the rule—that the land was assigned to them for cultivation?

Mr. KEDDIE. Sometimes it was.

Senator NELSON. Sometimes? You know it was generally the case.

Mr. KEDDIE. Not in this district where I was.

Senator NELSON. I mean throughout Russia. If you know anything about the Russian system of government, that is, the land system—and as a matter of fact you described it correctly at one time when you were on the right track—you know that the land belonged to the village communities, or the mirs, assigned to them. It was the property of the community, and the community apportioned the land year by year for cultivation to the peasants; and the peasant at one time might have land on this side and another year on the other side, and so on. That you stated correctly. But under that system the peasants did cultivate the land and were not the owners of it. It was the community that had the title to the land.

Mr. KEDDIE. Very often.

Senator NELSON. Very often? That was the general rule outside of the private proprietors. I am speaking of the communities. I say where that system prevailed the peasants did not have title to the land. They simply had the right to cultivate it, and it was assigned to them by the village authorities.

Mr. KEDDIE. They had the right to buy the land.

Senator NELSON. Yes; but wherein did that system that simply assigned the right to cultivate the land from year to year differ from this Bolshevik system? The only difference is that under that system the community owned the land, and under this the state owns it. The state assigns the land for cultivation instead of the community.

Mr. KEDDIE. No. When you talk about the state in Russia and talk about the village council, that is the same thing.

Senator NELSON. Wherein does it differ? In neither case does the peasant become the owner of this community land. He has simply the right to cultivate it, and under the Bolshevik system he never can become the owner in fee, as you can in England—and I take it that you are from England?

Mr. KEDDIE. Scotland.

Senator NELSON. He can not become the owner of any piece of land under this new Russian system.

Mr. KEDDIE. That is true.

Senator NELSON. And I take it from your attitude that you rather favor that.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes. I think it was very unfair that the landed proprietor should have 150,000 to 200,000 acres of land—

Senator NELSON. You rather favor the idea that the Russian peasant should not acquire the ownership of any land, that he should be a cotter, and cultivate a little one year here and the next year over there, the government to control, and that he should keep on living from hand to mouth. That is what you believe in, is it not?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; it is not what I believe in. What I believe in is that the peasant who does the work should control and own the land.

Senator NELSON. But he does not own it. You do not give it to him.

Mr. KEDDIE. Oh, yes, he does.

Senator NELSON. You know better. Do not equivocate. He never becomes the owner of it in fee simple, as you become the owner of a piece of land in England, if you buy it.

Mr. KEDDIE. That is true, but he gets the produce off that land so long as he works it.

Senator NELSON. Why, Uncle Sam can give you a place down here on the commons and allow you to raise cabbages and potatoes on it and you get the usufruct, of cabbages and potatoes; but the land is Uncle Sam's and you have no more interest in it than the man in the moon; and that is the way with the Russian peasant, and you know it.

Senator STERLING. Do you believe in this nationalization of land?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. And in the nationalization of personal property, the nationalization of horses and cattle and sheep? You believe in that, do you?

Mr. KEDDIE. I believe the means of life, the waterways, the mines, and all the railways, and the necessary means of life, should be owned by the people.

Senator STERLING. Well——

Mr. KEDDIE. Oh, just excuse me for a second. The point I want to make is that now in Russia the average intelligent Russian worker believes that capitalism has served a very useful purpose. It has helped industry to organize. But now the system is that the wealth of the country, the wealth of one of these capitalistic concerns, is produced cooperatively, and they want to make it so that the profits should be shared cooperatively, and not go to shareholders who simply invest their money and live on the interest.

Senator NELSON. They divide the people into two classes there, the workingman and the capitalist?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; there are no capitalists now.

Senator NELSON. When you go back to Russia are you to be classed as a workingman under the soviet government instead of a literary man—as a kind of a Silas Wegg? They would tell you to go to work and cultivate with a hoe and a spade and a shovel.

Mr. KEDDIE. Not necessarily.

Senator NELSON. Are you prepared to do that?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; they do not expect me to do that. They have brain workers——

Senator NELSON. What do they expect you to do—to be a missionary for the Bolshevik propaganda?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; under the Russian system you could go on over there and carry on some very good work, as in this country you can do, quietly and peacefully. The government in Moscow is a government of law and order.

Senator NELSON. To-day?

Mr. KEDDIE. To-day. Where the fighting is going on is largely because the allies have created a steel ring all around Russia. They have taken Murmansk and Archangel and Odessa, and many other places, and they are financing the enemies of the Bolshevik government.

Senator NELSON. In the name of the Bolshevik movement——

Mr. KEDDIE. Hold on, excuse me for a second.

Senator NELSON. You hold on. Have not the allies relieved the Russians from the bargain of the treaty of Brest-Litovsk; have not the allies relieved them of that, and did not the Lenine government relinquish and throw up to the Germans the Ukraine, and the Baltic Provinces, Finland and Livonia and Courland, and did not the Lenine government surrender that in the treaty of Brest-Litovsk; and did they not give the Germans some two or three hundred million dollars in gold?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes. Can I have 10 minutes now, without interruption?

Senator NELSON. Well, keep on the straight and narrow path.

Senator OVERMAN. Then you think that your own country is treating the people badly over there?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; I think that the allies should not be there in Russia. I am against revolution. I am in favor of accelerating social evolution. It is because of the world-wide situation that I am so anxious about it. If I could give you gentlemen an open mind on the Russian question, and you could solve that, you would solve the same question in England, in Scotland, in Roumania, in Poland, in France, in Italy, for it is a world-wide question.

Senator NELSON. And your solution is that you want the Bolshevik government to prevail in Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. If you will just allow me to answer——

Senator NELSON. Just tell me that.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; but I just want to tell you, if you will allow me to, with regard to what is going on in Russia to-day. I regard it as the one creative social experiment that has come out of the war, and it behooves other countries, where the government is better than the Czar's government was—the Czar's government was rotten at the core, it was built in the sand, and when the wind of democracy came along it blew it away, it fell down, and many good people were hurt; and they are trying to create a new form of government and social order. It is only an experiment. It has been in operation only 18 months. It may fail. But what I do say is, learn the facts. Let us know the truth.

We know perfectly well what things are not right in our own country, and I am talking of England and Scotland and France, and not the United States. We see that the situation is not right.

Senator STERLING. Do you think that that is true of the United States, that it is not right?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I do not think so.

Senator NELSON. Do you believe that plan of government that they have outlined is the best thing for Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. Would you just allow me to answer——

Senator NELSON. What good does it do to allow you to go on when you do not answer the questions?

Mr. KEDDIE. Let me have 10 minutes by my watch.

Senator NELSON. Go ahead.

Mr. KEDDIE. The allies have created a steel ring around the Bolshevik movement. They have right now 100,000 Czecho-Slovaks, and there are many thousand Americans and British and French and Italians. They control the railroad lines right along to the Ural Mountains. Admiral Kolchak is a dictator, but he does not dictate, because the people in the villages do not pay any attention to him. He has set aside 1,700,000 bushels of grain for vodka, which under normal circumstances would go to starving Petrograd and Moscow. It is criminal to do that. It is being used for vodka. Under the Bolsheviks vodka has not been started again, even though there is necessity for revenue, because the average Russian peasant does not quite understand what has come about. He knows that he has got the land and that there is safety in his government, but he has not been educated up to the point of paying taxes. When I was in Moscow last there was a tax on pianos and on lamp globes, and there was an income tax which, of course, hardly anybody paid, because nobody was making any income. There was an indirect tax on goods going over the railroad lines, something like 3 to 10 per cent, according to the nature of the goods; but there was one way that Lenine and those that were associated with him could have gotten money out of the peasants, and that was by starting up vodka again. They did not do it, and the peasant is paying a tax—at least he was in the Samara government—on lands, a kind of single tax; but other taxes he was not paying.

Senator NELSON. When you get through I would like to have you answer my questions.

Mr. KEDDIE. Excuse me just a second. You have given me only 2 minutes, and I wanted 10.

Senator OVERMAN. Go ahead with your 10 minutes.

Mr. KEDDIE. The situation in Russia, owing to the intervention, is that it is turning moderate socialists, men who have beliefs like Kerensky, into extremists like Maxim Gorky. While I was in Moscow I used to find this newspaper, the New Life. This newspaper which he controlled was published in Petrograd, and this newspaper all the time was criticizing the Bolsheviks from the point of view of constructive criticism.

Senator NELSON. That is suppressed now, is it not?

Mr. KEDDIE. I do not know whether it is suppressed or not, but as a constructionist I am appealing to-day to try to improve our social order, so that we can all have equality of opportunity. I do not believe in revolutions, for from all points of view they are unscientific. It is for these reasons that I urge we should accelerate our social evolution and improve matters. With regard to Maxim Gorky, he was giving this constructive criticism all the time, and then when intervention came along, when the allies took Murmansk and Archangel, he said, "I have a choice, I can hardly be on the side of the allies, who are coming along to establish the old order, or I can be on the side of the peasants and workmen's government, and there is only one choice, I shall be with the peasants." There is Martov, another Menshevik, and there is Tchernoff, who is another revolutionafy, and these men have gone over now to the Bolshevik idea. That does not necessarily mean that they believe everything that the Bolsheviks do. In the Bolshevik movement are men of all different shades of opinion; whereas, on the other hand, if you withdraw your troops out of Siberia and European Russia, the Russian situation—

Senator OVERMAN. Please let me interrupt. You say that they have gone over to the Bolshevik government. Have they done that as a matter of choice?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Have not millions of people gone over to that government, as a matter of fact, because of the reign of terror?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; Tchernoff was up amongst the Czecho-Slovaks in Ekaterinberg. There was no need for him to go. He did not agree with Kolchak. Kolchak tried to arrest him.

Senator NELSON. I again repeat the question. Are you in favor of the present Bolshevik government in Russia as it is planned, and as it is existing to-day?

Mr. KEDDIE. Senator Nelson, you promised to give me 10 minutes.

Senator NELSON. You were to take 10 minutes to answer the question.

Mr. KEDDIE. No; you were to give me 10 minutes to say what I have to say.

Senator OVERMAN. Go on; and then we will require you to answer that question after you get through.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes. I have talked to Ambassador Morris over that same question. He was anxious to get the point of view of the peasants in the villages. He is the American ambassador to Japan. I have also talked to Gen. Graves, the commander in chief of the American troops, perhaps the most broad-minded and finest man I met during the time I have been in Russia or Siberia. My feeling is, after having been over there for two years and four months, that if the allied troops were withdrawn, owing to many people being, so called, in the Bolshevik party, although they are really not of the same opinion, are not so extreme—if the troops were withdrawn, there is a possibility that a moderate opposition would arise to the Bolsheviks, or they would divide among themselves. In other words, I do maintain that the Bolsheviks—or the Russians, rather, I should not say the Bolsheviks—I do maintain that the Russians are the best people to settle their own affairs. If you have a quarrel in your own house, you do not want me to come in and try to settle it. When America was fighting the South, how would she have liked it if France had interfered on one side or the other? America wants the Monroe doctrine. Why should not Russia have a little Monroe doctrine of her own? It is true that Kolchak and some of these other people could not stand five minutes, if the allied troops were not there. The mere fact of their being there makes them clearly on the side of privilege and property and reaction.

Mr. HUMES. Why are you so anxious to go back to Russia to participate in Russian affairs, if you think that they should be let alone?

Mr. KEDDIE. I am a free man, and I can go to any country in the world that I want to.

Senator NELSON. Will you please answer my question? I asked you whether you are in favor of the Bolshevik government as existing and planned in Russia to-day?

Mr. KEDDIE. No. I am in favor of what they are trying to do—trying to create.

Senator NELSON. Can you not give a direct answer?

Mr. KEDDIE. I said no. I am against the use of violence. I am a pacifist. I am against the use of force.

Senator NELSON. I thought so. Do you expect to pacify these Bolsheviks when you go over there? Do you expect to stop them using force?

Mr. KEDDIE. I do think that owing to the success that Tolstoi's teaching has had over there in Russia there is a great proportion of people who are nearer being pacifists, who are nearer being Christians from the point of view of peace and war, than any other nationality that I know of.

Senator NELSON. Would you not think that your first mission as a lover of peace, when you got to Russia would be to stop this Bolshevik government and the Red Guard from carrying on a reign of terror? Would not that naturally strike you as the best missionary work that you could do over there?

Mr. KEDDIE. Quite; but——

Senator NELSON. And you expect to do that, do you—to go over there and pacify the Red Guard and the revolutionists? Is that your mission?

Mr. KEDDIE. I go over there to carry on what I consider to be right; to propagate truth and justice as I understand it.

Senator OVERMAN. Now, I have got your viewpoint. I suppose it is the viewpoint of the majority of your people in London, in Great Britain. If these men that have been sent over there, wise men, from England and from France and the United States should say that there is a reign of terror there, and unless we remain there and help the people to work out their salvation there is going to be starvation and a reign of terror there the like of which has never been heard of anywhere, murder and rapine, do you not think that to keep the forces there for the purpose of helping those people to work out their salvation would be to better that condition?

Mr. KEDDIE. No, sir; I do not agree to that. That is not the truth.

Senator OVERMAN. I am not saying that it is; but I say, suppose we believe that instead of your viewpoint being correct, the viewpoint of dozens of other people who have been there, who have a different viewpoint, is correct——

Mr. KEDDIE. But you are just stating what is not true. The Society of Friends is working in Moscow to-day, cooperating with Tolstoyans. They are working in Moscow to-day. Everybody is not being shot or killed. I was not shot or killed.

Senator OVERMAN. I do not suppose that everybody is being killed; but I say, suppose what these people say is correct, that if the forces were withdrawn from there, there would be that condition? I am not saying that it is true or that it is not true, but supposing that I believe and that the Government of the United States and the Government of England and the Government of France believe that that would be the situation, do you not think it would be right for them to stay there?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I think the troops should be withdrawn.

Senator OVERMAN. I know you think so, but you have not answered my question.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes. What is it?

Senator OVERMAN. Suppose they believed that there would be a reign of terrorism such as the world has never seen, and starvation and rapine and murder in all that country if these troops were taken out of there, would you be in favor of withdrawing them if this Government believed that and France and Great Britain believed it, and as the world believes?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I do not think you can prevent——

Senator OVERMAN. I am not asking you anything else. Answer my question.

Mr. KEDDIE. But I can not answer for the governments.

Senator OVERMAN. But I say, suppose they believed it?

MR. KEDDIE. I can not believe that.

Senator OVERMAN. I know you can not believe it, but I am making a supposition. Supposing you did believe it?

MR. KEDDIE. No; that is not a fair question.

Senator OVERMAN. Why?

MR. KEDDIE. No, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Why not?

MR. KEDDIE. Because I can not believe it.

Senator OVERMAN. I am not asking you to believe it, but I say, suppose you believed from that viewpoint. You are taking it only from your viewpoint. Therefore you are not fair.

MR. KEDDIE. I am only speaking from my own viewpoint.

Senator OVERMAN. I am asking you, if you did believe it.

MR. KEDDIE. But I do not believe it.

Senator OVERMAN. Answer my question; if you did believe it——

MR. KEDDIE. No, sir; I can not believe it.

Senator OVERMAN. But I say if you did believe it?

MR. KEDDIE. That is not a fair question.

Senator OVERMAN. It is a fair question.

MR. KEDDIE. I am not going to try to believe something that I can not believe.

Senator OVERMAN. I know that you do not believe it, but I say, if you did believe it, as I might believe it, and putting yourself in my place, then you would be in my place exactly. I am not putting myself in your place, but I am asking you to put yourself in my place, now, and if you believed that, in my place, as representing the Government, what would you think about it?

MR. KEDDIE. How can I answer that, when I can not be in your position? If I am in your position, I can only think as I think, and I say that the troops should be drawn out.

Senator OVERMAN. I have admitted that——

MR. KEDDIE. Oh, a man can not believe what he does not believe. Let us talk about some other question.

Senator NELSON. Do you believe that the Bolsheviki system should be established in the United States?

MR. KEDDIE. No.

Senator NELSON. Why?

MR. KEDDIE. Because I should like to have a better social order of things, which the chances are we might get.

Senator NELSON. You think they would get it. You intimated awhile ago that if we would let alone the Bolsheviki in Russia it would have a good effect on Germany, England, and other countries; it would tend to infuse the Bolsheviki spirit into them.

MR. KEDDIE. Senator Nelson——

Senator NELSON. You intimated that awhile ago.

MR. KEDDIE. Yes. Of course, you have got to understand that what you have in your mind in regard to Bolshevism and what I mean by Bolshevism are two different things entirely. You have in your mind this great monster that is eating up everything and destroying all the time, and you have no idea of the construction——

Senator NELSON. Is not that what it is?

MR. KEDDIE. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. Is not that what it is to-day?

Mr. KEDDIE. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. You have not been there for over a year?

Mr. KEDDIE. I left there in December.

Senator NELSON. Yes, and went on the railroad; and that is all you know?

Mr. KEDDIE. No. And I left in October—European Russia.

Mr. HUMES. You left there last summer?

Mr. KEDDIE. Not last summer. I left in October. I was in Samara.

Senator OVERMAN. My dear friend, of course the Bolshevik government would protect you and give you a pass and let you go whenever you liked?

Mr. KEDDIE. They did not. I was imprisoned by the Bolsheviks.

Senator OVERMAN. And then they reformed you?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I was reformed before they put me in prison.

Senator OVERMAN. You had to make your choice, then, like these others, when you were in prison.

Senator NELSON. You had to turn Bolshevik, then?

Mr. KEDDIE. No, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. What did they put you in prison for?

Mr. KEDDIE. About the time they took Bozuluk—

Senator NELSON. Who put you in prison?

Mr. KEDDIE. The Bolsheviks. The Red Guard.

Senator OVERMAN. What did they put you in prison for?

Senator NELSON. The Red Guard did not know what your sentiments were, evidently.

Mr. KEDDIE. That is quite true; they did not know. They thought that I was in charge of English propaganda there. It happened like this. It was the time of the occupation of the Bolsheviks, and the Czecho-Slovak advance, and you know that they captured the gold supply of the Bolsheviks, 300,000,000 of gold bullion and 200,000,000 of silver bullion. It is now in Moscow. They advanced, and the Czecho-Slovaks had taken Samara, and then they advanced and took Bozuluk.

Senator NELSON. Where were you in prison? At what place?

Mr. KEDDIE. I am just going to tell you.

Senator NELSON. How long does it take you? Can you not give the name of the place?

Mr. KEDDIE. In Bozuluk.

Senator NELSON. Where?

Mr. KEDDIE. In Bozuluk.

Senator NELSON. Where is that, on the Volga?

Mr. KEDDIE. It is midway between Samara and Orenburg.

Senator NELSON. It is in European Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. How far south from Perm?

Mr. KEDDIE. It is a long ways from Perm. It is 161 versts from Samara.

Senator NELSON. Is it on the Volga?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; it is on the railway line, along the line that runs to Tashkent.

Senator OVERMAN. Now, tell us where they put you in prison.

Mr. KEDDIE. We were in Bozuluk, and we attempted to go to our orphanage there. When the refugees were driven from Poland everything was all mixed up, and we had something like 140 children in the orphanage. We were running hospitals in the country districts. American friends were cooperating with us, and we had libraries in every district. We had village industries. For instance, we bought raw hemp and wool and flax and we turned it into material—into clothing. We paid the refugees for doing it. We paid them the money while they were doing it.

Senator OVERMAN. That is not why they put you in jail, is it? I wish you would get to that. I asked you why they put you in jail.

Mr. KEDDIE. I was going from Bozuluk to the orphanage, and I was going to cross the bridge, and I did not know that the Cossacks were so near on the other side, and I was arrested.

Senator OVERMAN. By the Cossacks?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; by the Red Guard. The Cossacks were coming on the other side, and they were fighting against the Red Guards. I was arrested and taken along—three of us were arrested. I was the only one that spoke Russian. We were arrested by four of the Red Guards, and they had rifles and fixed bayonets and hand grenades. They took us to prison.

Senator OVERMAN. Why?

Mr. KEDDIE. Because they thought we were engaged in English propaganda.

Mr. HUMES. How many of you were locked up?

Mr. KEDDIE. Only three of ourselves.

Mr. HUMES. You were not in there long enough to see any of your friends taken out and shot, were you?

Mr. KEDDIE. No, sir.

Mr. HUMES. You were more fortunate than others?

Mr. KEDDIE. I do not think that the Bolsheviks killed any more people than the Cossacks. I have spoken with Gen. Dutoff, and he boasted—or rather, I should not say boasted, but he mentioned—that he had signed the death warrants of 700 Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. What has become of those colleagues of yours that were arrested with you?

Mr. KEDDIE. We got out together, the three of us.

Senator NELSON. They were of the same class—Friends?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes, sir; they were Friends. One was an American young lady.

Senator NELSON. You were not caught in the draft?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I was a conscientious objector. I would just like to make another point about what I said of Moscow. When the church was disestablished—when Lenine disestablished the church—

Senator NELSON. Tell us what the German officers did. Did they not help to organize the Red Guard and did not the German prisoners join the Red Guard?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; there were German prisoners in the Red Guard, it is true.

Senator NELSON. And did not the German officers help them to organize that force?

Mr. KEDDIE. It is commonly said so.

Senator NELSON. How?

Mr. KEDDIE. It is commonly said so.

Senator NELSON. And did not the Germans, so far as they could, cooperate with the Red Guard there and with the Bolshevik government?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; many Germans actually became Bolsheviks—really became believers in this system of government.

Senator NELSON. Evidently some of them have carried it back to Germany now, according to last accounts.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; that was done through the propaganda which was carried on by Lenine and Trotzky. They sent newspapers over into the German trenches, and while the German troops were fraternizing so well with the Russian troops. Then they ordered the German troops over to the other front, and the troops said they had had enough, and a revolution broke out in the interior of Germany and the Bolsheviks saved 500,000 American boys' lives. The American military authorities said the war would last another year.

Mr. HUMES. You have been reading Albert Rhys Williams's book?

Mr. KEDDIE. I do not know him.

Mr. HUMES. You are quoting his figures?

Mr. KEDDIE. I have never met him.

Mr. HUMES. But you have read his book?

Mr. KEDDIE. I have read his book.

Mr. HUMES. And you are adopting his figures and his argument, are you not?

Mr. KEDDIE. I am not accepting his facts at all.

Mr. HUMES. But you are adopting his figures exactly.

Mr. KEDDIE. I have never met him at all.

Senator NELSON. Have you written a book on this subject?

Mr. KEDDIE. No.

Senator NELSON. Have you written any newspaper articles?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; but the newspapers would not print them. [Laughter.]

Senator NELSON. Have you made any speeches on the subject?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I have not gone out to speak on Bolshevism.

Senator NELSON. Who pays your expenses?

Mr. KEDDIE. I have not had any payment for working in Russia at all. I am not having any payment.

Senator NELSON. You are working at your own expense? All that you have done is at your own expense?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I have not had any salary. The Friends have settled for my food and traveling.

Senator NELSON. Did anybody connected with the Bolshevik government, while you were over there, furnish you with any funds?

Mr. KEDDIE. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. Or did you get any food cards from them?

Mr. KEDDIE. They helped. It did not make any difference to us whether under the Czar's government or the Czecho-Slovaks or the Bolsheviks; things went on much the same.

Senator NELSON. You had four classes of food cards there? There were those who were actually laborers who were given a full ration, and the others did not get so much? Capitalists would get nothing?

Mr. KEDDIE. There are no capitalists, at all.

Senator NELSON. Did you get any food cards at all?

Senator OVERMAN. Wait a minute. You say there are no capitalists. A man who has got a horse or a white shirt is a capitalist.

Mr. KEDDIE. What do you mean by a capitalist?

Senator NELSON. You say there are not any capitalists there.

Mr. KEDDIE. I would say that a capitalist is a man who has some big factory, and his profit is made cooperatively, but he holds the profits privately. In other words, through the money he has invested he is living largely on interest. That is what I understand by a capitalist.

Senator NELSON. What property do you own?

Mr. KEDDIE. What property do I own?

Senator NELSON. Yes; what are you the owner of?

Mr. KEDDIE. Where? Whereabouts do you mean?

Senator NELSON. I mean anywhere. What property do you own?

Mr. KEDDIE. I do not know that I have got very much. I have not got very much worth talking about.

Senator NELSON. Oh, have you not?

Mr. KEDDIE. No.

Senator NELSON. Are you not afraid of losing it when you go over to Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I do not think so. What I want to say is this. If you are a man and you go down in a coal mine and work, or if you go in some factory and work hard, and you get $20 a week or so, I want to know what chance you have of learning to appreciate music and literature and ethics and religion, and how you can understand and admire the beauties of nature, and how the lilies of the field grow?

Senator OVERMAN. We take care of that in the coal mines. They have reading rooms and libraries and facilities of every kind. You are not posted on the situation here.

Do you want everybody to know poetry and to know how to play on the piano?

Mr. KEDDIE. I want everybody to have enough leisure so that they can develop the spark of God that is in them.

Senator OVERMAN. You do not want everybody to be a poet and a scholar?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; but I want everybody to have the chance to enjoy things.

Senator OVERMAN. You want to give them a chance?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Do you know that in building up our western country the Government gave our people free lands; that they said to them, "If you will cultivate these lands for five years and make them your homes, we will give you a quarter section, 160 acres of land, for nothing?" That was a great encouragement.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Now if your Bolshevik government, of which you are a missionary, should come in here——

Mr. KEDDIE. I am not a missionary of the Bolshevik government.

Senator NELSON (continuing). And confiscate all that property and take it away from those people, do you think our people would enjoy that?

Mr. KEDDIE. I am not a missionary for the Bolsheviks. I do not think that the United States people want it. The United States is a young country, and there is an opportunity for lands opening up.

Senator NELSON. What countries do you think want it, and need it? You think Russia needs it?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; old countries, like England and France, require a new social order.

Senator NELSON. Something of the Bolshevik kind?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; not of the Bolshevik kind.

Senator NELSON. You think that is only good for Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. I did not say it was good for Russia, even. I say that to create a new social order in Russia is a good thing, where you are going to give 90 per cent of the people a chance where they did not have it before.

Senator NELSON. And the way to create a new social order is to take away all the incentive for the acquirement of private property?

Mr. KEDDIE. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. And to say to the poor Russian peasant, "You can cultivate this land and till it and work as hard as you are a mind to, but never in God's world can you own a foot of it!" That is your gospel? That is your doctrine?

Mr. KEDDIE (looking at his wrist watch). I wish a chance to speak.

Senator NELSON. That is the Bolshevik doctrine. That is your doctrine? That is socialism. You are a socialist. Oh, take your wrist watch there, and take your 10 minutes.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes. You know that in Scotland the northern clans used to go out and clean out the other clans whenever the weather was good, and take everything they had. Then, after we got a little more education, they had one king. Then Scotland used to do the same thing to the English; the Scotch went over the border; and then the English went back over the border, and so it went on back and forth. Then they had one king and a union of the crowns.

In other words, the point has passed when I can go into your house and take what I want by violence. We are past that stage. But we have not yet passed the stage where if I have a better brain than you, by our present legal machinery I can starve you out or starve other people out by the superior use of my brain; I can dominate and rule and starve out other people, and do it legally. That is what I want to correct.

Senator NELSON. The Bolshevik government has not yet reached that stage?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; they—

Senator NELSON. They do not hesitate to go into private houses and drive people out and occupy them.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes. I am against that.

Senator NELSON. We have evidence before this committee here of men who have seen it. They drove the people out of their houses and took possession and occupied them—the Red Guards.

Mr. KEDDIE. Not at all. Not at all!

Senator NELSON. Oh, yes; they did.

Mr. KEDDIE. Not at all.

Senator OVERMAN. We had better take a recess here.

Mr. HUMES. This is the only witness we have for to-day, Senator.

Senator OVERMAN. Very well; if there is no other witness, go ahead and let us finish with him.

Mr. KEDDIE. I was going to tell you about the disestablishment of the church. When Lenine disestablished the church, they took over about 400,000,000 acres of land and gave it to the peasants.

Senator NELSON. He did not give it to the peasants, but he gave it to the State.

Mr. KEDDIE. Well, the State or the peasants. If I am saying anything that is wrong, just let me finish, please.

Senator NELSON. You are misrepresenting it when you say he took it from the church and gave it to the peasants.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; he did.

Senator NELSON. He did not give it to the peasants.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; he did.

Senator NELSON. He did not give them title to it.

Mr. KEDDIE. They have title to it as long as they work it.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. KEDDIE. Well, the Greek Orthodox Church organized a protest against the taking over of those 400,000,000 acres of land. I was in Moscow at that particular time. It was a beautiful Sunday morning when they had this procession. The sun was shining perfectly. Their protest took the form of a procession. The priests and lots of people came out, with all the rich ritual and beauty of the Greek Orthodox Church, the priests clad in their robes and with their miters on their heads, and carrying their icons, with lighted candles in their hands, chanting hymns and prayers, protesting against the land of the church being taken away from them. The Bolsheviks organized a reply to them. Their reply took the form of a bill, about this wide and this long [indicating]. It was in the form of a questionnaire. One question was, "Why is it that the Greek Orthodox Church, the followers of the Prince of Peace, are protesting at her lands being taken away from her? Why is it that the Greek Orthodox Church, the followers of the Prince of Peace, did not protest when 3,000,000 of her sons were shot down on the western front?" Around each of these bills, of course, there were little meetings going on.

Now this government that the Bolsheviks have, made up of men like Lenine and Trotzky and Lunacharsky and Radek and Maxim Gorky, they are commonly referred to as being atheists. I do not know whether they are or not, but with regard to their religion, there is more humanity in their religion and their program of Bolshevism—there is more humanity in it—than there is in our Christianity.

Senator NELSON. Oh; in the Bolshevik government?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; and in their system of social order, and their program.

Senator OVERMAN. That is what they say also, I suppose, that there is more humanity and more religion in their order than in the religion of Jesus Christ.

Senator NELSON. Now it was all right to confiscate the lands of the church, but suppose they had gone on and done as our Government does, after they had taken those lands, said to the peasants, "Here, we will give you these lands if you will settle on them and cultivate them; we will give you small homes that you can call your own, that you can live on and make them your own property and transmit them to your children, if you are industrious." That is the way we do in America, but that is not what they do under the Bolshevik system; and yet you are in favor of that system.

Senator OVERMAN. Answer the question which Senator Sterling will ask you, if you can.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. When the Bolsheviks send the Red Guard around to a prison and take a man out who is in that prison, no formal charge having been made against him at all, he not having a chance to be heard at all, and shoot him, do you think that is an evidence of a spirit of religion higher than the spirit of our Christian religion? Now, answer that question?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I think it is not a higher spirit of religion. I agree with you.

Senator STERLING. Well, that has been done again and again, has it not? That is quite a common procedure, is it not, and has been for more than a year, now, on the part of the Bolshevik government?

Mr. KEDDIE. I think the only man who can throw a stone at the Bolsheviks—

Senator STERLING. Now, answer that question. I am asking you whether as a matter of fact that has not been a common procedure?

Mr. KEDDIE. I say—

Senator OVERMAN. Answer the question.

Mr. KEDDIE. I do not think that is as common as the newspapers make it out to have been.

Senator STERLING. You do not think so?

Mr. KEDDIE. No, sir.

Senator STERLING. Did you hear the testimony here of men who have been in Russian prisons, and have seen men taken out by the Red Guard to be shot without trial or a chance to be heard?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I did not hear that evidence.

Senator STERLING. No. But if it were true, would you regard it as evidence of a spirit better than that of our Christian religion?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; certainly not. I could not. You know that perfectly well.

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KEDDIE. But what I do say is, there is only one man that can afford to throw a stone at the Bolsheviks, and he is the man who says that all the slaughter that has been going on in Europe is wrong. He is the only man to cast stones at the Bolsheviks. Of course, I agree with you that the Bolsheviks have no right to use force, and I regret it as much as you do.

Senator STERLING. You are a conscientious objector, are you not?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. And you were not in the war because you were a conscientious objector?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Your brothers in England and in Scotland were fighting for the freedom and the civilization of the world, were they not, and against German autocracy and militarism?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; but—

Senator STERLING. You did not sympathize with them at all in that fight, did you?

Mr. KEDDIE. I did not——

Senator STERLING. You were a conscientious objector?

Mr. KEDDIE. Excuse me.

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. KEDDIE. I did sympathize with them, but I did not agree with them.

Senator STERLING. You did not agree with them?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes. My friends have gone out and been killed, and they did what they thought was right, and I also did what I thought was right.

Senator STERLING. You did not think that the freedom that Great Britain had stood for and had fought for, and the constitutional government she had fought for, was worth protecting against German autocracy, or that the democracy of France was worth protecting against the onslaughts of Prussianism?

Mr. KEDDIE. I think that the German people could have settled the German Government in the same way as the Russian people have done.

Senator STERLING. The German people?

Mr. KEDDIE. That they could have overthrown militarism.

Senator STERLING. If it had not been for Prussian propaganda in Russia, and if it had not been for the treachery of some of the high authorities in Russia, do you not know as a matter of fact that the Russian army would have stood up and would have helped in this war, and would have gone on and won victories?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I do not agree, sir.

Senator STERLING. You said a while ago that the revolution——

Mr. KEDDIE. Evolved.

Senator STERLING. Evolved?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. You think it did evolve?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. You think it was not precipitated?

Mr. KEDDIE. No, sir.

Senator STERLING. Do you not think that the Russian army, had it been furnished with supplies and munitions and with arms and guns, would have been an active factor in the war, and it was because whole divisions were sent into action barehanded and without arms, that the revolution spread to the soldiers as it did, at the time it did?

Senator OVERMAN. Now, answer that.

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I do not agree. I feel that there is some truth, of course, in the military situation, the Russian troops not being well equipped—that that helped them to lose some of their morale.

Senator OVERMAN. When you went over to Russia from this country in 1916——

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN (continuing). You were a conscientious objector?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. You were not in sympathy with your own Government in this fight and in going into this war; is that true?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Then you went over there, and you have been preaching as a conscientious objector, and you were sent there to preach these doctrines?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I did not preach anything. I simply worked; because we were not allowed to say anything at all. When Friends go over either to France or Russia they take in hand not to discuss questions of peace or war, or to go out of their way to take any occasion or to say anything at all. We have never done so. We had no political work.

Mr. HUMES. In private discussions you discussed these matters with people you came in contact with?

Mr. KEDDIE. We talked with people.

Mr. HUMES. You communicated your views in private conversations with people you came in contact with?

Mr. KEDDIE. Of course, when you talk with people, one is liable to show their point of view; but we did not, as I say, go out and talk politics, at all.

Senator OVERMAN. Your point of view was against the interests of your government at that time?

Mr. KEDDIE. As far as the question of war was concerned.

Senator OVERMAN. In that you would not fight; but you would go out and talk against the war?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I went there to help these people.

Senator OVERMAN. To help them to get a new revolution?

Mr. KEDDIE. No, to help the Russian refugees. I knew something of the language, and that is how I went.

Senator STERLING. You were investigated after you were thrown into prison, there?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Were you visited in prison by some inspector or government officials?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; it happened like this, that the commandant, as they called it in Russia, the officer in charge of the prison, was not there, he was called away, I do not know whether to battle or some front, but he was not there, and there was a lady in charge, and she was a young Jewish lady, and we told her we were going up to the orphanage.

Senator STERLING. You were going where?

Mr. KEDDIE. To our orphanage, across the bridge, and we explained the work we were doing there—we were well known to the local people; they knew we were there for service, and we had no axe to grind; we took neither the side of the Czecho-Slovaks nor the Bolsheviks nor of the social revolutionists, and we did simply our work, which was principally hospital work, and country industries—and when I explained this to this lady, after a good deal of talk and trouble they allowed us out. I gave her the number of the house where we stayed.

Senator STERLING. By what route did you come away from Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. Across Siberia.

Senator STERLING. To Vladivostok.

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. Where did you land in this country, first?

Mr. KEDDIE. At Seattle.

Senator STERLING. Who paid your transportation?

Mr. KEDDIE. The Society of Friends.

Senator STERLING. They paid your transportation here?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes. I am going over to England in a week or so.

Senator OVERMAN. Let me ask you this question. You would not fight because you are a conscientious objector? You did leave your country and go to Russia and do charitable or missionary work, and you say now you hope there will be a revolution in Great Britain. Would you think as a conscientious objector that you ought to take part in that revolution?

Mr. KEDDIE. Revolution does not mean war, at all. It is just simply a change of idea. Revolution does not mean war. When you put this question you have got it behind your mind that revolution means war.

Senator OVERMAN. Not at all; the result of criticisms.

Mr. KEDDIE. I am against war all the time, against the use of violence. What I had reference to is just what you can read in the newspapers. There seems to be a million and a half men who are striking, three of the unions, railroad men, miners, and transport workers, which have stood together, and Lloyd George on that account has formed an industrial parliament in which they are represented.

Senator STERLING. You are a socialist, are you not?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. And a pacifist?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. And a conscientious objector?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Then you would welcome a revolution in England to overturn that Government?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; I would welcome a change which would create a new and better social order and give everybody a fair chance to live and give the spark of God that is in them a chance to develop.

Senator OVERMAN. And you would welcome a revolution over there that would carry out the ideas of the Bolsheviks?

Mr. KEDDIE. That would carry out better social ideals. Do not put those words in my mouth. I did not say them. I say I stand for a system that will create a better social order.

Senator OVERMAN. That is Bolshevism?

Mr. KEDDIE. It is not what you understand by Bolshevism.

Senator OVERMAN. What you understand?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Bolshevism as you understand it.

Mr. KEDDIE. The ideal Bolshevism; yes.

Senator OVERMAN. And you would welcome a revolution in England to get that kind of government?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Stand aside, unless you have something more to say. I am glad to hear anything you have to say voluntarily.

Mr. KEDDIE. Well, I would just like to say a little more about the situation in Siberia, if I may; that the part over there played by the allied troops is not satisfactory from any point of view. I do think that the allied troops should be withdrawn because you are causing dissatisfaction among the troops that are there, because they are saying, as I heard some say, "We signed on to fight Germany. We did not sign to fight the Bolsheviki."

Senator OVERMAN. Americans said that?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; they were British that said that. I do not know that the situation there—the part played by the Japanese is a very bad one indeed. For instance, we have a Cossack Ataman at Khabarovsk, which town lies to the north of Vladivostok. There the Cossack Ataman Kalmikoff reigns like a regular Robin Hood.

Senator OVERMAN. I do not think we should allow you to state anything about any other government. That is not proper here. You can speak of our Government.

Mr. KEDDIE. I am speaking of the point of fact that trouble lies there. This Kalmikoff is a Cossack Ataman who fought the Bolsheviki. And in Chita also there is a Cossack Ataman, Semyonov, who has also fought the Bolsheviki; and both these generals refuse to recognize Kolchak. I have been told by people who have been up at Habarovsk, who are in the American Government, in the War Trade Board in Vladivostok, that the Japanese are financing these Cossacks and keeping the trouble going. Now, the same people say the Japanese are there because the allies are there. The Japanese are playing a very sinister rôle. The Japanese in Japan are very nice people, but only by withdrawing the allied troops will you get the Japanese troops out of Siberia.

That is what I advocate, that we accelerate our social evolution and so prevent a chaotic revolution. Accelerate the social evolution. I am against unscientific revolution. If the hearts of the masses are not changed by love there will be no real improvement. I do urge that the allied troops be withdrawn out of Russia and Siberia.

Senator STERLING. While you are on that question: You think it was a mistake on the part of the allies and Japan to send a force to protect the stores at Vladivostok from being captured by the Bolshevists and the Germans together, do you?

Mr. KEDDIE. If they went——

Senator STERLING. Just answer the question. Do you think it was a mistake?

Mr. KEDDIE. I am going to ask if they went——

Senator OVERMAN. Answer yes or no, and then explain.

Mr. KEDDIE. They should have taken the stores away when they went there. They have had plenty of time and could have done so.

Senator STERLING. Our country and the allies were at war with Germany at the time?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. At the time the troops were sent there?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes, Senator; but since the armistice——

Senator STERLING. Were they not justified in sending a force there to Vladivostok to protect the supplies and the munitions of war that had been landed there for the purpose of fighting Germany in Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. Why, I say they had plenty of time to take them away.

Senator STERLING. Were they justified in sending forces there to protect those supplies?

Mr. KEDDIE. I am against sending troops anywhere and everywhere.

Senator STERLING. You are?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Do you think the allies were justified in sending a force up to the northern coast, to Archangel and to the Murmansk coast, in order to prevent the establishment of a German submarine base there and to guard that coast from German invasion, 'or were they wholly unjustified in doing that?

Mr. KEDDIE. I am not in charge of the allied military policy. You should ask the gentleman who is in charge.

Senator STERLING. But you, I suppose, would be opposed to it because you are opposed to force anyway?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. And you are opposed to these nations protecting their own interests against Germany with whom they were at war at the time, and against the landing of any forces for that purpose?

Mr. KEDDIE. I tell you that I believe that the working people of the world have no reason to go out and kill each other.

Senator OVERMAN. That is not answering his question.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Keddie, you were opposed to the Russian provisional government and to the Bolshevik government reorganizing and organizing a military force for the purpose of further resisting the German aggressions or carrying on the war against Germany. were you not?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. And in your private conversations over in Russia you did not hesitate to express your beliefs, did you?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; I have tried not to hide my ideals in any way. What I believed to be true I said.

Mr. HUMES. You did not try to hide them?

Mr. KEDDIE. No.

Mr. HUMES. In other words you left your fellow-citizens and neighbors who had gone to the front to fight with Germany, and as a conscientious objector left there and went to Russia, and while you were in Russia you tried to aid——

Mr. KEDDIE. Not at all. I did not. That is unfair. It is untrue.

Mr. HUMES. I will modify it. While in Russia you frequently expressed the belief and conveyed the idea—you just got through saying that you did not conceal——

Mr. KEDDIE. That does not mean that I freely expressed everything——

Mr. HUMES. You did not hesitate to say to the Russian people when you met them in private conversation that the war ought to stop, and by so doing you sacrificed possibly the lives and the military success of the soldiers of this country and your own neighbors and your own fellow citizens; and then you came to the United States to further advocate from the public platform and in speeches you have advocated the policy of that government in Russia that you encouraged while you were in Russia to withdraw from military operations against Germany.

Mr. KEDDIE. I tell you what I have advocated——

Mr. HUMES. Is that not a fact?

Mr. KEDDIE. I have advocated——

Mr. HUMES. Just answer the question.

Mr. KEDDIE. I have advocated the gospel of the Prince of Peace. That is what I have advocated.

Mr. HUMES. Answer the question.

Senator OVERMAN. Answer the question.

Mr. KEDDIE. I have answered the question.

Mr. HUMES. Is the statement I have made not correct?

Mr. KEDDIE. No.

Mr. HUMES. Wherein is it wrong? What did I indicate in that statement that is not correct?

Mr. KEDDIE. You intended to convey that I went about talking, and tried to propagate my ideas in Russia. I tell you that before we went there we took in hand not to engage in any political organization or propagate ideas publicly, or anything like that at all.

Senator OVERMAN. He did not ask you about the organization. He said individually. And you have already said that you talked your own sentiments freely.

Mr. KEDDIE. I did not talk my own sentiments freely.

Mr. HUMES. You just got through saying a moment ago that you did not hide your views and that you did not hesitate to express your own views to anyone in private conversation that you came in contact with. Is that true?

Mr. KEDDIE. That means that I did not hide my views.

Mr. HUMES. And you told other people what your views were?

Mr. KEDDIE. I did not go about for the purpose of spreading my ideas.

Mr. HUMES. You did tell a few people?

Mr. KEDDIE. A few people.

Mr. HUMES. And you lent as much influence——

Mr. KEDDIE. No.

Mr. HUMES. To the withdrawal of the Russian Government from military affairs as you felt you dared to, under the terms under which your organization had gone to Russia when you got your passports, did you not?

Mr. KEDDIE. You are not putting it in the correct way at all. You are trying to convey a wrong and false impression.

Mr. HUMES. I do not want to convey any false impression. I want to find out what you did do. You did everything to convey your views and your notions to the people in Russia that you could without openly violating the promise you had given at the time you secured your passports?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; that is so.

Mr. HUMES. And you went just as far as you could?

Mr. KEDDIE. I did not go far at all. I did not go "just as far" or anything of the kind. I simply went about my work and did what I thought was correct.

Mr. HUMES. And any influence that you had at all in Russia as affecting the military course of the Bolshevik government was used to prevent a further continuance of Russia in the war, to the detriment of your own country, to the detriment of your own fellow citizens and your own neighbors who were in the English military forces.

Mr. KEDDIE. That is not so.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you tell any of those soldiers that you were opposed to war?

Mr. KEDDIE. Any of those who were associated with us?

Senator OVERMAN. Did you tell any of the soldiers engaged on the lines fighting the Germans, in conversation or otherwise, that you were opposed to war?

Mr. KEDDIE. No.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you go out among the soldiers and spread it?

Mr. KEDDIE. No.

Senator OVERMAN. Not out on the lines?

Mr. KEDDIE. No; never at the Russian western front.

Senator OVERMAN. You did not tell them that in the interior, away from the front?

Mr. KEDDIE. Tell them what?

Senator OVERMAN. What did you tell them about war—about being opposed to war?

Mr. KEDDIE. Did not tell them anything. We simply did our work, and ran those hospitals.

Senator OVERMAN. You have already said that you freely discussed those matters when people talked with you about it.

Mr. KEDDIE. Certainly. One might talk to one or two. You, Senator, are trying to create an impression that is not true.

Senator NELSON. You have stated that you are opposed to revolution by force?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Why do you favor this Bolshevik revolution in Russia?

Mr. KEDDIE. I am against the use of force.

Senator NELSON. I thought you were preaching justification; that they should be let alone.

Mr. KEDDIE. No.

Senator NELSON. Your idea is that we should keep our hands off and let that revolution that is going on by means of the Red Guard go on—that is what you said—and keep our hands off; that the allies should withdraw and give them their own sweet will. Is not that your contention?

Mr. KEDDIE. What I do say is this, that the allies ought to be withdrawn for the benefit of the allies and of Russia.

Senator NELSON. So that the Red Guard could go on freely. Is not that the effect of it?

Senator OVERMAN. I would like to know something about your history before you entered this work. What was your business?

Mr. KEDDIE. I was a tea taster. I was in a Quaker firm.

Senator OVERMAN. Whereabouts?

Mr. KEDDIE. In London.

Senator OVERMAN. How long did you live in London?

Mr. KEDDIE. About three years.

Senator OVERMAN. What did you do before you went to London?

Mr. KEDDIE. I was in the tea business.

Senator OVERMAN. Whereabouts?

Mr. KEDDIE. In Edinburgh.

Senator OVERMAN. How long have you been a tea taster?

Mr. KEDDIE. That is the only business that I have been an expert of.

Senator OVERMAN. Were you raised in Scotland?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. Whereabouts?

Mr. KEDDIE. Edinburgh.

Senator OVERMAN. Raised in Edinburgh?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

There is one point that we have not talked about; that is the co-operative movement in Russia. That is the most hopeful thing in Russia. There are something like 50,000 cooperative societies.

Senator NELSON. That was in existence under the Czar's government?

Mr. KEDDIE. It was looked upon as a hotbed of revolution under the Czar's government.

Senator NELSON. They had the cooperative system before that.

Mr. KEDDIE. It was started in 1865.

Senator NELSON. It was going on in Russia before the revolutionary government?

Mr. KEDDIE. But it only came forward since the revolution.

Mr. HUMES. And the leaders of the cooperative movement in Russia are opposed to Bolshevism, are they not?

Mr. KEDDIE. Some are and some are not.

Mr. HUMES. When did you become a Quaker?

Mr. KEDDIE. I am not a Quaker. I never joined the society, as I thought it was not right to join the society after the war was on.

Mr. HUMES. When did you come into sympathy with the Quaker Church, or the Friends' Society?

Mr. KEDDIE. I worked in a Quaker firm, and the ideals I held I had held long before the war.

Senator NELSON. I supposed you were a conscientious objector because you were a Quaker?

Mr. KEDDIE. I held Quaker ideals, but I am not a born Quaker.

Mr. HUMES. You are a conscientious objector not because of religious faith?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; because of religious faith.

Mr. HUMES. Because of your socialistic ideas?

Mr. KEDDIE. Do not say that. It was because of my religious faith. You know perfectly that everything I have said this afternoon is on religious grounds.

Senator OVERMAN. Tell us on what religious grounds you are. Do not get excited.

Mr. KEDDIE. I am not excited.

Senator OVERMAN. If you want to be emphatic you have a right. What is the religion that makes you a conscientious objector?

Mr. KEDDIE. The religion of the Prince of Peace. I worship the religion of the Prince of Peace, who tells us not to go out and fight.

Senator NELSON. But you say the Bolshevik religion is better than the Christian religion. You said that a little while ago, that it was better than the Christian religion.

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I did not. I did not say that. What I did say was that there was more humanity over there in the system they were trying to evolve than there is in Christianity. That is what I said.

That does not mean ideal Christianity. I mean Christianity as it is to-day in the Christian churches.

Senator OVERMAN. Most of our boys who went over there did believe in the doctrine of Jesus Christ, and they did not have any conscientious objection to fighting for their country.

Mr. KEDDIE. No.

Senator OVERMAN. What peculiar part of this religion keeps you from fighting with your brothers? We interpret various things differently.

Mr. KEDDIE. I yield to no one in my admiration for those who fight if they believe in it. But I wish the same respect for my own opinions.

Mr. HUMES. If this religious belief is so all-controlling, how does it come that you have never affiliated with the denomination that believes in those things?

Mr. KEDDIE. I had been brought up a member of the Church of Scotland.

Mr. HUMES. And yet you became affiliated with the Society of Friends after the declaration of war and proclaimed yourself a conscientious objector.

Mr. KEDDIE. No; I tell you I was working with a Quaker firm before the war started.

Mr. HUMES. You were never sufficiently convinced until after the war broke out?

Mr. KEDDIE. I have not joined the society yet. Please make that point plain.

Mr. HUMES. Well, then, you are not because of membership in any organization a conscientious objector?

Mr. KEDDIE. It is because I have a religious concern.

Mr. HUMES. You are not a member of any religious faith the tenets of which are opposed to war?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes, I am; the Christian faith.

Mr. HUMES. Will you show any denomination or church, any religious denomination—

Mr. KEDDIE. I am not talking about the church; I am talking about the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Mr. HUMES. That is your viewpoint.

Mr. KEDDIE. That is all I can speak from.

Mr. HUMES. The church of which you are a member does not—

Senator NELSON. The Church of Scotland is Presbyterian.

Mr. HUMES. The Church of Scotland does not have as one of its tenets opposition to war?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes, it has.

Senator NELSON. No; you are mistaken. The church does not have it.

Mr. HUMES. I would like to see that.

Mr. KEDDIE. Give me a New Testament.

Senator NELSON. Let me set you right. The Church of Scotland is not opposed to war, but there was a branch of seceders, who called themselves Covenanters, who are opposed to war. You must either be a Covenanter or belong to the Society of Friends. You are not a real Presbyterian. They are a fighting people.

Senator OVERMAN. I can not understand how you got out of going over. You state you are not affiliated with the Friends. What statement did you make when you asked to be released?

Mr. KEDDIE. I simply argued my case out before the tribunal.

Senator STERLING. Did you say you were a member of the Society of Friends?

Mr. KEDDIE. There are members of the society who are in France.

Senator STERLING. Did you say that you were a member of a religious organization?

Mr. KEDDIE. I stated that I was a member of the Church of Scotland.

Senator STERLING. Did you state that the church was opposed to war and therefore you were?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; we had the question up for the best part of an hour.

Senator STERLING. Do you know the creed of the church?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Do you know whether or not there is a statement in there that they are opposed to war?

Mr. KEDDIE. They are brought up to worship the Prince of Peace.

Senator STERLING. But is there anything in the creed against war, or prohibiting it?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; the Christian Gospel.

Senator STERLING. Is that a part of the written creed of the church?

Mr. KEDDIE. It is supposed to be.

Senator STERLING. It is supposed to be?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes.

Senator STERLING. You have not answered my question. You say you know the creed, but you are not able to state that that is a part of the written formal creed of the Church of Scotland, of the Presbyterian Church, and you must know that it is not. You are deriving all your notions from something you believe is to be found in the Bible.

Mr. KEDDIE. That is true.

Senator STERLING. You are not deriving it from the creed—the formal creed—of the church of which you say you are a member. It does not have any such proposition at all?

Mr. KEDDIE. So you argue from that that you think the Presbyterian Church does not believe in the Christian Gospel?

Senator STERLING. No; I was not arguing, I was simply saying that the Presbyterian Church in its creed does not oppose war.

Mr. HUMES. We are convinced that you do not know what the Presbyterian Church does represent.

Mr. KEDDIE. Do I understand you to mean that I do not understand what Christianity is?

Senator NELSON. Do you not know that the bulk of the Scotch are Presbyterians, and that they have gone by the hundreds of thousands into the British Army and camps?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; but a lot of them are conscientious objectors.

Senator NELSON. You are the only black sheep among them?

Mr. KEDDIE. It is possible.

Senator NELSON. Let me ask you another question. It was the doctrine of my ancestors a thousand years ago or so that the man who died in battle went straight to Valhalla or Heaven. Do you not believe that our soldiers, American and English soldiers, who fought and died in this great war, went straight to Valhalla?

Mr. KEDDIE. Yes; I think they have just as good a chance as anybody; that is, if they acted according to what they believe.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think they would have a better chance to go to Valhalla than you?

Mr. KEDDIE. I do not know about it.

(Thereupon, at 2.20 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 6, 1919, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

THURSDAY, MARCH 6, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), Nelson, and Sterling.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee will come to order. Call your first witness.

Mr. HUMES. Col. Robins.

TESTIMONY OF MR. RAYMOND ROBINS.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Mr. HUMES. Where do you reside?

Mr. ROBINS. Chicago; 1437 Ohio Street.

Mr. HUMES. What is your business?

Mr. ROBINS. Social worker.

Mr. HUMES. What was your connection with the American Red Cross?

Mr. ROBINS. I went to Russia as one of the 13 majors in the service of the Red Cross, was in that capacity for some three months, and then for some six months was the commander of the American Red Cross mission in Russia.

Mr. HUMES. Will you state the period of time during which you were in Russia?

Mr. ROBINS. From July, 1917, until the 1st of June, 1918.

Mr. HUMES. That was practically a year, then?

Mr. ROBINS. Something like that.

Mr. HUMES. Practically a year.

Mr. ROBINS. Eleven months.

Mr. HUMES. Yes. During the time that you were in Russia, what parts of Russia did you visit, and how much time, approximately, did you spend in the various parts of Russia?

Mr. ROBINS. I was in Siberia twice, on the whole I suppose three weeks in two different periods; in southern Russia about a week; in Petrograd some six or seven months; in Moscow some three months, roughly, and in Vologda, several visits of a week at a time.

Senator OVERMAN. I did not understand; when did you leave Russia?

Mr. ROBINS. I left Russia the 1st of June, 1918, Senator.

Mr. HUMES. Then you arrived in Russia after the March revolution?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMES. You arrived there in June or the 1st of July following the March revolution?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; in July following the March revolution.

Mr. HUMES. And what part of Russia were you in during the period from your arrival up to the November revolution?

Mr. ROBINS. I was in Siberia part of that time, and in southern Russia part of that time, but by far the larger portion of the time in Petrograd.

Mr. HUMES. And where were you at the time of and during the November revolution?

Mr. ROBINS. In Petrograd and its environs.

Mr. HUMES. Now, Colonel, will you state to the committee in your own way just what the internal conditions were in Russia as you saw them from the time of your arrival, dividing it into periods; first up to the time of the Bolsheviki revolution in November, and then from that time on up to the time of your departure?

Mr. ROBINS. With the consent of the committee and yourself, Major, I would like to just make, as is suggested by the question, a statement chronologically and in relation to the subject matter. If I might make this first preliminary statement, without interruption except where it seems wise, on this theory, that I may save your time, because I may answer a great many of the questions as I go through; and then afterwards, if I might be subjected to as careful a cross-examination as you can make.

Senator OVERMAN. We do not propose to cross-examine you. We just want the truth.

Mr. ROBINS. Sometimes that method brings out the truth, Senator, better than any other.

Senator OVERMAN. You go ahead with your statement, and we will not interrupt you.

Mr. ROBINS. Reaching Russia as a member of the Red Cross mission, I was assigned to the question of food supply and refugees—war refugees—as my particular task. In the course of this first service, my first weeks in Russia, work in Siberia and work in southern Russia, in the grain districts of the Ukraine, I developed a conviction, which I communicated to my superiors, that there was ample food in Russia to feed the people, and that the whole question was one of assembling and distribution from centers of surplus to centers of deficit; that that task was greatly interfered with by the failure of the general economic and transportation system in Russia to function under revolutionary control. The Minister-President Kerensky had removed a few of the chief officials of the old autocratic bureaucracy, but had left the bureaucracy practically intact, dealing with the railroads and public functions generally. This old group never looked happily upon the revolution; the group that you are familiar with, Senator, under the classification of “penniless plutes;” the men who work with the rich and sympathize with the rich without knowing quite why, and feel that that is the order that ought to go on. They were not in sympathy with the revolution, and engaged in practices, sabotage, misplacing orders; not leaving their tasks, but just not functioning.

In these first weeks I came upon the fact that the provisional government had not reached down its roots into the life of Russia as a new social control or political binder. It was a sort of paper and consent affair superimposed on top, supported by the bayonets in Petrograd and Moscow and some other places, more or less loyally. I met the facts of this situation, having my pockets full of Kerensky credentials, seeking to deal with the particular matters in my department of work, going to little local village folk and town situations, asking to get these orders across, and having them laugh at the Kerensky credentials and say, "See the chairman of the soviet." I at that time really did not know what the soviet was. I had heard the word but did not know anything about it. I said, "What is the soviet?" They said, "It is the workmen's, soldiers', and peasants' deputies." I said, "That is a revolutionary organization. I want the civil organization, the Duma, the zemstvos, volosts—the regular civil power." They said, "That does not amount to anything. You had better see the chairman of the soviet." In every instance, Senator, when I saw the leader of the local soviet and he agreed to do what I wanted done—not because of the Kerensky orders but because of his idea that it ought to be done—I got done what I sought to have done. If it was a train that I wanted, I got the train. If it was the six wagons to carry the grain from the village to the station, I got the six wagons. I was educated in the consciousness of the soviet by the actual delivery of results in contradistinction to the provisional government authorities.

When I first met the failure of my credentials to get results, like any person accustomed to getting results I sought to find out where power was in the existing political and social system that was outdoors in Russia. In that inquiry I came at every point upon the remains of what had been a valid social control. Whether you liked it or not, the old autocracy had delivered the goods. The Czar, as head of the church and of the state, head of the autocratic system, head of the secret police, head of the Black Hundred, head of the Cossack Guard, had carried by mystical authority on the one hand and by a very definite Cossack whip and sword on the other hand a very real sanction in Russia. When the revolution went over it it destroyed that sanction absolutely. It had only a small number implicated in it, merely a very small group exercising control from the center, and it just simply was utterly destroyed. Russia had the binder of the national life dissolved. Russia was just simply lying outdoors, every group beginning to do that which was right in its own eyes, and this Duma government or revolt government—revolutionary legislative government—and the Kerensky government, the provisional government, neither had gotten down into the provinces and into the villages. But, side by side with the old, dead institutions, side by side with the effort to make the provisional government function, there was growing up in Russian life the soviet, a definite revolutionary social control binding together a very large proportion of the people of Russia, as it seemed to me—the workmen and peasants and soldiers. That is the new social control. I being interested, because I had to work with it, to find out what its nature was, how long in the nature of things I could expect it to endure, what might be expected of its cooperation, both in the actual service of the Russian people and in the service of the allied cause, which was, of course, always in the back of our thoughts, as it should have been, I tried to find out why it was there; and if I know the facts, it was there for two reasons: First, because of the workmen's and soldiers' and peasants' revolutionary organizations in cities, an entirely modern thing, dating back to 1905 for its origin—to the revolution of that period—Trotsky having been chairman of the soviet of Petrograd in 1905, forming one branch of the organization of the soviet, the other branch going back into the oldest Slavic history of group control, the old village mir, an institution of the village rural communities growing up in the first instance around the communal land in which the men and women of the villages met.

Senator OVERMAN. Did that grow up from the time of the freedom of the serfs?

Mr. ROBINS. Before that period, sir. It goes back in some of its ramifications nearly 200 years, and it was a sort of town meeting, both broader and narrower than our New England town meeting; broader in the fact that men and women participated with equal power and votes, narrower in the sense that it had a very restricted jurisdiction, that it was held always to local control. They did not allow delegates from one mir to another mir to grow up into provincial or wider relationships, lest it be an instrumentality of revolution. The autocracy sat vigorously upon it and restrained its local activities to matters of communal land, to matters of roads, and matters of sanitation, and the simple sort of local affairs. But there it was. The Russians had been accustomed to meet twice a year or oftener in this village mir to discuss questions. As soon as the weight of the autocracy was removed from above the village mir grew up overnight into district, provincial, and finally into all-Russian size.

Senator NELSON. Was not a part of the convention of the mir the assigning of lands to the peasants for cultivation?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; communal lands.

Senator NELSON. Most of the lands were held as the property of the mir?

Mr. ROBINS. No; only a small portion of the land was so held.

Senator NELSON. I mean what the mirs had.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; always communal land, and it was always insufficient actually for the group of peasant villagers to live from, and they had to rent or work on landlord estates to supplement the product of the communal land for their own livelihood. I found this soviet power having just two centers of origin, the city revolutionary group and the old village peasant group, combining, and each assuming as it were the term of soviet, until it was practically the new form of social control in revolutionary Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. What is the meaning of "soviet"?

Mr. ROBINS. It is the Russian word for council—the local council, the people's council.

Returning to Petrograd and reporting upon the conditions, I ignorantly supposed that we could supplement the inefficient power of Kerensky's provisional government—the civil power—by an appeal to the military forces, and realizing that the assembling and distribution of food was fundamental to the preservation of the army situation, it was quite right to use whatever power was necessary. In a conference in which Savinkov, minister of war, Tchernoff, minister of agriculture, Kekrossoff, minister of finance, Minister-President Kerensky, and Commander in Chief Korniloff, commander of the force at the front, participated, it was agreed that they would appoint a food commissioner with power.

Senator STERLING. That is all under the Kerensky government?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; and some time in the month of August, 1917, this commissioner was to have been Batolin, an able and competent peasant banker, a grain buyer, a sort of embryo Armour, a man who had a fleet of ships on the Volga, some 800 agencies scattered throughout the grain regions of Siberia and the Ukraine, several banks, and an effective organization. He was competent to aid very greatly in the assembling and distribution of food, and he was willing to put his organization at the service of the government, as in our own country private organizations have been ready to serve the Government in time of war. It was further agreed that one of the members of the American Red Cross mission was to become an assistant commissioner of food with Batolin; that we were to make an appeal to Commissioner Hoover, as the food commissioner of the allies, and we were to get an assignment of certain tonnage from the allied tonnage control, so that we could get over milk and certain things necessary for Russia that could not be obtained in Russia nor in any of the adjoining lands, such as Sweden, Norway, and Denmark; that we were to then issue a proclamation to the Russian people asking for thrift and cooperation, guaranteeing them that the food problem would be met in this competent fashion; that we would master the situation, and fight for revolutionary Russia and the other free nations as against German military autocracy. That was agreed upon. The appointment of Batolin was delayed from day to day, and finally Kerensky said, "I will not make the appointment until after the conference at Moscow," which had been fixed some time previously, the all-Russian conference, the only one all-Russian conference in his régime. It was called for the latter part of August in Moscow. He said, "When we have finished with that conference the provisional government will be greatly strengthened, and we will then make the appointment and proceed with the task." Naturally I was eager to go ahead, because immediate action was necessary in the food situation in Russia. I went to Moscow. The Moscow conference presented a picture of the general situation in Russia, in a way.

Here were 1,500 delegates representing all the different groups in Russia, of the bourgeoisie, as they call it, of the business men, of the landlords, of the masters of industry, the peasants, the Cossacks, the army, the navy, the banker group, the barons, everything except the autocracy. I mean the very narrow czarist group and the grand dukes. All others were represented. You heard all kinds of voices speaking conflicting counsel, but one group in that convention in common with a note that we had heard all over Russia, was speaking coherently, knowing what it wanted, and how it intended to get it. There were 300 delegates out of the 1,500, in the center of the main floor in the great assembly, workmen's and soldiers' and peasants' delegates from the soviets of Russia. They knew what they wanted. They had a coherent note. They were aiming to take the land and give it to the working peasants, they were going to organize workmen's control of factories, and they were going to carry out the formulas of revolutionary, socialistic Russia, in which they had been educated for 40 or 50 years. In this conference, on the last day of the conference, a distinct break took place between Korniloff, commander in chief of the armies at the front, and Kerensky.

Senator OVERMAN. Was Korniloff a Cossack?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; a Cossack general. The break was between him and Minister-President Kerensky. It developed at the close of this last day with the passage of bitter words between certain Cossack officers and Kerensky, and a clash in the convention that went almost to the point of riot, showing bitter antagonism between the two groups; between the 7 per cent and the 93 per cent; between the workmen and peasants at the bottom, and the old order and power in Russia. It has been said of Korniloff that he was a reactionary, wanting to reestablish the czarist régime. My own judgment runs to the contrary, and it is only worth the fact that I thought I knew him.

Senator STERLING. In this controversy at the conference, the Kerensky group represented the soldiers and workmen?

Mr. ROBINS. In the main, yes; that would be the general cleavage. Korniloff was, in my judgment, an honest, patriotic Cossack general, a man of small abilities and large ambitions, a man who was cursed, as nearly every military man in Russia was cursed during the entire period, with the phantasm of Napoleon—he was going to be the Napoleon of the Russian situation. As soon as any military man got that into his head, then everybody else who had authority anywhere was in danger of preventing his manifest destiny, of preventing him from arriving; and the reactionary interest in that convention and outside of it surrounded Korniloff with the idea that he was going to be the master of the Russian situation, that he could bring order and discipline out of the chaos in Russia, and that he was called to this task; never once saying to Korniloff that they should establish the old order, but they intending that he should arrive at that end, using him to that result. When we got back to Petrograd Kerensky had not been strengthened by the conference in Moscow. In fact, he had been weakened.

Senator NELSON. You skipped a link. What was the outcome of that gathering at Moscow?

Mr. ROBINS. Just resolutions. There was not much outcome of any real moment, except to reveal more of the confused counsel that there was in Russia. When we got back to Petrograd Kerensky delayed the appointment of Batolin some more days for one excuse and another, until we were startled by the Korniloff adventure. That was the advance of Korniloff on Petrograd; Korniloff issuing a proclamation from headquarters of the general staff at the front, denouncing Kerensky, denouncing the provisional government, making the claim of being ready to establish discipline and order, and going forward on Petrograd with his troops. He was met at once by a counter proclamation of Kerensky; and then Kerensky, in my judgment, had no more to do with the situation, of any real influence, than a child. It has been charged that Kerensky prevented Korniloff making a successful move to reestablish law and order in Russia in the September Korniloff adventure. My judgment is that that is childishness. The real fact is this, if I know it. As soon as the advance of Korniloff began, it was from Smolny, the headquarters of the Petrograd soviet, the headquarters of the all-Russian soviet, where its executive committee was in session, and not from the Winter Palace where Kerensky and the Kerensky government headquarters was, that the orders went out to Kronstadt to mobilize the Bolshevik sailors of the soviet fleet. They were brought down to Petrograd and bivouaced on the field of Mars. By orders from Smolny they moved the cadet guards that were about the Winter Palace and put the Bolshevik sailors in their places, making of Kerensky a virtual prisoner during the four days of the Korniloff fiasco. It was from Smolny and not from the Winter Palace that the orders went out that surrounded the Hotel Astoria with Bolshevik troops who raided that hotel and arrested some 40-odd generals, alleged to be generals of the old régime; that confiscated the so-called headquarters of the counter revolution and their papers in the Astoria Hotel, and ordered the digging of trenches around the environs of Petrograd, the setting up of machine guns, and the putting of cannon on the big buildings, to greet Korniloff, to save the revolution from reaction; as was the proclamation that mobilized the Red Guard in the great factory districts of the Viborg, drilling and training them to meet this advance; and then no particle of that force was exercised, because the rise of the soviets as a culture did the job without any force. "All power to the soviets." "Comrades will not fight against the revolution." This was the power that defeated Korniloff. They came to us and urged that the American Red Cross should participate in the Korniloff adventure.

Senator OVERMAN. Only as a display of force, I suppose?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, and the commanding officer of that mission at that time said that we would not have anything to do with this adventure; that it was not calculated to reach the end that they were seeking. In discussion at the time, it was suggested—a thing that I would like to have the committee and those interested consider—that there was a conflict between the indoor, formal diplomatic and military mind, the mind of the tea tables and the boulevards, as distinguished from the outdoor, original, extraordinary facts in Russia, and if you want to get the big facts, the whole story—and it is really worth it—the most intelligent and complete understanding, you will find the conflict in testimony of sincere and honest persons, equally sincere and equally honest, determined largely by whether they got their window from the 7 per cent, whether their ears were open to the boulevards and the tea tables, to the former group that had been masters of the situation under the old régime, or whether they got their window from this outside, seething, extraordinary revolutionary Russia, which represented about 93 per cent of the people.

You will find the conflict of mind and opinion running constantly between those two factors. The 7 per cent said that Korniloff would advance with 2,000,000 Cossack soldiers; that he would advance supported by the entire bourgeoisie, supported by the chevaliers of St. George, the Army and Navy League, the allied embassies and missions, and that he was going to reestablish order. It was all right from the viewpoint of the indoor man, but that indoor man conceived Russia in the terms of a western European land, a land with an important and well-distributed middle class which everywhere, having more or less property, is implicated in law and order in their own right and is always the bulwark of law and order everywhere. There was no such group in Russia. The 7 per cent had everything worth having of material wealth, and had had it through long years, and held it by power of the Cossack whip and sword. The 93 per cent had had nothing, except to do the labor and get rather illy requited for it. Those 93 per cent now had kicked the 7 per cent down the back stairs and were in command of the situation, and were mobilized and had something like 12,000,000 rifles in their hands. How are you going to stabilize that situation by the advance of a Cossack general backed by groups of the 7 per cent? But that is what they attempted, and what happened was that Korniloff reached Pskof with less than 20,000 soldiers, Cossacks of his own tribal group. Ten thousand of those men the following morning refusing to march, Korniloff surrendered and was taken prisoner, and not a shot was fired and not a man was killed. That is the actual situation, as history will prove.

Senator OVERMAN. How near had he gotten to Petrograd?

Mr. ROBINS. About 80 miles from there. Allied representatives had participated in this adventure from a sincere and patriotic motive, able men, able in the old order but not on speaking terms with the new, believing that it was the right thing to do; listening to what the 7 per cent said, who realized that if the revolution was stabilized they would suffer the loss of their old privileges forever.

Senator STERLING. When you speak of the allied representatives, whom do you mean?

Mr. ROBINS. I mean the representatives of the allied Governments, who were there in Russia representing France, England, America, Italy.

Senator OVERMAN. You mean the ministers—the embassies?

Mr. ROBINS. The embassies and the formal commissions, with only one exception in the situation, and that was the American Red Cross. There was no conflict between us at the time; it was simply that we, having been forced into the outdoor situation, saw that a different conclusion was to be reached from what the others saw, and we preferred not to take any part in it and were, happily from our standpoint, justified by events.

After the Korniloff adventure had failed, the credit of Kerensky was reduced, because it was said everywhere among the workmen and peasants that Kerensky did not stop the counter-revolution, that they stopped it; which was true; and Kerensky was forced more and more from the real command of the situation.

It was now useless to attempt to unite the civil power under Minister-President Kerensky with the military power, and get results, by the appointment of a competent food administrator. It was suggested that it would be well to find out just how far the program of defeatism had been carried into the barracks and among the soldiers.

Senator NELSON. What do you mean by the program of defeatism? Do you apply that to the military situation between Russia and the allies?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes. I mean that there were in Russia two groups seeking to disorganize the Russian Army, one the German agents, with plenty of money, very skillful, competent people, and the other perfectly sincere but in my judgment terribly misguided Bolsheviks, who believed the class struggle was the only struggle worth talking about. Those of us who know radical thought in America have been familiar with the argument for 20 years. The form of the doctrine as applied was that the actual war between Germany—the central powers—and the allies was simply a war of contending capitalism for the markets; that the real war worth while was the war of the classes for economic power. It is the revolutionary socialist gospel, and it had a very considerable currency in Russia, aided by the design of the German agents and their money, aided by the mistaken revolutionary influence, not insincere, on the part of the Bolsheviks; but it all amounted to the same thing, namely the disorganization of affairs in Russia and the breaking of the front. I went into the barracks at the orders of my commanding officer, to speak to Russian soldiers. I spoke, on the whole, to a good many thousand, representing different arms of the service.

I would speak for 30 minutes upon the American political system, saying, "You are going to organize a democracy yourselves here, and this is the way we have done it over in America—municipal, State, national," and I would explain our party system and our convention, and relate some amusing stories and facts, and that sort of thing, with which I have been reasonably familiar, and then explain our free educational system, which awakened great interest everywhere throughout Russia. They were very eager for general education. It had been denied them throughout the generations. I spoke of the kindergarten system, on up to the State university, free to the people, men and women on an equality, and they were vastly interested. Then I spoke of why America went into the war; that America did not go into the war until after they had overthrown their Czar, that all free peoples were struggling against German militarism, and we were there to help them realize their revolutionary purpose of freedom and that together we must fight to win the world war against German military autocracy. I had credentials from the labor groups of this country, which permitted me to be introduced properly and to make the appeal as a representative labor man—for I had been a coal miner in my youth—and I spoke the language of labor. I had been active in labor debate and controversy in America, always anti-socialist, as I then was and am yet, progressive, if you please, in mind, but a step at a time progressive—a very poor sort of progressive from the point of view of some people. After I had done this we opened every one of those meetings to questions and answers, and the questions and answers would run until we were absolutely fagged out. There is no audience in the world that can endure an equal amount of punishment with a Russian audience from speakers, if I am any judge. I would answer these questions.

Sometimes it would go to the point of riot, when we would have real difficulties, but usually there was a certain measure of good will at the conclusion. In those controversies we found out not what the boulevards said the workingman, the peasant, the politician, inside the rank and file, was thinking, but what he actually was thinking, and it was clear that what he was thinking, was "bread, land, and peace, and save the revolution!" and "Do not be implicated in the imperialists' purposes of the war!" The reason for that is not hard to find. You see, Russia went into the war at the order of the Czar, and the war was a czarist enterprise, in the mind of revolutionary Russia. The feeling among the peasants and workmen of Russia when they overthrew the Czar was that they should stop the war. The line of argument ran something like this: "You went out to fight because you were ordered to fight by the Czar; you had to go, the Cossacks' whip and sword was over you. What was the war for? For the imperialist purposes of the autocracy and of the Greek Catholic Church; to put the Greek cross over St. Sophia; to get the Dardanelles; to make the autocracy more powerful. Now you have been three years in the trenches, you have lost 4,000,000 of your brothers, 2,000,000 of them are slaves in the Central Empires, and 2,000,000 are dead, and why do you keep on fighting? You have been starved and half naked most of the time, and your folks are suffering at home. The Germans that are fighting you are fighting you because they are forced to fight you by their Kaiser just as you were forced to fight them by your Czar."

SENATOR OVERMAN. Were those some of the questions they put to you?

MR. ROBINS. Yes. This is the talk: "They won't fight you if you won't fight them. They thought you were coming down to take their country and that is the reason they are fighting you. After a while they will overthrow their Kaiser. Why do you keep on fighting and killing your brother Germans. And, by the way, did you know that the land back in your province was being distributed, and if you do not get back there you won't get any land?" There was the kultur that was taking the heart out of the Russian situation.

SENATOR STERLING. That was the argument they would make to the soldiers, of course?

MR. ROBINS. Yes, sir; and it was made from two groups. It was made by sincere Bolsheviks who believed the "dope," and it was made by very cunning and competent German agents who were simply spreading it for the purpose of betraying Russia in the world war.

There are two things I should like to speak of here, at this point. Underneath the whole situation, if one really wants to get it and understand it—and it is worth getting and understanding—is the fact of the paralysis of the economic arm in Russia; and may I open that to your consideration?

When the war broke out in 1914, this 7 per cent with force at their back had run the show in Russia from time immemorial. In that 7 per cent there was 1 per cent of the 7 that had practically 100 per cent of the economic, industrial, financial administration of Russia in their hands; and that 1 per cent of the 7, that had nearly 100 per cent of this management, were nearly 100 per cent German when the war broke out. They were in most instances not even pretending to be citizens—German citizens—of Russia. They were the competent and fit men, engineers and others, trained in Berlin and Vienna, educated in the Russian language, familiar with the whole Russian story, sent in with a very careful design for economic, industrial, financial penetration of Russia for the benefit of the central powers. It had been going on for years. It began forty-odd years ago, extensively. It had been increased in the last 20 years.

And here was your Russian bourgeois, one of the richest and most attractive and delightful persons you will meet anywhere, interested in education, in art, in literature, in the ballet, in the opera, in painting, in fine, large, expansive things, one of the most friendly and delightful conversationalists in the world. A group of Russians—educated, privileged Russians—sitting around a table, is possibly the most delightful group I have ever met in a social way, with a wider expanse and more color and wit, etc., but utterly incompetent, if I am any judge, Senator, for effective organization industrially, and for economic management and control. They did not have that genius. It is not in their minds. It is not their genius.

What had happened was that, having plenty of money, they hired the nearest competent person to run the show for them; and here was a German supervisor or overseer of their plantation; here was a German in charge of their mill, their mine, their factory, their timber production, their railroads—a German competent, well trained, there for the purpose of getting economic control of Russia.

When the war broke out, within four days most of those gentlemen left. They left and went back to Berlin and Vienna, expecting to come back on the heels of a victorious army and possess what they had previously managed. Those that did not go back submerged, and became secret information agents for Berlin. But the actual economic mind, the brain at the top of the Russian economic industrial system, was gone, and immediately a partial paralysis of the whole economic system in Russia took place. They sabotaged as they left, these German managers. There are well authenticated cases of where they allowed fire to catch in some of the flowing wells in the Baku region, and where they turned in water on the coal mines, simply to make Russia incompetent for resisting German aggression.

The Czar then followed with an order by which, had he been the brother instead of the cousin of the Kaiser, he could not have served him more perfectly—an order of general mobilization. Every able-bodied man between 18 and 43 years of age was on his way from factory, mine, shop, village, forest, mill, city, to the barracks or to the front, under this general mobilization, laying down his tools, laying down his ordinary vocation at a time when there was less than a million stand of arms in all Russia; and what that did to the economic system of Russia you understand at once, without any stressing by me.

This partial paralysis, extending through the economic life of Russia, began immediately after the declaration of war and mobilization. The Russian bourgeoisie answered to the call of patriotism and the need of the country in splendid fashion. They did yeoman work. Countesses, barons, princesses, princes, lords, and the rest of them just went in very much like many people in our country did, in a splendid fashion; and men like Prince Lvoff answered the need of the nation, developing a rather extraordinary ability. In the Zemstvo organizations, the volosts, and Red Cross, and so on, they did splendid service; but lacking the actual technical knowledge they never caught up with the advancing economic paralysis that ran on without interruption; and an evidence that they never caught up with it you will find in the fact that the revolution of March, 1917, was preceded by bread riots in Petrograd and in Moscow. The failure of the economic arm in Russian life precipitated the revolution.

As soon as the revolution came about—the first revolution, the revolution of March, 1917—these people, who had come in from the bourgeois class and this upper aristocratic group and had tried to fill the places the Germans had previously held, were thrown out, when the Czar and the autocracy were thrown out, and that increased the paralysis and left less economic brains at the top of the Russian organization. The economic paralysis extended unbroken clear through the Kerensky régime; and underneath the break up of the army, underneath the disorganization in Russian life, is always and everywhere, to the one who really wants to know the situation, the economic misery, the failure of food, the failure of clothing, the distress because the ordinary necessities of daily life were not being secured; and that is the foundation on which this defeatist argument and debate rested, and where it found a breeding place.

When I had gone a certain distance in this effort of investigating the facts among the soldiers—after I got what the mind of the army really was—I made a report to my commanding officer. He was at this time Col. William B. Thompson, of New York. My first commander was the eminent physician and able leader, Col. Frank Billings, of Chicago; but he was there only a short while. The command then passed to Col. William B. Thompson, and may I suggest, Senator, that there may be some tolerable credibility in the position that Col. Thompson and myself hold, in the fact that we both hold it. Senator, you could not get two persons more absolutely alien in all past associations and habits of thought than Col. William B. Thompson and myself. He was a stand-patter. He was the friend of those whom I had fought in American politics. He was in association with the large financial interests of the country. It was related that when he first met me on the mission, going over the list, he said: "Maj. Robins?" "Yes," said somebody, "Raymond Robins." "What! Raymond Robins, that uplifter, that Roosevelt shouter? What is he doing on this mission?" He had been engaged in trying to nominate Mr. Root at the same time that I was engaged in trying to nominate Mr. Roosevelt, and his whole setting was as different from mine as could be; and in the first meetings, Senator, the Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans. There was not any sort of relation anywhere at all. But he had that thing that is common in America among successful business men, what you know, Senator, "as an outdoor mind"; a mind that does not take chatter; that constantly reaches out for facts; that has had to do that to be successful in business.

This man went to Russia with all the associations that would have made him an easy prey for the very delightful and interesting 7 per cent. He was wine and dined by them; he went to their meetings and associated with them generally; but he kept that outdoor mind, and he reached exactly the same conclusion on the situation that I did from the outside. I do not deserve any credit if I was right in reaching that conclusion, because I was kicked into it. I butted my nose and my shins against the soviet until I knew it was there; but this man from the indoors caught the range of the situation by the use of real intelligence.

He was in command of the mission. He was eager in desire to serve the American national interests. We talked it over, and when I talk now I will be talking very largely things that he put into my mind. There are those who say I led William B. Thompson. Those people do not know William B. Thompson. He had altogether the best mind in the American Red Cross mission. He thought around all of us. I bear this testimony in this presence under oath, that when I lost the trail, as I did lose the trail half a dozen times in that complex situation, he called me in and said: "There is the trail, over there, Robins," and in every instance he was right. He had one of those perfect noses, like a pointer dog for a scent, and he knew where it was running.

He said: "Now, this thing is cutting deep, is it not—this thing that is going through Russia—this defeatist culture?" I said: "Yes, Colonel; and it tends to disorganize the whole Russian social fabric." He said, "Well, what about the allied propaganda?" I said: "Colonel, that is worse than nothing." The allied propaganda at that hour, Senator Overman, was this: Pictures and written words about how great France is, how tremendous England is, how overwhelming America is. "We will have 20,000 airplanes on the front in a few weeks. In a few months we will have 4,000,000 soldiers. We will win the war in a walk." The peasant moujik said: "Oh, is that so? Well, if the allies are going to win the war in a walk, we who have been fighting and working a long time, we will go back and see the folks at home"; and the real effect of the allied propaganda was to weaken the morale instead of strengthening it, if I am any judge of the facts.

It was agreed among us that there was an answer that was close to the ground, and that was genuine—an effort to interpret this to revolutionary Russia, cursed by the Czar's espousal of the allied cause, in the first instance, and by all the cross-currents that followed; that although it was not possible at all, I knew, to get that massed revolutionary mind to think as we thought as allies, it was possible to get them to fight Germany to save the revolution; and if they served the cause we did not care anything about what they thought, and we said, "This is the situation: We have got to interpret the holding of the front and the defeat of German militarist autocracy into terms of saving the revolution; and it happens to be true. We have got to say that if the German militarist autocracy wins, the Russian revolution is doomed. We have got to picture it until the average soldier and peasant sees behind the German bayonets the barons and feudal landlords coming to take back the land; behind the German bayonets the feudal masters of industry coming back to transmute the 8 hours and 15 rubles of the revolution back to the 2 rubles and 12 hours of the semislave days before the revolution in the factories, mills, and mines. We have got to have them see that behind the German bayonets are the grand dukes coming to destroy their local self-governing soviets and revolutionary councils. If we do that, we can save the situation."

In the second or third conference on this matter the question of money came up. It was a large enterprise. "How are you going to do it?" Well, it was perfectly apparent that you could not do it. There was no machinery to do it, no American or allied bureau to do it. The allies shared in the common curse of the autocracy in the mind of peasant Russia. It had to be Russian, and it had to be revolutionary.

There was in the Winter Palace at that time Madam Breshkovsky, that old and yet heroic figure, possibly the greatest revolutionary figure at that time. Madam Breshkovsky, after 40 years of service in Russia for the revolution, was now at the Winter Palace in Petrograd, having come back from Siberia in a triumphal journey with great celebrations, having been received in Petrograd by one of the greatest gatherings in the history of that city—this old peasant woman and revolutionist received in the great railroad station in the chamber of the Czar, honored by the ministers of the government, and all that sort of thing. She was now in the Winter Palace, in the grand duke's suite that looked out over the Neva to Peter and Paul where she had been three years a prisoner. It was a dramatic, a tremendous, setting. I had known her, known her for 12 years, known her when she was in this country; had helped her in some of her work at that time. I knew Nicholas Tchaikovsky, a thoroughly sincere and genuine revolutionist, and at that time the head of the peasants' co-operatives in Russia.

It was agreed by Col. Thompson that there should be organized a committee on civic education for free Russia. Madam Breshkovsky should be chairman of the committee; and as members there should be Nicholas Tchaikovsky; Lazaroff, the Russian revolutionist who had been head of the milk station or dairy in Switzerland, which was really an underground station for the Russian revolution, for many years, and well known with credit through service to his country; Gen. Neuslakovsky, the most trusted member of Kerensky's general staff, who was in active cooperation with this committee from the military angle; and David Soskice, Kerensky's private secretary. They were to form the committee on "Civic Education in Free Russia." The program was this: "We will begin by buying some newspapers, and with other publicity we will prepare simple statements in peasant patois and in the general terms of the Russian peasant's and workingman's mind, by Russian peasants and workmen, not by intelligentsia. We will send into the ranks and into the peasant villages this new gospel of fighting German militarist autocracy; not to serve the allies but to serve and to save the revolution."

In discussing it, the question of money was brought up, and it was suggested that it would be an expensive thing, and I suggested that we could not start with less than 6,000,000 rubles. There was no money in the embassies. There was no money in the missions. William B. Thompson, in the last end of it, ordered me to proceed; and when I suggested that it was a large amount of money, he said: "You will have a credit in the Petrograd branch of the National City Bank of 12,000,000 rubles." We had the 12,000,000 rubles, and that 12,000,000 rubles came from the pocket of William B. Thompson, out of his private fortune, and is the money that has been heralded in America as having been spent for the Bolsheviks. May record be made at this time of this fact: William B. Thompson never spent a dollar for the Bolsheviks at any time or place, but he spent a million dollars of his own money trying to prevent the Bolsheviks from getting control of Russia. That happens to be true.

Mr. HUMES. Colonel, may I interrupt you? You say "12,000,000 rubles." What was the exchange value of a ruble at that time?

Mr. ROBINS. It varied in a variety of ways—all kinds of ways. It ran up to one kind of exchange and another, but the actual, legal exchange fixed by the government, by Kerensky's own request, was obviated in this case, and we got down to the actual value. In other words, the ruble was not worth as much in its transfer as it would have been in ordinary proceedings.

Senator OVERMAN. Something like a million dollars, I suppose?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir.

We at once went to work. It was known that a great deal of this work had to be done personally; that so much of Russia was illiterate that you could not by the printed word or even by pictures carry your story. You had to carry it by word of mouth. Madam Breshkovsky's connections and Nicholas Tchaikovsky's connections and our relation to the general staff enabled us to release this man in this barracks, and that man in that regiment, and that man in that company, and this peasant in this village—release them for propaganda purposes and turn them loose on the situation. We had better than 800 persons, men and women, tried revolutionists, vouched for by Madam Breshkovsky and Nicholas Tchaikovsky, turned loose into the situation. The American Government was then cabled, through the Red Cross—probably gentlemen here will know the exact facts—asking for a million dollars in 10 days, and $3,000,000 a month for 3 months, to carry forward this enterprise.

Senator STERLING. Col. Robins, may I ask you a question there? Just what did this educational work include?

Mr. ROBINS. Simply the interpretation to the revolutionary group, to the army, and to the peasant villages of how absolutely indispensable to the saving of the revolution it was to keep the front and defeat the German militarist autocracy.

Senator STERLING. I see.

Mr. ROBINS. That that was necessary for their purposes, not ours. It happened that it was helpful for ours, but for theirs it was perfectly clear.

Senator STERLING. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINS. We got a response to that cable some time three weeks after the cable was sent—an equivocal response, Senator—indicating that there was some question about such a program, and that a representative of the Committee on Public Information would be sent over there to inquire into whether or not it was a good thing to do. We sent urgent cables in relation to that situation. The fact is that after that response came we curtailed and withdrew our extension program, necessarily, waiting for the approval of our Government, we did not want to do anything that the Government did not want us to do, even though we felt it was tremendously urgent, and when the agent of the Government reached there the Bolsheviki had been in command of the works for better than two weeks.

I have here a cable which I would like to submit to the committee at this point, which I think shows that we were not in doubt as to the situation. Here is the cable:

Following message signed Thompson for Davis on National Red Cross Headquarters October seventh only by desperate efforts present Government was all Russian Democratic conference just adjourned prevented from being controlled by Maximalists whose leaders influenced by German propaganda are openly advocating immediate peace. Maximalists now actively seeking to control all Russian congress of workmen's and soldiers' deputies meeting here this month. If they succeed will form new government with disastrous results probably leading to separate peace. We are using every resource but must have immediate support or all efforts may be too late. We who are here can not conceive how the responsibility for failure to act in this situation can willingly be assumed by any American unless the United States contemplating negotiations for an early peace.

Senator OVERMAN. That is from Col. Thompson, the gentleman who preceded you?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir; the second commander of the Red Cross mission in Russia.

Senator NELSON. To whom was that addressed?

Mr. ROBINS. To the Government, through the Red Cross.

In the development of the situation, the growth of the soviet power was so apparent, so manifest at all points, that some of us who wanted to hold that front at any hazard believed that the soviet, by reason of its culture and by reason of its revolutionary character, however alien it might be to the general allies' cause, would be alien to the German militarist autocracy, and could be dealt with on that basis. We did not care what it might say, if what it did was useful to the situation.

In talking the matter over it was suggested that Kerensky might accept the soviet, which was the real outdoor power in Russia, and that in that acceptance the provisional government might be founded upon the real new social control, the revolutionary mass in Russia, and that we might tide over the situation. At this hour Tcheidze was the president of the Petrograd Soviet, the soviet of the imperial city, and the president of the executive committee of the all-Russian Soviet, and the warm supporter and friend of Kerensky. If Kerensky could say what Lenine and Trotzky had said, he could yet win. There were just five words that won the soviets of Russia for the Bolshevik policy. Those five words were, "All power to the soviet." Let me illustrate.

When I went into Russia the mensheviki, bitter opponents of the Bolsheviks, were in majority in every soviet in Russia. The Bolsheviks being competently led by discerning politicians, whatever else they were, said, "All power to the soviet," and on those five words they took possession of Russia.

Well, that was perfectly apparent. The power was there. There were only two things in Russia—either the soviet or the old régime. Now, you might not like the soviet, but the old régime, always resting back on some force, if their own rifles were taken away from them would have to rest on foreign rifles, and the nearest foreign rifles were German rifles, and they were used for German commercial, financial, industrial penetration, and they would cooperate with the Germans if it came to a test between the peasants and the workingmen and themselves, as was evidenced when Miliukoff and the cadets—sincere and patriotic men in the first instance—finally went down to Kiev and cooperated with the Germans rather than stand with the revolutionary workmen and peasant soldiers of Russia.

That is what we saw there. We saw a situation in which the front would be opened, by men who did not intend it at the start, by the mere drift of affairs. To maintain themselves against the revolutionary workers and peasants they would have to side with the German power; and so we said, "Our interest here is with the soviet for the time being, inevitably if it comes to a showdown between the reaction and the soviet."

Kerensky at this point in one of the conferences said something like this, "Why won't the allies really understand Russia? They force me to talk western European liberalism two-thirds of the time for their benefit, while I have to talk Russian Slavic socialism one-third of the time for the sake of living 24 hours"; and the crucifixion between this indoor, formal mind on the one hand and the extraordinary outdoor Russian situation on the other was what crucified Kerensky and his provisional government; and Kerensky was a sincere friend of the allies, a sincere friend of revolutionary Russia, and a man who would have worked out a moderate socialistic program.

May I get before the committee—because what people say is not nearly so important as what actually occurs, if we can get to the facts—may I state this, as revealing just how that indoor mind worked in Russia and how it was moved into conflict with the actual situation again and again. A conference took place on the 3d of November, 1917, in the office of the American Red Cross, in the special private office of Col. William B. Thompson, commander on that date. That conference was called because the spreading power of the Soviet and its contest against the provisional government for position after position, in which it won every contest, practically, showed us what the situation was. I at this time had secret agents scattered about in the different regiments and barracks. There was one particular unit that was of master importance in the situation. It was the armored-tank corps. I need not say in this presence that where armored machine-gun tanks and armored tanks carrying 3-inch cannon go, whichever side they go with, where there is not big artillery to meet them, is the way the power runs. I had kept a window in that corps for some time. A man who was in my employ and drove one of those cars came to me one morning and said, "We had a meeting last night. The corps is almost evenly divided between support of the Bolsheviki and support of the provisional government, but it is a hundred per cent for support of the soviet"; and that was practically the situation. Well, we knew that the Bolsheviki were going to maneuver the play until they would have the soviet future in front of them; and so, in defending the soviet, they would take the rifles, and if that hour ever came it was apparent what would happen.

Mr. HUMES. May I interrupt you, Colonel? You said that conference was February 3, 1917. You meant 1918, did you not?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; I meant 1917. Did I say February? I meant November. Thank you for correcting me. May I be corrected at that point—November 3, 1917?

Senator NELSON. It could not be February, because that was before the Kerensky revolution.

Mr. ROBINS. Quite right, sir.

In this meeting, called for the purpose of stabilizing the Kerensky government and of getting the allied group, if possible, to cooperate in a possible bridge between Kerensky and the soviet power in Russia—the provisional government and the soviet power—there met in that conference Gen. Knox, chief of the British military mission in Russia and military attaché of the British Embassy at Petrograd, an able, patriotic, sincere general, used to “those people that know not the law,” used to India and to Egypt, a fine expression of the mailed-fist end of the situation, thoroughly sincere and thoroughly patriotic, in my judgment; Gen. Neiszelle, in the same position for the French Government in Russia, head of its military mission, military attaché of its embassy; Gen. William V. Judson, in the same position for the American Government in Russia; Gen. Neuslakovsky; David Soskice; Col. William B. Thompson, and myself. I was there simply as a sort of orderly for Col. Thompson.

Senator NELSON. Was Trotzky one of them?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. I thought you mentioned Trotzky's name just now.

Mr. ROBINS. No; Gen. Neuslakovsky. You misunderstood me, Senator. Trotsky was outside the breastworks in those days.

Col. Thompson is a man of very few words. He is a person who does things rather than talks about them. He said, in a very brief statement, what we were there for. Gen. Knox then took the floor and he began to denounce the feebleness of the provisional government, the failures of Kerensky, his incompetence; he should have killed Lenine and Trotsky; he should have shot the Bolsheviks. Well, as there were probably several million of them, that was quite a little job. He went on to speak of the things that we all knew and deplored just as much as he did, but it was all downstream.

He sat down and Gen. Neiszelle took the floor, and anything that had been left out of Gen. Knox's statement was not left out of Gen. Neiszelle's. He just ripped the Russian situation, Kerensky and the army, up and down—and they deserved a certain amount of ripping, Senator. He talked about the Tarnapol disaster; he talked about that miserable situation, and finally wound up with something about Russian soldiers being cowardly yellow dogs. Well, you can imagine what that did to a Russian general. Flushed and humiliated, he leaves. Mr. Soskice, just recovering from pneumonia, is almost helpless. And then we are just this group together of allies, nothing done, two hours and a half spent in perfectly good downstream talk. Gen. Knox turns to me and says: “I am not interested in stabilizing Kerensky. I do not believe in Kerensky and his government. It is incompetent and inefficient and worthless. You are wasting Thompson's money.” I said, “Well, if I am, the colonel knows all about it.” He continued: “You ought to have been with Korniloff.” I said, “Well, General, you were with Korniloff”; and he flushed, because he knew that I knew that English officers had been put in Russian uniforms in some of the English tanks to follow up the Korniloff advance, and very nearly opened fire on the Korniloff forces when they refused to advance from Pskov, and a good twist had come into the allied situation in consequence. I said, “We could not have added a whole lot to the Korniloff adventure, could we?” He said, “Well, that may have been premature, but the only thing in Russia to-day is Soninkov Kaledines”—

Kaledines, a Cossack general—"and a military dictatorship. These people have got to have a whip over them." I said, "General, you may get a dictatorship of a very different character." He said, "You mean this Trotzky-Lenine-Bolshevik stuff—this soap-box stuff?" I said, "Yes; that is what I mean." He said, "Col. Robins, you are not a military man; you do not know anything about military affairs. Military men know what to do with that kind of stuff. We stand them up and shoot them." I said, "Yes; if you catch them you do."

Senator STERLING. Let me ask you right there, what were the activities of Lenine and Trotsky at the time you were holding this conference?

Mr. ROBINS. Spreading the formula of the powers of the all-Russian soviet; that the next meeting of the all-Russian soviet would take over the government; that we must relieve the situation; that we must distribute the lands to the peasants and stop the soldiers and workmen of the world from fighting in the imperialistic wars, and stuff of that sort. I said to him, "I think you are facing another sort of dictatorship. I admit, general, I do not know anything about military affairs, but I know something about folk; I have been working among them all my life. I have been out in Russia, and I think that you are facing a folk situation." That conference closed, and nothing was done, and these gentlemen went out of it much in the frame of mind of "What was yesterday will be to-morrow."

The following Monday—not a week later, but the following Monday—the Bolsheviki took the arsenal and the fortress of Peter and Paul at the point of the bayonet, and on Tuesday they took over the telephone and telegraph stations, and on Wednesday they took the Nikolaiev railroad station, and on Wednesday night they stormed and carried the Winter Palace and made prisoners of those members of the government who had not escaped.

On the morning of the 7th at 2 a. m. they convened the second all-Russian soviet and passed the decree making distribution of all the land to the peasants, the most definite and necessary demand in the mind of revolutionary Russia, the decree giving control of the factories and industries to the workmen, the decree placing all the powers of government in the soviet, this revolutionary body to be recognized as the supreme governmental power, and fourth, a decree offering general democratic peace to the world. Lenine and Trotzky were elected to their positions of influence and power in the government. Other agents of the people were elected as commissars, the actual group, Senator, that has had power in domestic European Russia from that hour to this. This complete change of the center of public power in Russia took place absolutely without any more real sense of what was behind it than is revealed by the situation and facts of the conference that I have just related.

Now, Senators, we were faced with a very difficult situation. At one hour when we were beginning this propaganda to stabilize Kerensky and oppose the Bolsheviki, Col. Thompson called me in, and it being a military organization I was standing at attention, and he said, "Maj. Robins, do you know what this means?" I said, "I think it means the only real chance to save this situation, Colonel."

He said, "No; I mean, do you know what it means to you?" I said, "What does it mean?" He said, "It means that if we fail you get shot." I said, "That is all right. Better men, younger men, and therefore men with more to lose than I have got to lose, are getting shot every day on the western front"; and I said, "Colonel, if I get shot, you will get hung." He was smoking all the time, and he said, "I wouldn't be surprised if you are damn right."

That was the situation we were in. We had made a definite attempt to support Kerensky, who was now overthrown. I had men out on the western front looking after certain parts of that situation, surreptitiously, disguised. I saw Kerensky in the field, and I saw his troops abandon him in the field at Tatchina. I heard the appeal that was made to his men asking them if they would fight against their brothers in arms, their Russian comrades; asking them if they would support Kerensky, the servant of the imperialistic allies, as they called him; if they would continue their fight against the working men of other nations. I saw company after company crumble. I went back to my chief and I said, "Chief, we have got to move pretty fast." I told him, "Several things are clear in this complex situation. The first is that Kerensky is as dead as yesterday's 7,000 years." No one had been more loyal toward him, no one had spent so much of his private personal money for Kerensky's government, as Col. William B. Thompson. We all in the Red Cross had done our best for the provisional government. We refused now to blind ourselves. We agreed and said, "All that is over. This idea that Kerensky is going to build up an army somewhere and come back against soviet Russia is all bunk. The idea that Moscow is going to rise up and come against the all-Russian soviet—the Holy City and the bourgeois—that is all bunk. There is not anything in that. The idea that the Cossacks are coming up from the Don is all bunk. They will never get here from the Don. There are too many peasants with rifles in between. The idea that the White Guard is coming down from Finland to save us, that stuff is bunk. This group that are running this show at Smolny are going to run the show for quite a while longer." We did not know how long, but long enough to determine and condition Russia in the world war. Now, we were up to the point as to whether there was anything useful to Russia and helpful to the allied cause that could be done with the Russian soviet. "That is our situation, and we have got to elect very quickly. We have got supplies here. We have got to have guards and protection over those supplies. The Kerensky credentials and the Kerensky authority are gone. Those supplies may be looted to-morrow as counter-revolutionary supplies, because of our support of Kerensky. We have to move quickly."

At that hour, again, the 7 per cent mind was apparent in the whole city. Senators and gentlemen, you know what the 7 per cent mind said. You have had it here in America. They said: "These are thieves and murderers and German agents, and they will only last three weeks or six weeks at most. They will be swept aside, and we will have Miliukov and Gutchkov and Rodzianko and Shidlovsky, and the nice respectable cadets whom we can do business with. There never was any foundation in outside Russian facts for this opinion, but it was honestly believed in certain quarters, around the tea tables in the palaces, and our people and most of the allies believed it, and their position was, as it were, to draw their skirts about them and stand off on one side and say, "We will have nothing to do with this wicked government. They will only last a little while."

We saw the situation differently. We saw them as the actual power in Russia. At the conference we had I made a statement that was reduced to writing: "Here are 180,000,000 folks; they inhabit one-sixth of the earth's surface, with vast natural resources, with a great deal of available raw material, right here. Admit that the Kaiser has got the jump on us at this point in the game. We mean right by Russia; we mean freedom and cooperation and fair play. Germany means wrong by Russia; she means domination, the re-establishment of the old order, militarism, autocratic domination. Suppose they are German crooks and thieves in the government at Smolny. For the moment they have the power. Can we not work with this thing, and finally bring out the better purposes of these folks, who are kindly, worthy people in the main? Can we not deal with these men? Are there not as good brains under American hats as under German helmets? Let us not abandon this land, but let us work through those that are in power and have got the rifles behind them. Whatever is done in Russia for quite awhile has got to be done with these people."

Senator NELSON. What did you hope to accomplish by going in with this gang?

Mr. ROBINS. I will tell you, Senator. It was said at that time that they were criminals, and this, that, and the other charge was made. I said, "Suppose they are; some of us have been in politics and dealt with American political bosses, and if there is anyone more corrupt or worse in Smolny than some of our crooks, then they are some crooked, that's all! We will take our chances, and see what can be done."

I went to Smolny and into Trotzky's office. We had certain supplies in Petrograd. We had guards around those supplies. We had to protect them at once. I wanted to find out what we could do—at least what he said we could do—and then I would test what he said by what he did, and then I would have a judgment on Trotzky. I went into his office. There was a captain standing at his desk who had heard me speak in one of the barracks when I was denouncing the Bolsheviki and was supporting Kerensky. When I went in he started and looked at me, and then began denouncing me, talking and gesticulating to Trotzky, saying I was a counter-revolutionist and Kerenskyite. Every other word was "counter-revolution, Kerenskyite." I put up my hand and said to my interpreter: "You tell the commissioner not to be under any delusions in regard to me. I was for Kerensky. I came to Russia to help the Russian people, and I found Kerensky as president of the revolutionary government of Russia. I began working with Kerensky and worked with him for three months, so far as I had any power. I did my best to keep the commissioner from having power." At this Trotzky bristled, but before he could answer I said: "Will you say to the commissioner that I differ from some men I know, in that I know a corpse when I see one, and I regard the provisional government as dead, and I regard the commissioner as having all the power that is immediately effective now in Russia." That rather smoothed Trotzky down. I said, "You will say to the commissioner that I want to know whether he wants the American Red Cross to remain in Russia; whether we can serve the Russian people without injury to our national interests, and if we can not, if we have got to get out." And I said, "That is what I have come for, to get a clear understanding with the commissioner. So far as I know the commissioner's domestic program I am against it, but it is none of my business what happens in domestic Russia, and I do not intend to interfere with it. And if Kaladines, or Korniloff, or the Czar, or anyone else, had the power that the commissioner has in Russia to-day, I would be talking to them."

From the hour that I made this statement I never had any misunderstanding with Leon Trotzky. He said he wanted us to stay. "Well, all right. Now, what we want to do is to send a train of 32 cars of supplies to the American Red Cross mission in Jassy, in Roumania. Will you give us cars, franks, Bolshevik credentials, to send that train through?" We could not, in sending this train of supplies to Roumania, by any interpretation, aid the Germans. If it went through, it showed they were willing to let something go through that helped a group honestly fighting the Germans. It showed that they had control through Bolshevik Russia to get the train across. It showed that they had sufficient power of protection to save that train from being looted when it went through famine districts. If we sent our people there with this train and they lost their lives and we lost the supplies, it was war work.

They gave us what we asked and we sent the train. It reached Jassy in record time, without a pound of material taken, without a dollar of graft, under the guard of Bolshevik rifles and under a Bolshevik frank. That, at least, was a good thing.

Now, the next step—raw materials in Russia. There were lead, copper, nickel, platinum, oils, fats, hides, cotton, and wool, all of great moment as munition materials for the central powers. Immediately, here is Count von Mirbach with his commission. When we faced agents of the German foreign office, the most skillful among the secret agents of the central Empires, working away on the raw-material situation, I said, "We must make a move there." We stopped 50 cars of supplies at Viborg and held them there until they were confiscated under the Bolshevik government, because the rule of embargo against supplies going into the central powers was still not repealed, nor was it repealed until after March 16, 1918. We stopped those cars and got that stuff confiscated. "Now," I said to myself, "that is the real thing. How much further can we go?"

At this point may I say to you, gentlemen, that I dealt with those men on the theory that they might be German agents, for two or three months. I would have dealt with the devil in an hour like that if we could save the situation for the allied cause and keep raw materials out of Germany.

Trotzky and Lenine discovered in the first conference we had with them that they sensed the primary situation in Russia, which was the economic paralysis at the top of the Russian economic and industrial life; that no government could stay in office long that could not feed its people; and at once they began talking with me about economic cooperation with America, never for one moment pretending friendship for America, never for a moment pretending that they were not engaged in a revolutionary enterprise and that they hoped to reach America before they got done; but in the meantime we understood that we were better enemies of our enemies than anybody else in Russia. Think of it, gentlemen—of popularizing the idea of giving the land to the working Russian and German peasants! What does that do to the German junker? Think of popularizing the idea of all industrial control in workingmen in Russia and Germany! What does that mean to Herr Ballin, Herr Lohman, and Herr Krupp, and the other industrial magnates in Germany? Think of popularizing the putting of all political power into the hands of the soviet locals! What does that mean to the highly centralized power of the German general staff? They thought we would know and understand that their culture helped us against the German military autocracy. As Trotzky and Lenine said to me, "If you will send over men to take the economic leadership in this country, you will have a tremendous advantage as against Germany. Germany has not been running this show for a number of years. The Germans are out of it. In the meantime you will get this economic advantage, and in the meantime we will feed our folks"; and I got the idea that they were fearful of the failure of bread. That was all they were afraid of. I said, "I am glad that we can work with this thing and check this raw material going into the central powers. If we can get control of the economic resources of Russia, we will be having a really merry time, and we are in the position, if it comes to a show-down, of at least preventing anybody else from coming in here."

Here was Mirbach with his commission, eager to get command of the economic situation in Russia. Here was America, the only other source of supply for leadership of the economic situation. There had been prepared a Red Cross map, carefully marking out, in relation to the actual facts, the centers of surplus and centers of deficit in primary food supply—bread and meat—throughout European Russia, showing that with 30 days of work under a directing mind that knew how to get oil out of the ground with no more machinery—with nothing more than was lying outdoors in Russia, 30 days simultaneously in the Baku oil region, and the same number of days of action under the mind that knew how to get the coal out of the ground in the Donetz and other coal fields, directing work, and then 60 days of transportation with the use of the cars and locomotives there in Russia, we had solved the problem of primary food supply and could have fed all Russia. This had been partly prepared for the Kerensky situation. One day in a conference—I am talking to Trotzky, now—He said, "You are interested in stopping raw materials from going into the central empires." They knew that we knew what condition the army was in. He said, "You can put your officers on the frontier to enforce the embargo." I said, "All the American officers?" He said, "All the allied officers."

Senator STERLING. All the allied officers?

Mr. ROBINS. All the allied officers. I stopped, and I said, "You know I am in great comfort here, and I am not a diplomat and not a general, and I have no past and no future, and I can afford to be as ignorant as I please—as I really am. Frankly, I do not understand your proposition. In our American language, it looks to me as if this has 'got something on it.' What do you mean by saying you will let us put our officers on the frontier and enforce the embargo? Germany needs raw materials and you need manufactured products. You do not care anything about America. You are against the German autocracy, but you care about supporting your revolution here, and you need these manufactured products." He said, "Col. Robins, it is quite simple. This is the situation: We have offered general democratic peace to the world—no annexations, no contributions, self-determination of nationalities. Germany has recognized this government in the conference we are going to have at Brest. We are going to stir up the comrades in Berlin and Vienna to force their militaristic Government to give us democratic peace. We are going to stir up the comrades in America and in France to force your imperialistic and capitalistic Governments to come into the conference." I smiled. He said, "We will continue this conference as long as possible, but some time we will have to make peace with the central powers because of the economic condition of Russia as well as the military condition in Russia, to give us a breathing space; but I will never sign any peace but a democratic peace. It will have to be no annexations, no contributions, and self-determination of nationalities." And it is of record in the peace conference at Brest that he kept his agreement. I was satisfied that he would prolong the Brest conference as long as possible for another reason, of which he did not speak. I was satisfied of this because of what I knew of him. I thought by this time that I knew some characteristics of this extraordinary Jew. Let us look at him a moment; 38 years old; a Russian Hebrew, revolutionist exile; orator, gifted above any man I have ever known as a platform speaker; can do more with a mass of people than any speaker I have ever heard, and I have known most of the speakers of my time.

Senator OVERMAN. Is he an educated man?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; a thoroughly educated man. He has, though, the weaknesses of his gifts. He is a sort of prima donna. In hours of success he is unreasonable, heady, high-handed; and in moment of failure he is moody, gloomy, irascible, and lacking in steadfast patience and steady nerve. I personally have always had a question mark over Trotzky; a question as to what he will do; a question as to where he will be found at certain times and places, because of his extreme ego, and the arrogance, if you please, of the ego. I knew Trotzky would prolong the conference and continue it as long as possible, because it was the fullest expression of his ego that he had ever had. He was the center of the world, he thought, while that went on. He spoke to a larger audience than he had ever spoken to before or could hope to speak to again; so that I said that that conference would be prolonged, resting it on the personality of the man who had the greatest footlight opportunity of his time. Trotzky went on to say, "When we get to the place where we have to make terms with the central powers they can not afford to make a democratic peace with revolutionary Russia, burdened as we are by our economic and military situation. The Germans can not make a democratic peace with us. Col. Robins, no annexations, no indemnities, self-determination of nationalities. Forty years of culture, 40 years of Treitschke, 40 years of might makes right, are entirely against it. The whole junker and militaristic class are involved against it. If they make peace with their weakest enemy, after three years of blood and slaughter and wasted treasure, the militaristic domination is over."

Senator STERLING. This is the language of Trotsky?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir. "Nevertheless, people do what they can not do, if they have to. If, by the time we reach peace negotiations with the central powers for separate peace, we have stirred a sufficient number of comrades in Berlin and Vienna to make the German Government afraid to go back on its pronouncement of the 9th of July, 1917, when the German Government offered democratic peace—a camouflage—and if we can add to that the great need for raw materials, then the German General Staff may give Russia a fair peace. They will never do it if they can get the raw materials without the peace. Now do you see why I am willing to put your officers of the allied force out on the frontier to enforce the embargo?" I thought I saw then, and I think I see now, that it was a perfectly selfish and understandable situation, which had nothing to do with friendship for America or for the allies. It was carrying forward his policy to an understandable end. We went to the representatives of the allied military missions and urged that we enter into negotiations at that time with Trotsky to that end. It seemed to me, inasmuch as the army was rotten, inasmuch as the raw materials of Russia were the great need of the central powers, that it was the wise move. If we put our men on the frontier and our men were killed, then we knew where we were; we had an acknowledged situation. If they were not killed, we stopped raw materials from going into the central empires. Gentlemen of the allied missions threw up their hands and said: "What! Work with this German agent, thief and murderer government? Nothing doing! And, anyhow, Robins, we might think of it if they had any real power, but they have not. They will not last but three months longer. We understand so-and-so"; and then they went on with some stupid talk—some of this 7 per cent chat—and they stood off on the side; and it is a matter of history—will be when it is written—that the American general who was in favor of our position in the conference of Friday, the 3d of November, because he had been in Russia long enough, first as observer for America and the American Army in the Russo-Japanese War, then sent over to Russia by the President as a member of the Root mission, sent over there because of his military knowledge, the chief of the American military mission—Gen. William B. Judson—

Senator STERLING. Would his view be in accordance with the facts you have just expressed here?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not want to say that he would be in accord with my whole view. The general can speak for himself. But he was in favor of dealing with Trotsky as the vital power, as a matter of fact, in Russia at that time. He went to see him, and because he went to see Trotsky in order to arrange to prevent raw materials from going into the Central Empires, he was summarily recalled to this country.

I was handling supplies and getting trains and doing other useful things. There was no debate about the things that I was doing being actually useful; it was only that they would not be useful if that government was only there for a short while. I was guessing that they would be there for quite a long while. They were guessing that it would be overthrown day after to-morrow.

The next day I went back to have a discussion with Trotzky, and he said, "Have you not got a railroad mission somewhere?" I said, "Yes." "Where?" "Nagasaki." "What is it doing there?" "Eating its head off." "Why does it not come on here?" "You know, commissioner, we are not sure about this situation here. You know there are a good many sincere men who think this thing is all rotten, and is being directed from Berlin." He said, "Do they think that still?" I said, "Yes; many of them do." He said, "You send in your mission. We will give you control of the Trans-Siberian at all points. We will make any man you designate assistant commissioner of ways and communication, and let him have an office right in with our minister of ways and communication of the Soviet government here in Moscow; and then we will divide the resources in transportation in Russia, 50 per cent to be used for solving the food question, 50 per cent to be used for evacuating the war supplies from the front and from the important cities on the western front where, if the conference fails in Brest and the Germans advance, they will get those supplies first." It was a perfectly selfish proposition. They greatly needed the organization of the transportation, and he did not have the people in the soviet government that could deliver the goods.

We wanted those munitions and war materials evacuated from the cities on the western front and kept out of Germany.

Senator NELSON. But at that time they did not have the control of the railroad in Siberia.

Mr. ROBINS. They had it from Vladivostok to Petrograd. They had free control of the railroad in there at that time.

Senator NELSON. I think you are wrong there.

Mr. ROBINS. No. I think, Senator, you will find that the error is that you are thinking of a later date, that it is further along in the story than I am speaking. The soviet took full command of the railroads—

Senator NELSON. Where were you at that time?

Mr. ROBINS. I was in Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. How do you know the condition of the Siberian Railroad?

Mr. ROBINS. There is no doubt about it. There is no doubt about this particular period of time that I am talking about. The soviet was in command at all points.

Senator STERLING. When, do you say?

Mr. ROBINS. In January, or in December, 1918. There had been no Czecho-Slavok move.

Senator NELSON. The Czecho-Slavoks were there?

Mr. ROBINS. Not then.

Senator NELSON. And we had forces at Vladivostock?

Mr. ROBINS. Not then.

Senator NELSON. There were English and French and Japanese forces there.

Mr. ROBINS. No! I am sure you are thinking of a later period.

Senator NELSON. No; I am speaking of the fall and winter of the Bolshevik revolution.

Mr. ROBINS. Oh, the Czecho-Slovaks at that time were in the Ukraine, Senator.

Senator NELSON. Oh, no; oh, no.

Mr. ROBINS. Pardon me. Now, he said to me, "This is what you can do." I went back with this proposition. The American Ambassador thought well of it. Not at first, but later, others opposed it vigorously; said that any cooperation was wrong; that any sort of relationship was wrong; that it would not be effective; that the government was soon to be overthrown.

What I felt, Senators, was this, that if we got a demonstration, at any time or anywhere, of facts, we would get out of the realm of conjecture. Suppose we put in our men there and they took command and they were killed; suppose the thing was at once delivered and turned over to the Germans; then we had the fact of this delivery. That was of great consequence. We would know, then, where we were.

Senator NELSON. Now, without quite so much circumlocution, the effect of this was that you wanted to form an alliance between our Government and the Trotsky government at that time for a certain purpose?

Mr. ROBINS. An economic cooperation.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. That is it; no question about it.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. This plan was refused. Subsequently, in a conference, there was laid down on the table a map showing the armaments on the Russian front—showing the big gun situation on the western front.

Senator STERLING. Just one word, that I may have the connection. You say this plan was refused. Was that the plan in reference to the railroad?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Taking control of the Trans-Siberian Railroad?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes. Trotzky showed us, "Here is a gun, a 12-inch gun, shoots 12 miles—3 miles back from the front. Here is one here, and the next one here, and the next one here, and so on all along this front." He said, "You know that the army will never do any advancing. The most that it can hope to do is to hold that front." I thought I did know it. He said, "We will never use these guns any more. There are tons and tons of ammunition there. Those guns came from England, and that ammunition came from England. If we fail at Brest the Germans will take those guns. If you come in and help us in transportation, you can begin to evacuate those guns at once. If you evacuate those guns, you can take them immediately to Archangel and the Murman coast, or anywhere you please."

It seemed to me that much was worth while doing. The facts are that a number of weeks passed during which evacuation operations could have taken place, and that when the Germans advanced after the failure of the Brest negotiations, they did take those munitions and those guns and took them over to the western front, where they killed our boys in the March drive with them, and in the June drive—with the big guns and ammunition sent by England to Russia. They were used by the Germans to destroy the lives of allied soldiers.

During this time I had been for some period the unofficial representative of the American Government, at the request of the ambassador of the United States. There came a time, in December, when it was believed in certain quarters—vigorously believed—that any association with the soviet was utterly wrong, and because I was in association—having responsible tasks to deliver that could not be delivered except by dealing with the actual power that was there—that I should be stopped. An order came from the Government that I should not continue relationship with the soviet. The ambassador of the United States, because of the conditions then in Russia and because I was the only allied officer that had a contact, and I suppose because he trusted me—I hope so—requested that the American Government withdraw that prohibition, and instructed me to continue my association, which I did; and I was, from that time until the time I left Russia, in constant cooperation with the ambassador of the United States, reporting to him on every situation that I could find, and being the unofficial medium by which he carried his purposes and his instructions to the soviet powers.

In the course of this situation there developed certain hours in the Brest conference when it was believed that we might have a new fighting situation develop, that might start war against Germany. I was instructed by the Ambassador of the United States to make certain representations to the soviet powers, specific and written, as to what America would do—not that, but as to what he would recommend that America should do—in the event of hostilities, and to tell, to communicate, that to Trotzky, Lenine, and the soviet powers.

Then the Brest conference failed; and now I shall ask the indulgence of the committee for a divergence upon the actual situation at Brest.

Senator NELSON. That was the first Brest conference that failed; but the one that succeeded the advance of the German Army up to within 50 miles of Petrograd did not fail. That continued.

Mr. ROBINS. Let us see just what—

Senator NELSON. What was the gap between the two, when the first negotiation took place and the final treaty?

Mr. ROBINS. There was no gap, Senator.

Senator NELSON. What was the period of time between the two?

Mr. ROBINS. It must have been something like seven days afterwards—when Trotzky had come back and the next mission was sent forward—

Senator NELSON. No; I mean when they first opened the negotiation with the Germans at Brest, and then it was postponed, and in the meantime the Germans advanced to within 50 miles of Petrograd, and then they made a treaty.

Mr. ROBINS. You will find on investigation, Senator, that that is not a correct statement of the facts.

Senator OVERMAN. Go ahead and state the facts.

Senator NELSON. What are the facts?

Mr. ROBINS. I will try to.

Senator NELSON. When did the negotiations open at Brest-Litovsk?

Mr. ROBINS. Some time in December. I have not the exact date, but it can be determined.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. It was some time in December. Then they opened the negotiation and there was no advance of German armies after that time during the conference, and there was no advance of the German armies until after the 11th of February, when negotiations had definitely failed.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. Then the advance of the German armies began and the soviet sent another mission to Brest to sign the treaty, the final terms.

Senator NELSON. That is what I had reference to. Between the prior negotiations and the final treaty to which you refer occurred the German advance to within 50 miles of Petrograd.

Mr. ROBINS. That is not the fact.

Senator NELSON. I mean from the time the first negotiation began until the final treaty was made, of Brest-Litovsk; between those two periods?

Mr. ROBINS. Well, Senator, we may be meaning exactly the same thing. Let us see if we are. When negotiations at Brest began there was perfect agreement between Lenine and Trotzky, if I know the facts in relation to the situation. That was to be a negotiation for a democratic peace, a general peace.

Later, when the allies had refused to have anything to do with that conference, then an effort was made for a democratic peace with Germany only—that is, the central powers and Turkey—and Germany comes out along in the last of December—the 26th of December, 1918, I believe—with a statement from the conferees of the central powers at Brest, accepting in general terms democratic peace; no annexations, no indemnities, self-determination of nationalities—a pure camouflage. As soon as the soviet commission goes back to Brest after a recess, expecting to sign that kind of terms, the Germans come out with specific terms.

Senator STERLING. That was after the seven-day recess of which you speak?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, Senator. And then these German terms are now perfectly clear; annexation perfectly clear, indemnities, and no permission at all of self-determination, except in that camouflage of words. What the German powers expected was that the condition of the economic life of Russia and the necessities for peace upon this so-called soviet government would force them to accept the general words of the first statement as an agreement for democratic peace, and then for the specific terms accept a specific treaty which was a betrayal of everything that had been stated in the peace proclamation of the soviet. Instead of that, Lenine and Trotzky both spoke words of the first statement as an agreement for democratic peace, and the purposes of the imperialistic German robbers, and every soviet paper in Russia published editorials containing bitter denunciations of the central powers, and called on the comrades in Vienna and Berlin not to allow the German military masters to take advantage of Russia's condition and force an imperialistic peace, and so on. Trotzky and Lenine at this point divided, and the first division that had occurred in their leadership since the new revolution occurred at that time. Trotzky believed that he could beat the German militarists at Brest by an appeal to German workingmen at Berlin and Vienna, or at least acted as if he did. I think he believed that he could beat the Germans on this sort of a proposition: "I will go there and I will make a statement and say that we came for honest democratic peace. Now, you German autocrats change from democratic peace to the world to an imperialistic robbers' peace for Russia, and we will not agree to that, and now I refuse your imperialistic peace treaty. The war is over, but we will make no treaty of peace with you." And he said in that statement, "German imperialism is trying to carve its will with the sword upon the bodies of living nations"; referring to Esthonia, Livonia, and Courland, etc.

Lenine, who is an extraordinary realist at points of active policy, said, "You are mistaken. You think that the German Army will refuse to march against nonresistant and revolutionary Russia. That is all bunk. The German Army will march.

"You think that the comrades in Berlin and Vienna will rebel against their masters. Nothing doing. The revolutionary spirit is not developed far enough. They will rebel, but it will be later.

"The thing to do is to accept a separate peace at Brest."

Trotsky says "No." Lenine said, "If you do not, you will have to make a worse peace later on, because there will not be any power in soviet Russia that can resist the German military advance on Russia. Our economic and military situation is such that we can not resist now."

May I diverge a moment here? The military situation in Russia, aside from the paralysis of the economic arm, has another element worthy of consideration, Senators. You have heard of the killing of officers by the soldiers and all that is said to have been done in the terrible break up of the morale, and the other practices, almost without a parallel, except that the same story was written in the French revolution. There was a reason for this terrible condition in the army. When the revolution came over there opened a cleavage that was very natural and understandable between the leisure class, privileged officers, and the workingmen and peasant soldiers in the Russian Army. There was the officer class who were selected from the privileged classes, and after being specially selected were educated in the military schools, drilled in a brutal system of discipline, and trained in the departments of arms that they were going to serve in; selected, moreover, under a careful espionage system, after observation for some years to determine that they were thoroughly loyal and could be trusted by the government of the Czar not to engage in any revolutionary enterprise, and to serve faithfully in his armies. When they came back from military service they were to live in ease and comfort afterwards, upon the fruits of the labor of the workmen and the peasants.

As soon as the revolution came over in the army there opened at once a cleavage between officers and soldiers, and the officers saw in the success of the revolution the loss of all they had been taught to fight for, and even what they now possessed, while the common soldiers saw in the success of the revolution all that they had desired and prayed for—land, liberty, and peace. The officer saw himself deprived of his property and expectations, and the soldier saw himself taking the land possibly of his own commanding officer, both having come from the same community. There were brilliant exceptions—officers who would die for the revolution even at personal hazard of their property and soldiers that supported their officers faithfully to the end. But the great general fact was this change between officers and men as a class. The fact is that in that situation there was this cleavage, that the officer mistrusted the soldier and the soldier mistrusted the officer, and anyone who dealt with the actual situation and heard the stories of both, knew that there would be no army in Russia worth the name again until a revolutionary army with revolutionary soldiers and revolutionary officers, fighting to maintain the revolution, would reestablish a morale and a united fighting front. It was practically impossible to bring back the old régime and get the rifles from the workingmen and peasants and build an army in the old way. There was no army. The mass of the folks and soldiers were in the soviets. We all knew that, and we knew that the economic situation made a weak fighting front. It was the need and desire of the allies, which was perfectly proper, to have a strong fighting front, but that was an impracticability. We knew that to hold the front was all that was left in Russia. So Lenine capitalized the facts of the situation and made the statement, "We must accept the Brest peace." Trotzky said, "No." Trotzky had the advantage of the situation, and Lenine, as he was the chairman of the Peace Commission and his plan seemed more of a true revolutionary program, refused to use his influence in the executive committee, saying, "I do not believe in his plan. Let him try it." Trotzky went back to Brest and made his historic statement denouncing Gen. Hoffman, Count Czernin, von Kuhlman, and his crowd, turned his back on the conference, returned to Petrograd and sulked and opposed the ratification of the peace at Moscow.

Senator NELSON. What was the nature of the final treaty at Brest Litovsk?

Mr. ROBINS. We will get to that. As soon as Trotzky left Brest, the German forces did not even wait for the necessary days agreed on in the armistice, but advanced and continued to advance right away on all fronts, and the Russian army crumpled in front of it, as was expected; and then a courageous revolutionary army—red guards and sailors—advanced. However brutal it may have been, it was composed of men who knew how to die; and one thing I found in Russia, the only ones that knew how to die were the red guard. It did know how to die, whatever else it was. These Bolshevik soldiers went forward to meet the advance, and they were overwhelmed and passed by the fleeing old army, rotten to the core.

Then, in view of the confusion, and the fact that there was no effective resistance, Lenine takes full command of the situation. Trotzky sulks, passes from the scene, and for a period Lenine is in command of the show. He orders the signing of the peace on German terms, and a new commission is appointed to go to Brest. They went there and signed the peace, having made a statement that they would not look at the German terms; that it was a peace at the point of the bayonet. They signed the peace and came back, and a proclamation was issued in relation to the situation.

Lenine then calls a meeting of the fourth all-Russian soviet, calls it to meet in Moscow to consider ratification of the Brest peace.

From that time on the leadership and command were in the hands of Lenin. Lenin had actual control of the Russian situation. For myself, I never had any doubt as to where the new power was in Russia after that.

Trotsky opposed, and Karolyn opposed, and a group of the Bolshevik leaders and commissars opposed this fourth all-Russian soviet. They opposed it because, they said, "If you call a soviet like this in this terrible hour of German menace and reaction, the revolution will be destroyed." Lenin says, "No; we will call it." "Where?" "Moscow." "Call it in Moscow, the heart of the reaction, the heart of the old order! Why, you can not hope to have it in Moscow." "We will hold it in Moscow," says Lenin. "Abandon Petrograd, the imperial city?" "Yes," says Lenin. "It is a foolish city, anyhow. It was built by Peter the Great just because he wanted to. It has no economic social relationship to Russian national life. Moscow is the economic heart of Russia."

So the Russian soviet met in Moscow. There was all kinds of confusion. The 5th of March came. Prior to this time, in the confusion that followed the Brest-Litovsk treaty all kinds of confusion was in the air. It was said the soviet government had sold out to Germany, that the soviet government intended for Germany to come in, and that the soviet government was to arrange to deliver over Petrograd and Moscow. You heard all sorts of rumors and impossible things.

During this time I had been trying to help the American interests in Russia and to keep the allied representatives in Russia. It was perfectly apparent, Senators, that the German program in Russia was to drive the allies out. They wanted to get the allies out and stop all idea of economic cooperation with America, America being thought of the most favorably of the foreign nations in Russia by reason of our democratic traditions. When Germany had accomplished this, then Russia would lie prostrate in the hands of German economic control, regardless of what the soviet thought or did. Mirbach was there to get the allies out and to get hold of the Russian resources and raw materials.

I want to refer now for a moment to German propaganda. One side says that it is a perfectly honest situation all the way through; that it is all sincere revolutionist. The other says that it is a corrupt German agent and military situation all the way through. Both are wrong. That there were German agents and German money in the Bolshevik revolution there is not any doubt. But, Senators, that condition had been in Russia for better than 20 years. I had part of the records of the old secret police in my possession while in Moscow. They were in my hands for some weeks, and I had them all translated, and it showed, in part, the relation that Germany had to propaganda in Russia. I wanted to know the situation so that I could stand on my feet with some reasonable intelligence, and this is what I found; that German agents and German money had been working in Russia for 20 years vigorously in two groups utterly unconnected in Russia, both taking orders from the German secret service in Berlin, one working with the extreme left and the other the extreme right. One favored revolution and the other favored the autocracy. I cared more about the radical group, because that was the group I had to expect to deal with. The old order was gone. In the course of my investigation it developed that a general strike had been called in Russia—in Moscow and Petrograd—just before the mobilization in 1914. It was suppressed by the vigorous action of the Cossack soldiers under the Czar. But before it was suppressed evidence was received by the old secret police of the Czar that a million marks had been spent by German agents through sincere revolutionists to foment this strike.

I paid particular attention to the radical situation, because I did not have any too much time, and spent it where most useful. The German method in handling the radical situation was to find usually some woman—it happened in so many cases that it seemed that that was the general rule, to use a woman, some woman—of the aristocratic group who had a city palace somewhere on the Neva in Petrograd or on a Moscow boulevard, who had fallen upon impecunious times financially, and was willing to serve Germany, possibly not always disclosing all the circumstances. Then this person would call a meeting of a circle of revolutionists in her home between midnight and 4 o'clock in the morning, and they would meet and discuss the revolution, and this woman, after some impassioned appeal, when they talked about the presence of the terror and the misery of the people, would break into tears and would say, "What can I do for poor Russia?" She could not do anything but give money to the revolutionists; and so she gave money. They felt that this was a converted Russian who was now turning toward revolutionary propaganda, but they were really using German money. That was the method by which they ran the show.

When the mobilization succeeded in 1914, the German military autocracy began working in its own fashion with the extreme left and with the extreme right in Russia, and letting each develop, to see which was the more successful. That brings us to the March revolution. Now, there were two forces working for revolution in March. One force, Senators, though brutal, was a square and honest revolutionary force, and the other was a German plot for the purpose of disorganizing Russia. At this time there was conflict between the two groups of German agents in Russia. The German group that worked with the extreme left insisted that the best interest of Germany was to work for the disorganization of the Russian front by revolution in Russia. The group that worked through the autocracy said that the best interest of Germany was to work with Razputin and the Czarina and that the Czar could be brought to make a separate peace with the Kaiser, and I found many intelligent people who believed that if the March revolution had not come over when it did the Czar would have made a separate peace with Germany within 30 days. I do not know whether that is true. But they said it was. Certainly Razputin had been bought and changed his policy between December and the middle of January, 1917. It was certain that the Czarina was at all times friendly to the German interest. It is certain that German influence had increased in the court; that it had been powerful enough at one time to secure the appointment of Von Stürmer, a Germanophile. It was certain that the German power was gaining in Russia.

As soon as the Kerensky government came into power and tried to support the allied cause, the German propaganda began as usual at the extreme right and the extreme left to work for confusion. To the rich Russians they said, "You are against this revolution; we must have back the Czar." To the revolutionary workingmen they said, "Why don't you have a real revolution and get rid of the bourgeoisie and get the land? Why don't you join the Bolsheviks?" And so they were taking advantage of every situation to accomplish their work.

When the Soviet-Bolshevist revolution came over, it came over much more successfully than the Germans expected, if I am any judge, and within two weeks, instead of creating civil war as they had expected, and simply have Kerensky fighting here and in charge of some cities, and Bolsheviks fighting there and in charge of some cities, there was a complete disorganization of Kerensky's power, a reorganization behind the vital soviets, and Bolshevism swept the whole of Russia, with Kerensky out entirely; and the Germans now found themselves faced with an army that is beginning to throw into the German and the Austrian Army the culture of the soviet. In other words, this poison gas that the Germans had blown into Russia and had aided in Russia for the purpose of breaking Russian morale is now being blown back into the Central Empires' armies, and it endangers their morale, and there begins at once a vigorous German activity against the soviet. What was its form? Its first form was to organize the anarchist groups of Russia—and I don't want to include all anarchists. There are sincere anarchists, as there are sincere crazy men everywhere—everywhere in all cults. We might as well be honest with ourselves. There were perfectly sincere anarchists and perfectly designing groups in anarchist clubs, men who, because of their new activity, I had to follow and find out about; and I sent the best men I had to Kronstadt, and I found that men who two weeks before had neither cause nor means now had a cause and plenty of money, were planning an all-Russian anarchist conference and régime, and the disorganization of the soviets. They criticized the soviets as being without true proletarian ruthlessness, and said that the anarchists, if given power, would do the job of robbing the robbers much better than the Bolsheviks. One of their methods of approach was to attack the allied embassies and try to drive them out of Russia, to forward as much as possible the idea of the thief and the murderer, and the German agent in the soviet, and at the same time to undermine the soviet. What was their method? Their method was to get together little groups and hold meetings and denounce America; pass resolutions against the American ambassador, against our action in relation to Bergman and Emma Goldman and Mooney; capitalize every one of the economic situations or political situations that were dangerous or difficult in this country.

Senator STERLING. Do you say that this was confined to the anarchistic groups alone?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; I should say that you could mark every line of it by the anarchistic group. People went into it who were not anarchists, but your leadership was; and resolutions were finally passed denouncing the American ambassador, saying that they were going to hold him personally responsible. I learned of this circumstance.

Senator STERLING. Did that group that passed such a resolution as that sail under the name of the anarchistic group?

Mr. ROBINS. Absolutely.

Senator STERLING. And not as Bolsheviki?

Mr. ROBINS. Not at all. The anarchistic group of Kronstadt, it was, and they came to me and said that they were anarchists. A delegation came to the American Embassy, as the American ambassador will tell you. Let me say this in relation to this nationalization of women stuff, and the Saratov soviet that was supposed to have passed that resolution. The confusion is such that I do not know whether they passed it or not. It was claimed they did, and I accepted the fact that they had, but I have heard since that they did not, but it was passed by an anarchist group that had gotten control for the moment of a local soviet; and it was passed in my judgment for the purpose it served, of discrediting the Russian revolutionary situation. That is either a fact or is not a fact, as investigation will prove. But they were active in this way. One day, the 1st of January I think it is, I am at the embassy when the ambassador tells me of circumstances that evidently have created considerable concern in the embassy—not necessarily upon the part of the ambassador. The ambassador worked harder, stayed longer, met the situation with more steadiness, in my judgment, than any other ambassador there. That, I think, is true of the American ambassador, and will be a part of the history of the situation. The story was this: The embassy was called up on the telephone that morning by a woman who said that she knew of something of very great interest to the American Embassy, and she will not come to the American Embassy to tell them, because she will be murdered if she does, but she asks that accredited representatives go down to meet her at a certain street corner. Accredited representatives went down. The commercial attaché, Huntington, I think, and the private secretary of the ambassador, Mr. Johnston, went down. They met her on the street. This woman tells this tale in substance: "Last night, while entertaining some friends in my home, I was called to the door. I went out and a sailor was there, a man whom I had befriended some time previously. He had some very fine wine to sell me at a ridiculously cheap price. I said to him, 'How can you afford to sell wine like that so cheaply,' and he said, 'That is wine that I got when we looted the Italian embassy,' " and she told him that she did not want to buy it, and he said that there was a lot more to be had; that they were going to get plenty more. He said, "The anarchists are going to blow up the American Embassy to-night, and we are going to have the right to loot their stores, and they have lots of them. There is plenty of whisky and wine there." She told him that she would not buy the stuff and he went away, but she could not sleep that night because of this preying upon her mind. She meets these men on the street corner.

That is a situation that is passed to me. I believed it to be just what I think now it was, German agent stuff. The woman happens to be the divorced wife of Proctor, of Proctor & Gamble, of Cincinnati, and was at that particular hour in the secret service records of three of the allied nations as a German agent in Russia. When they tell me that the embassy is going to be blown up I said I did not think so, and as evidence of my good faith I said that I would stay there that night, and I stayed there until 1 o'clock and then went to my hotel, but nothing developed, of course. The anarchistic development had gotten to the point where I was concerned about it, as every one was. Everything was more or less in a flux, and in that terrible hour I wanted to know whether the anarchists who were definitely German agents were permitted by the soviets to continue their propaganda under cover. Is Smolny letting them do this thing? Well, certain men are crooks and certain men are good men, and they get into all places, and I asked myself, what is the real position at Smolny. I went down there and I talked with Bouch Bruevitch, and I said to him: "There is a good deal of debate here as to where God is (used in the sense of power in Russia), whether he is in Smolny or with this bunch of anarchists, and I want to know. I want to know where the power is in this community. I am saying one thing, and there are those who say that I am not relating the facts, and that you are in with this German situation in this anarchist game, and the anarchist game is for driving the allies out of Russia; I am settled on that. Are you with it or not?" I said to him, "Here is the test. The headquarters of the anarchists; you know perfectly well where it is; I can name the place. Will you go down and raid it? If you will, you will find contraband there, where I happen to know of so many cases of sugar, so many pairs of shoes, and all sorts of other things. You raid that and you will find ample reason for raiding it as soon as you raid it. You raid that and it will be a test of the situation. I would like to have you do that, but do not use the name of the American ambassador or my name." That night a platoon of soldiers and a machine-gun crew, with tanks, went down and surrounded that place and broke into it. They resisted with hand grenades and guns, and the anarchist leader of the group was shot and taken to a hotel on a stretcher. The next morning the Busa Verstnik, the anarchist organ, in the same column where it had a few days before the bitter resolution denouncing the American ambassador for being an imperialist because of what we did to Bergman, and so on—had a few sticks like this: "Yesterday evening, at night, the thieves and murderers of Smolny surrounded our headquarters, the anarchist club number so and so, shot our honored leader and stole our supplies. We live under a hell of a proletarian government." I took that paper and laid it on the desk of the American ambassador as an evidence of how much Smolny feared the anarchists and whether they cooperated with them or not.

Senator STERLING. What did the Bolsheviks do, if anything, toward suppressing that anarchist paper?

Mr. ROBINS. They ultimately suppressed it, but not then. Here was the situation in that regard. All of the revolutionary groups were implicated in the revolution. For instance, in Moscow the anarchist club started under the revolution in 1917—that was finally cleaned out by the soviet—and neither the Duma nor the Kerensky government tried to resist it, because it had been implicated in helping in the start of the revolution. You know how thieves and murderers line up with a revolutionary situation and afterwards sometimes become leaders. It is a well-known revolutionary result.

Under these circumstances, uncertainty growing in Petrograd about the situation, it finally becomes apparent that the allied embassies were going to leave by reason of the German advance. The German advance still goes on and is rumored to be going on much faster, and all that sort of thing. Prior to this time the question of the American interests remaining in Russia was of real concern to the American ambassador and myself. We wanted to stay there and play the hand out and rewin it if it was possible. We did not see any gain in abandoning it and running away. Investigation was made of a place that might serve in the situation, and Vologda was selected because transportation was good, opening to Archangel and Petrograd and Moscow and Siberia and Vladivostok and Finland; communication was good, telegraph to Archangel, wireless to Murmansk, and the English controlled the cable to London; and if we lost the Finnish cable, and if we lost Vladivostok, connections were still open. Vologda was far enough north, at least, to be out of range of any expected German advance. Petrograd could fall and Moscow could fall and Vologda would still be free. We investigated thoroughly and found it a small rural timber-working community, where there had been very little riot or effect of revolution. The Duma was gone, but some man who had been in charge of the Duma was in an official position with the soviet.

Senator STERLING. What was the name of the leader of the Duma?

Mr. ROBINS. It is in the record. It is not in my mind now. I then went to Lenine and said, "Will you aid in getting safe transportation to the American embassy train and in protecting and organizing the Vologda support behind the American ambassador?" He said he would. A special train was arranged. It was arranged that the ambassador should go out, and a number of my mission and a special car of the mission should be attached to the train, as the American Red Cross had reasonable credit throughout the situation, and might be of use in case of attack at any point. I was to remain in Petrograd. That was the feeling and the purpose and the understanding up to the evening of the 26th of February. None of my stuff was packed in the Hotel Europe, though every other person's was.

Senator NELSON. The 26th of what month?

Mr. ROBINS. February, 1918. I go down to the station at Nicholaiievsky and find the train there, but some trouble about it starting, and I talk to some of the authorities and find out that the train has been definitely stopped—that the commission of safety of Petrograd has ordered the train stopped—for the following reasons, as so stated to me: The German advance is not nearly so imminent as has been said, and if the American embassy and the American ambassador leave, it will excite the people, and counter-revolutionists will take charge of the situation and the revolution may be overthrown. I said, "That train ought to go. You have agreed to do it and it should go." I get no results. There was nothing stirring at all. I go to Lenine. He is sitting at his desk with the whole task in his hands, and I say to him something like this, "Commissioner, you said this train should go. The train is stopped, and I understand you have agreed it should be stopped. I agree absolutely that there is no immediate danger of the fall of Petrograd. I do not share that thought at all. I know that there is certain danger in the city, and certain reactionary elements will use the going of the American Embassy in favor of overturning the soviets and establishing either anarchy or the old order, whichever may come to suit them; but, Commissioner, it is worse to keep that train there than to send it out. You know better than I do that the old control in the barracks has passed, you have had absolute control of these barracks ever since the November revolution, and now you have not. There is a division in the barracks, and you know as well as I do that some of these groups are about to act on their own responsibility, and if they go down there and loot the American Embassy or want to kill the ambassador, you may not be able to protect it or him, and then there would be a blot on the soviet in Russia from which it would never recover. I ask you to send this train out, and send it under guard," and he orders that train sent. He orders a guard to see it get out if any trouble starts down there to keep it from going. I have the original letter that he wrote that gives full credit to the stationing of the ambassador at Vologda, ordering the soviet of Vologda to give to the Ambassador and every representative of the American Embassy every possible cooperation and protection. On that letter the headquarters were secured.

After a time the comfort of the embassy was established, and as soon as that was done I came back to Petrograd. On the 5th of March I am in Petrograd. I am going up to see about some of our stores. We have now something like 400,000 cans of condensed milk, which I have kept through a number of weeks of want and misery—kept even when children were dying for want of milk—because I knew that between March and May when the new supply would come would be the real strain, and Bolshevik rifle and machine-gun men had prevented riots of mothers from getting that milk. That was the kind of power they exercised in Petrograd, and they did what they said they would do. We had the milk. I am going up there to Smolny to see about the change of guards. Trotzky said to me, "Do you want to prevent the Brest peace from being ratified?" I said, "There is nothing that I wanted so much to do as that." He said, "You can do it." I laughed and said, "You have always been against the Brest peace, but Lenine is the other way; and frankly, Commissioner, Lenine is running this show." He says, "You are mistaken. Lenine realizes that the threat of the German advance is so great that if he can get economic cooperation and military support from the allies he will refuse the Brest peace, retire, if necessary, from both Petrograd and Moscow to Ekaterinberg, reestablish the front in the Urals, and fight with allied support against the Germans."

Senator STERLING. This was Trotsky stating what Lenine would do?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; and he in agreement with it. That was in entire agreement with my representation made to him through the ambassador on the 1st or 2d of January, better than two months before, that if they got to the place where they would really fight, we would help. I said to him, "Commissioner, that is the most important statement that has been made to me in this situation. Will you put that in writing?" He said, "You want me to give you my life, don't you?" I said, "No; but I want something specific. I do not ask you to sign it. You make a written statement of your specific inquiry, interrogatories to the American Government, and that with affirmative response these things will take place, and after writing arrange that Lenine will see me and that he will agree to this, which is counter to what I have had in mind as Lenine's position, arrange that a fourth person, my confidential Russian secretary, whom you know and I know, Mr. Alexander Gumberg, shall be with me, and I will act on that." I go back at 4 o'clock. In Trotsky's office is handed me this original document in Russian. We then go down to Lenine's office. We then hold a conference upon this document. It is explained, translated, stated what will be done. I am satisfied for the hour of the genuineness of the position, that they will act in this way, or am sufficiently satisfied to act, and I leave there and go to the British commissioner, R. H. Bruce Lockhart.

Now I digress again. When William B. Thompson left Russia in November, 1917, shortly after the Bolshevik revolution, he left because being so involved in the Kerensky service and because of what was said in regard to him in the Bolshevik papers, as being the representative of Wall Street and trying to get the trans-Siberian for the Morgans and copper interests for himself, and other stuff of that kind, it was wise for him to leave and to cooperate at the other end. He left unwillingly, and I wish to bear this testimony, that he looked down machine guns and did not tremble, and he did not have to do it. He was not called upon at that moment to take risks, but he took them freely. He came out. He stopped in London. He saw a number of people. He saw Lloyd-George for two hours. Col. Thompson is not a talker, but he must have gotten it across. That evening Lloyd-George sent through his private secretary a telegram to R. H. Bruce Lockhart, who was in the lake region in Scotland resting after seven years in Russia, during four of which he was consul general of the British Government at Moscow—36 or so years old, a Scotchman with a perfectly competent head on his shoulders, who spoke Russian fluently, read and understood the language, and understood the people after seven years of association. I saw the telegram sent by Mr. George's secretary, as alleged, and believe it to be true. Mr. Lockhart then told me that the premier had said to him something in substance like this: "I have just had a most surprising talk with an American Red Cross colonel named Thompson, who tells me of the Russian situation. I do not know whether he is right, but I know that our people are wrong. They have missed the situation. You are being sent as special commissioner to Russia, with power. A ship will be ready to take you to Stockholm as soon as you are ready, and you will be able to select your staff and have ample resources. I want you to find a man there named Robins, who was put in command by this man Thompson. Find out what he is doing with this soviet government. Look it over carefully. If you think what he is doing is sound, do for Britain what he is trying to do for America. That seems, on the whole, the best lookout on this complex situation; but you are given liberty. Go to it."

He arrived in Petrograd. A member from the British Embassy came to me and said: "There is an Englishman here, just arrived, who has been in Russia, and comes back with some relation to the Government who wants to have you for dinner." I said: "No; I am too busy. I have wasted all of my time at the British Embassy that I expect to waste there. I know your policy; it is perfectly definite, and I won't go." Then he told me some more things about the special power that this man had, and I said, "I will go"; and I went, and we had dinner, and after dinner we separated together, and he began talking close, and I began fencing. I suppose his guard was up, and so was mine. It was a difficult situation. All sorts of criticism had run across one line and another. I did not know his purposes. Finally, in the twist of the things, he showed me his credentials, and it was perfectly clear that he then represented the power of the British Government in the situation.

I said to him: "Now, I want to ask you a question, Mr. Lockhart. Are you free? You can not handle this Russian story from Downing Street or anywhere else. It is too much of an original outdoor situation that you have got to shift from day to day. No man knows it 12 hours ahead. All I am trying to do is something that is useful and right while we do it, and not prejudge the future." He said: "I am absolutely free." I then took him over to my office, and we opened up everything I had of a documentary nature, and went through the whole situation with all its light and shadow and everything else that I knew. The next morning we went out to Smolny. He had a great advantage because he speaks and knows the Russian language and had many lines of Russian contact. When we were coming back we talked together, and I said to him, "I wish you would see some of the 7 per cent. You could not have been consul general at Moscow for four years without knowing a lot of them. They will tell you an absolutely different story from what I tell you. I think I am right in my judgment and am acting on it. The life of the mission and my own life and supplies here are being dealt with on that basis, on the basis that this thing is an international social revolutionary situation opposed to all governments, but more opposed right now, because it is nearer to them, to the German militarists than anything else, and that we can do business with them on that basis. Now, they will tell you an entirely different story. I am willing to risk this, Mr. Commissioner Lockhart, because I do not want to be starting and stopping two weeks later; I would rather you never started. This is rough water; this is stormy weather; the boat rocks a lot, and a man has to know why he knows what he knows or think he does before he can play in this hand."

I said to him, "Another thing, you are going across lines of economic interest in this play, commissioner. You will hear it said that I am the representative of Wall Street"—which, Senator, would make Wall Street turn over. "You will hear it said that I am the representative of Wall Street; that I am the servant of William B. Thompson to get Altai copper for him; that I have already got 500,000 acres of the best timber land in Russia for myself; that I have already copped off the Trans-Siberian Railway; that they have given me a monopoly of the platinum of Russia; that this explains my working with the soviet." All that was said. You could get forged documents showing all these charges and others to be true. There were more forged papers of one kind and another in Russia than ever before in human history. There were forgery mills of the old Okhrana, the secret police, forged against the revolutionists, and of the revolutionists forged against the Okhrana. Passports and letters were forged in great numbers. You could not beat it in a million years. I could prove anything by all the documents you want. I said, "You will hear that talk. Now, I do not think it is true, Commissioner, but let us assume it is true. Let us assume that I am here to capture Russia for Wall Street and American business men. Let us assume that you are a British wolf and I am an American wolf, and that when this war is over we are going to eat each other up for the Russian market; let us do so in perfectly frank, man fashion, but let us assume at the same time that we are fairly intelligent wolves, and that we know that if we do not hunt together in this hour the German wolf will eat us both up, and then let us go to work."

He left me, and he came back, and he said, "You told the truth. They sing a different song, just as opposite as it is possible to be; but I believe your song, and I am going to work that way"; and from that time in January until I left Russia, the British high commissioner and myself were in absolute agreement on every move. We ate breakfast together every morning.

As soon as I left Lenine and Trotzky on the afternoon of the 5th of March I went to the British commissioner, presented my paper, and said, "What do you think of it? You have been talking with Trotzky every day." Up to that time he had never talked with Lenine. "Do you think it is worth dealing with?" He said, "I do. I have sent cables in relation to it"; and he then sent a cable, written on British Embassy stationery, which I have, advocating exactly what I advocated, only going further than I would have gone or did go in my statement at the time.

I left him. Harold Williams was seen, conservative correspondent for the London Conservative Daily Chronicle and secret information agent for the British Foreign Office, an intelligent, able, honest, and patriotic Englishman who had lived in Russia 12 years and has written one of the best books ever written on Russia, who had married Madam Turcova, a Russian intelligentsia of some position and property, a noble and splendid woman, but in the Kerensky setting, in the Duma setting, bitterly hostile to the Bolsheviki in common with many other sincere and splendid people. Harold Williams had been against the whole Bolshevik program at all points; had denounced it in unmeasured terms, as those of you who have read his cables know. He had come to me, criticizing my position, and there had passed between us a conversation that ran in measure after this fashion:

"Now, you have said some rather unpleasant things, but this is rather a bad time for allied representatives in Russia to quarrel with each other. You went down to Kief and worked with the Ukrainian rada because they were respectable, nice, pleasant people, and worked with them against the criminal, wicked Red Guard, as it was supposed. You helped to get American and French and English officers down there to cooperate with the Ukrainian rada. You helped to get the 130,000,000 francs that were paid to the Ukrainian rada about four days before it sold out, body, boots, and breeches, to the central powers, opened the front, and let in German rifles. I did not say when that development came across that you were an enemy of the allies or a German agent, or that you were being buncoed by the Ukrainian rada. I said you had made a bad guess, but that you were a perfectly sincere and patriotic man. Then, when you went down to Rostov on the Don, and worked with Kaledines and Korniloff—Kaledines a sincere, courageous, and patriotic Cossack officer, in my judgment the best man in the military circle in Russia, but seeing in the terms of the old order, which he had a perfect right to do, and had I been raised as he was raised I probably would have seen the same way—you believed and he believed that his Cossack soldiers would fight with him, and you started from the Don to come to Moscow, and you got 30 miles, and your troops began to leave you, and the peasants rose with their rifles and opposed your advance; nothing from Moscow, but the local peasants were against you; and you heard of an uprising in the Don and that Rostov had been taken by the soviet, and you fled back there, and Kaledines, when he found that his soldiers had abandoned him under the culture of the soviet and the call of the soviet, went on his porch and blew his brains out—a courageous, patriotic, man who had guessed wrong and had promised what he could not perform, and in the sorrow and misery of his disillusionment he killed himself; and then you came away, after we had gotten implicated in a counter-revolutionary move. I did not say that you were an enemy of the allies. I simply said that you had made another bad guess.

“Now, here I have been working day by day, dealing with this situation or trying to do it; evacuating copper, evacuating supplies, evacuating the gold from the state bank, evacuating platinum from the state bank to Vologda. Some of that gold that we evacuated at that time finally got into the Czecho-Slovak possession. You know it. You know how they got that gold and where it came from—from the state bank; how it was gotten from the state bank to Vologda; it was taken under the Bolshevik frank and Bolshevik rifles, and I urged on them as an evidence of good faith to take it away, because there was danger that the Germans would get Petrograd and they would get that gold, and it was done.” I said, “I am doing about as well as I can, and I know you are doing about as well as you can, and let us both of us do the best we can and not spend our time cursing each other”; and he left me. He was told, “Here is the situation. What do you think about it?” and I have got the autograph cable written by Harold Williams on the stationery of the British Embassy on the night of the 5th of March, dispatched to the premier, dispatched to the foreign office of Great Britain, dispatched to his paper, the Chronicle, in which he says that after four months the only power in Russia is the Bolshevik power; that if they are supported at this point as recommended they will declare war against the Germans, that there will be a failure of the Brest-Litovsk ratification, in his judgment, and that that is the sound policy.

I then went to the representative of the National City branch banks in Russia, R. R. Stevens, an able and competent and courageous man, who differs with me at many points, and has the same right to his opinion that I have to mine, but representing that $200,000,000 investment; and I, seeing or seeming to see what this thing meant, wanted to know what he thought about it. I did not know his mind before. I went to him, I presented it to him, and he dictated a cable; the carbon copy of the original I have, and the original I myself sent to Vanderlip, of the National City Bank, in New York, setting out exactly the same situation as had been agreed on with Lockhart and Williams and myself.

I then went to the representative of the Associated Press in Russia, Charles Smith, a man of middle years, a conservative man—he had been far-eastern representative at Peking for years; an able, patient, courageous person, anti-Bolshevik in every fiber of his system—and put it in front of him. I said, "I know that your instructions are against wiring policy. Here is a situation that I want to open to you, to see whether you want to do anything in relation to it," and he sent two cables in agreement with that position, and I have copies of the original cables sent by him.

I then took the train and went to Vologda, and reported to the American ambassador the situation, and the American ambassador sent two cables, portions of which two cables I have, given me by the ambassador, in line with that position—the position of assuring the soviet that if they would make war on Germany and refuse the ratification of the Brest-Litovsk peace, they would be aided and supported, as far as we were able to aid and support, in the new front.

I went then from there to Moscow, where the conference was to be held. Before I went to Moscow, and before I left to go to Vologda, I went back to see Lenine, and I said, "The general cooperation on this situation is better than I had supposed. I want more time, Commissioner. It takes time to decode long cables like this and get an agreement. You have always dealt with America as though America would be separated from the allies. America is never separated from the allies. We are fighting and we will stand or fall together. America would take no policy that England and France do not agree to, and it will take time to get that agreement."

The conference was called, as you can see in the public papers at the time, for the 12th of March. This was the 5th or the morning of the 6th. The next day's issue of the Izvestija will show that the date of convening the fourth all-Russian Soviet had been changed to the 14th at the request of the minister-president, Lenine, in conference with the executive committee. I think the reason the two days' extension was given was to give us time to answer.

I went to Moscow. I got to Moscow, and they said: "There will not be any fourth all-Russian Soviet." Representatives of the allies there told me so. They said: "Don't you know that Lenine has absconded already to Finland?" I said: "No, I did not know it." They said: "If he came here he would not live 24 hours. He may put over stuff like that up in Petrograd, but there is nothing doing down here."

I then prepared to investigate that conference. I wanted to know whether it represented the workmen and peasants of Russia, or whether it was simply a group of red guards, and a packed conference, which some of us are reasonably familiar with. I have sat in them. I wanted to know what it really was, and I set about trying to know what it really was.

Lenine came a day before the conference opened. I went to see him. He said, "What have you heard from your Government?" I said, "Nothing. What has Lockhart heard?" He said, "Exactly the same thing." He said, "You will not hear. Neither the American Government nor any of the allied governments will cooperate, even against the Germans, with the workmen's and peasants' revolutionary government of Russia." Well, I smiled and said I thought differently. I said, "Commissioner, I am trying to find out about this assembly here. Some say that it is just Red Guards that you sent down here from Petrograd, and that you brought up from the soviets you control in Moscow, and from Kharhov and Odessa, and, quite frankly, I am trying to know. I know a packed bunch, and I am going to try to find out what this is. I am trying to know because I am acting with my associates, risking our lives daily on the proposition one way, putting lots of material and supplies at issue. If the Germans are going to come in quickly and take Petrograd and Moscow, I am trying to know it. I want to know this whole situation." And I said to him, "Commissioner, I think you know that I will try to know it, whatever risk may be involved;" and that rested back upon a personal relationship with Lenine at a time of great question, when they said that I was going to be shot, that I will speak of later if it is interesting; but he knew, I think, Senators, that I was not wholly concerned about whether I got out of Russia; that I was concerned that while I was there I played the thing through from step to step, and that I did not take false rumors, and that I did not either fool myself or fool others if I could avoid it.

He said, "What can I do?" I said, "Why, you could get me the credentials, or alleged credentials, of the delegates. I would like to have them. I would like to go over them with great care. My purpose will be to try to find out whether these credentials really came from the communities that they pretend to come from or are alleged to come from. I am going to subject them to careful scrutiny; and I should like to have that as one element of my inquiry." He said, "I don't know; I will see Smerdorff, who is the chairman of the executive committee."

I had these credentials. I went over these credentials—three pieces of paper in some instances from three villages united behind one delegate—with the paper and the finger marks and the headings and the whole lot of things that had every similitude of genuineness, in seeming, at least. They were subjected to investigation by a titled Russian on the one hand and my private secretary on the other, and agreed to as genuine credentials, in their judgment, as nearly as they could tell; and I believed that there were in that fourth all-Russian Soviet, gentlemen of the committee, delegates from as far east as Vladivostok, as far west as Smolensk, as far north as Murmansk, as far south as Odessa, and that it was for the 93 per cent—absolutely nobody of the other group, but for the 93 per cent—as a class representation of the vast class mass in Russia, the most genuine assembly that had taken place in Russia up to that hour.

The debate ran two days and two nights.

Senator STERLING. How many were there in the assembly. Col. Robins?

Mr. ROBINS. I had 1,186 credentials. There were some 1,200 delegates or more. There were those whose credentials for one reason or another I did not get; group credentials, they claimed, in some instances.

In this debate no one at any time ever spoke of the treaty of peace as anything but a shameful treaty, a robbers' treaty, a treaty at the point of the bayonet. Lenine spoke of it as the peace of Tilsit, as the peace of preparation, as necessary for revolutionary Russia to reorganize her economic life, rebuild her revolutionary army, when they would do against the German brigands what the Germans did against Napoleon. That was the program, but he did not give the whole program in his opening address. He laid the foundation for a situation that might move and change.

There were seven organized parties in that convention. Six of those parties passed a vote against the ratification. They were minor parties. One party only supported ratification, and that was the Bolshevik party, the party of which Lenine was chief, and there was important defection in that party. Radek was writing brilliant editorials in the Izvestija against the peace. Trotzky was against the peace. Karolyn was against the peace, and a number of his associates were against the peace; and the social revolutionists of the left, who had been indispensable to control of the soviet by the Bolshevik power up to that time, opposed the peace.

Senator STERLING. Was Trotzky there?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir. He refused to come. He was sulking in Petrograd.

About an hour before midnight on the second night of the conference Lenine was sitting on the platform; I was sitting on a step of the platform, and I looked around at this man, and he motioned to me. I went to him. He said, "What have you heard from your Government?" I said, "Nothing." I said, "What has Lockhart heard?" He said, "Nothing." He said, "I am now going to the platform and the peace will be ratified;" and he went to the platform, and he made a speech of an hour and twenty-odd minutes or so, in which he outlined the economic condition, the military condition, the absolute necessity after the three years of economic waste and war for the Russian peasant and workingman to have the means, even by a shameful peace, for the reorganization of life in Russia and the protection of the revolution, as he said; and the peace was ratified by two and a half to one in that vote.

Would you wish to stop now for the time being?

Senator OVERMAN. I think we had better stop now for luncheon.

(Thereupon, at 1.30 o'clock p. m. the subcommittee took a recess until 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

The subcommittee reconvened at 2.30 o'clock p. m., pursuant to the taking of the recess.

TESTIMONY OF MR. RAYMOND ROBINS—Resumed.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee will come to order. Mr. Robins, you may proceed without Senator Nelson.

Mr. ROBINS. At your pleasure, Mr. Chairman.

As soon as the ratification of the Brest peace by the fourth all-Russian soviet was confirmed, I then, so far as I had any influence in the situation, changed my relationship on this basis, that whereas before I had sought recognition of the Government as a de facto Government, which seemed to me clearly to be desirable, I felt that the ratification of the Brest conference, whatever may have been the reasons for the ratification, or whoever may have been responsible for its ratification, was a fact of such character that the allies could not be expected to recognize, even as de facto, the soviet government in Russia. But that did not seem to preclude the possibility of economic cooperation or the control of raw materials, the furnishing of the economic mind that would direct Russian economic development and open the markets of Russia to America. I am one who, though a radical, believes that in feeding, clothing, and housing people you are doing a work of the very highest social consequence, and of great moral value, and I believe in the principle of private, and, if you please, capitalistic industry, and think it can defend itself on its own ground.

What I saw there was this, that by reason of the Brest peace then more than at any other time there was a bitter resentment between the Russian people and the German Government, and that therefore Count Mirbach's economic mission would probably fail, even though there might be agents of Germany in the soviet government, and that we should meet the pressure that was upon the soviet government and the Russian people to furnish this economic mind. To that end I worked steadily with the cooperation and under the leadership and instruction of the American ambassador. The soviet government asked from the American Government, from the American ambassador, the privilege of sending an economic mission to America under the guaranty of the government that there should be no propaganda, either en route or in America, and willing to make whatever pains or penalties were necessary to insure that situation. The ambassador telegraphed to me that he had asked for the privilege of the economic mission. But we never heard from the Government in relation to it; at least, I never heard from the ambassador directly in relation to it.

This situation was this. You are familiar, Senators, with the distinction between primary and secondary production, primary being the products of the fields and the forests and mines, the land lying outdoors. There are more uncultivated fertile acres, more untouched virgin forests, and more unmined mineral wealth, in what was the Russian Empire than anywhere else in the world. The working population, 180,000,000, were producing those raw materials the world needs. If we should cooperate with them, we would have a great economic market for our secondary production, for our manufactures, and the basis of contact that would ultimately mean the cultural, industrial, and economic cooperation and penetration on fair terms of Russia by America and the allies, working through America, the same Germans have been carrying on for 20 years, under unfair terms, and were seeking to carry on through Count Mirbach at this time.

To the end of getting this cooperation, and after discussion with the ambassador and the commercial attaché of the American embassy, Mr. Huntington, a cable was sent by the embassy—that had been considered, of course, by the ambassador, or it would not have been sent—which reads as follows [reading]:

Am convinced by daily consideration and reconsideration of facts and events as they have occurred since you left Russia that Trotsky's astounding answer to Germany at Brest-Litovsk was uninfluenced by any consideration other than the purpose of international Socialism striving for world revolution.

You may say that that was quite sufficient. I agree with you thoroughly. But that was the fact; that was my judgment. [Reading:]

Every act of Bolshevik government is consistent with and supports this theory. Contrary theory of German control and influence no longer tenable. Great values for Allied cause in resulting situation depend on continuance of Bolshevik authority as long as possible. No other party will refrain from accepting German peace or so deeply stir internal forces opposed to German government.

Now, why did I say that, Senator? I said that because of the false view that was held by many, and carried abroad, in relation to the constituent assembly. The constituent assembly was controlled by Tchernoff. Tchernoff was its chairman, elected by an overwhelming majority in its first and only session. Tchernoff had been removed as commissioner of agriculture from the Kerensky government because of suspected German affiliations, and in the conference that decided on his removal Madam Breshkovsky and President Kerensky both agreed on the proposition. He now turns up chairman of the constituent assembly, and as such chairman practically indorses all the extreme radical program of the Bolsheviks, but says the Bolsheviks can not make peace with Germany. "We need peace; we can make peace. They are prevented from making peace by their formula of principles of self-determination, no annexations, and no indemnities, but we are not bound by this program; we can make peace." In other words, he pleaded the principle of quick peace, which was the principal desire of the war-weary Russians as a whole, and that was his reason for being supported against the Bolsheviks. So that when the constituent assembly was dismissed by Tchernoff some of us believed that it was in the interests of the allies and against the quick German peace.

Senator OVERMAN. That dispatch is from whom and to whom?

Mr. ROBINS. From myself to Col. Thompson.

Senator STERLING. You say that was submitted to Ambassador Francis?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; sent through him, and in the ambassador's cypher, through the Secretary of State.

Mr. HUMES. Just a moment. As I understand it, that, in effect, was a communication from you to Thompson that was communicated by the ambassador through the State Department, in order to insure its delivery to Col. Thompson?

Mr. ROBINS. Quite true. What is the point?

Mr. HUMES. I just wanted to have it clear in my mind whether it is an official communication from the ambassador as expressing his view, or only the transmittal of a communication from you to Col. Thompson.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, but let it appear that no cypher cable could be sent by anybody in Russia through the American Embassy that was counter to any definite policy of the embassy. [Reading:]

No other party will refrain from accepting German peace or so deeply stir internal forces opposed to German Government. Questions put to Trotzky by Kuhlman after his statement indicate Germany's disinclination to continue military operations if satisfactory trade relations can be reestablished.

For instance, Senator, the social revolutionists of the Left killed Mirbach. Did the Germans march into Moscow? They did not. Why? Because they had found that dead Russians and burned grain in the Ukraine were of little value to the central powers; and I preferred by their methods to beat them to it, and it seemed possible in the situation. That may have been a misjudgment or not. [Reading:]

Reestablishment of such relations vastly more valuable to central Empires than conquest of disorganized revolutionary Russian territory. Soviet organizations throughout all Russia representing entire laboring and peasant class will not readily submit to domination of German troops.

As was proved then and has been proved constantly ever since. [Reading:]

This class may in time change leadership and policies but will not relinquish power without a struggle and certainly not to an invading imperialistic force. Germany therefore cannot control extensive resources by conquest. Any effort to force her terms of peace by hostilities will be an attack on Russian revolution and will be met vigorously. Greatest danger to Allied cause is reestablishment of German commercial relations which may result if Germany abandons hostilities and Russia can not obtain American supplies and assistance. Revolutionary Russia having broken with German Imperialism and regarding other Allied governments as imperialistic will naturally turn to United States for commodities and supplies of non-military character for which she is willing to exchange surplus metals, oil and other raw material vitally necessary to Germany's continued prosecution of the war. Conferences now being held with Bolshevik authorities who have expressed willingness to deal on this basis with United States and desire American assistance and cooperation in railway reorganization. Commercial attache at Embassy is conducting negotiations and Ambassador will strongly urge vigorous action by government.

Would the ambassador have sent that if it had not been in agreement with what he thought was the situation?

Senator OVERMAN. The point was made, is that an official telegram from the ambassador?

Mr. ROBINS. Not at all. It is not that. [Continuing reading:]

Danger of some American supplies ultimately reaching Germany unworthy of consideration because supplies Russia needs from America less valuable to Germany than supplies America will receive from Russia which otherwise would go to Germany. By generous assistance and technical advice in reorganizing commerce and industry American may entirely exclude German commerce during balance of war. Commercial attaché should immediately be authorized and ample funds placed at his disposal to enter into contracts which will assure control of Russia's surplus products most needed by Germany. This should be followed by prompt action along lines of our eight and nine.

Senator NELSON. What is the date of that?

Mr. ROBINS. February 15, a day or two after the ratification of the Brest peace. Not the ratification, either; a day or two after the signing of the Brest peace.

Senator NELSON. The Brest treaty was not ratified until in March.

Mr. ROBINS. But it was signed.

Senator NELSON. This was before it was signed?

Mr. ROBINS. You are quite right. I have made a misstatement. It was sent just after the failure of the Brest negotiations, but before the signing of peace.

Senator NELSON. The first one. There was a preliminary negotiation. At first the war went on and they got within 50 miles of Petrograd before the final treaty was made. Those are the facts.

Mr. ROBINS. That is the fact.

Senator NELSON. And that was ratified by this soviet you have described in Moscow in the manner you have indicated. Now, in that connection you have described how Trotsky stayed away. Do you not think that he was posing in that case? One of the two leaders was for the treaty and the other stood back. Was not that for a purpose, to have an anchor to windward?

Mr. ROBINS. It may have been, Senator. But I think the actual facts of the situation do not yield to that view of it. That might be a matter of opinion.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think, between the two, Lenine is the most conscientious——

Mr. ROBINS. Decidedly so.

Senator NELSON. Revolutionist, more so than Trotzky?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes. I would say that, because of fundamental differences in character. Lenine is a patient, steady person. Trotzky is a great orator, a prima donna.

Senator NELSON. Lenine is a real Slav?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And the other is a Hebrew?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. One question I want to ask Col. Robins is this: I understood you to say that after the Brest Litovsk treaty it was apparent that Count Mirbach's economic mission would fail, and I do not understand how it could. It would seem to me that that would give Count Mirbach's mission or any German economic activities a free field.

Mr. ROBINS. Let us consider that. Throughout the entire Soviet Russia it was stated that this was a robber peace forced upon revolutionary Russia at the point of the bayonet; that they were trying to steal their land and their resources. They had gone down to fight in the Ukraine; they were fighting the Germans up in Finland, and the whole authority of the Brest-Litovsk situation was an authority against soviet Russia.

Senator STERLING. Yet Lenine favored it?

Mr. ROBINS. Quite so, sir.

Senator STERLING. And it was on his advice that it was ratified?

Mr. ROBINS. Precisely, for the reasons indicated. But I do not think that is a point, for the mass life in Russia was bitter in its resentment against German aggression and the terms of the Brest-Litovsk treaty which was forced upon Russia.

Senator NELSON. I want to call your attention to one fact that you omitted in your story of the Brest-Litovsk treaty, and that is that they had organized a Ukrainian republic or government of some kind.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And they had their representatives there?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. When the final treaty was made and the question was raised whether they should be allowed to sign the treaty separately for their own republic in connection with the representatives of Russia, and either Lenine or Trotsky got up in the meeting and said it was either one or the other, and they would find out before the day was over—one said it was all right to have the Ukrainians sign the treaty on behalf of the Ukraine—in that they recognized by their action that government as an independent government, distinct from Russia.

Mr. ROBINS. Trotsky was the person.

Senator NELSON. Trotsky was the man who was present and got up in the meeting and said it was quite satisfactory—I am not quoting his words—satisfactory that they sign as representatives of the Ukrainian Republic.

Mr. ROBINS. Moving on to the question of possible economic co-operation, I wish to speak about the modifications in the enforcement of certain decrees that followed the Brest-Litovsk ratification. The fourth all-Russian Soviet indicated the possibility of cooperation with the soviet government on a purely economic and nonrecognition basis.

And may I say to the committee, Senator, that the soviet was never anxious for formal recognition, and all I have to do is state the facts of their position to give you the reason why. They were leading an international socialist revolutionary movement, a definite class war, a definite economic materialistic, class revolutionary force movement. They had to appeal to their comrades, as they called them, in all other lands. The moment they made a treaty with any capitalistic country, so-called, whether it was with Germany or the allies, they in a sense injured their position and weakened the appeal of their socialistic revolutionary purpose and program. They could have been said to have done what Kerensky had done but they had denounced him for doing, making common cause with unpatriotic capitalist governments. Trotsky's position was a sort of forlorn-hope position, or hopeful, if you will, Horatio on the bridge, holding out against the world. "Here we are, the leaders of the great proletarian revolution, and we will have nothing to do with the imperialist allies, nothing to do with the Germany militarist autocracy. We are leading a great revolutionary movement." That was the front held forth, but the actual necessities of their economic life made them willing to make real concessions to America to get what was necessary in a sense for their economic existence, and you will find that conflict between front, as it were, and facts, at many points in the situation.

Now, I want to bring out one or two other things. The decree of repudiation was not passed until 45 days, or something like that, after the decree had been introduced in the soviet. It first came up for passage three weeks after the decrees passed on the 7th day of November. I regarded the passage of the decree of repudiation as so complicating the situation, so violating the necessary good faith between nations, that it was of great moment not to pass that decree. I went out to see Trotsky and urged on him that the decree should not be passed. He used his influence in the all-Russian soviet executive committee to prevent the decree from being passed. He then went to Brest. It came up for consideration again while he was there. It is one of the well-known tenets of the Marxian school—the repudiation of debts. It came up and was about to be passed. I saw Lenine, and it did not pass right away, but some days afterwards I saw him and he said, "The decree of repudiation is going to be passed."

Senator STERLING. Now, Mr. Robins, just to make it plain to my mind, that was a decree of repudiation in regard to what?

Mr. ROBINS. The national debt. He said, "Col. Robins, you say that the allied governments will help the soviet government against the central powers at all points?" I said, "Yes, that has always been my statement." He said, "What you say to me indicates that I have five cards in my hands, when, in fact, I only have one. Four of the cards are blank. Those blank cards represent cooperation of the allies with soviet Russia. All I have is the one card, which is the unity of the revolutionary workers and peasants of Russia. They believe in this formula as one of the things that every revolutionary government ought to do." He said, "We are going to pass it." I urged on him what it meant against economic help from America, and was most insistent. He finally turned to me and said, "We are perfectly willing to take care of the American debt and the English debt, but we will not take care of the French debt." "Why; just because it is bigger?" He replied, "That is not the only reason. That debt comes out of the loan of the French bourgeois bankers to the autocracy, which has kept that autocracy alive 30 years longer than it would have lived without financial support from France. What you are really asking me to do is to pay back the money loaned by the French bourgeois to keep the cossack whip and sword over our people for 30 years, and the workmen and peasants are not willing."

Senator NELSON. Did you not know that he was lying then—was misstating the facts?

Mr. ROBINS. I did. He was overstating.

Senator NELSON. Most of the money that went into that loan was money of the French peasants, and not of the bankers and higher classes.

Mr. ROBINS. I rather think, sir, that a large proportion of that had been loaned by the bankers, in the first instance, and placed with the peasants afterwards, and it had become a sort of savings of the people. But his argument was an argument that ran in Russia.

Now, when that decree was passed it was passed under the circumstances indicated, and I felt that we could always get around that decree; that is, while they might not formally repeal it, they would allow America to really pay the French debt from the great resources that were in Russia; and talking with some of the members of the soviet, we led up to that, and they said that they felt that would be possible, if there was economic cooperation, later on.

One day, about the 20th of March I think it was, a Mr. McAllister, of the International Harvester Co., the head of their enterprise in Russia, came into my office in Moscow where I was then working with the Red Cross and conducting my task there and serving the country, making daily communications to the ambassador. He said, "We are having trouble at our factory at Lubertzsky." I said, "Have you a factory at Lubertzsky?" He said, "Of course we have." I said, "Are you making anything up there?" He said, "We are making agricultural machinery. We have 5,000 or 6,000 harvesting machines on hand. We have 3,000 more ready to be assembled and we will have a thousand more by the time the crop is ready." "Have you been carrying on business since the Bolshevik revolution?" He said, "Yes; and our men in the factory have done better than they did under Kerensky." I said, "Why are you not happy, then?" He said, "They are extending that rule to the office, and to the assembling of raw materials and to distribution, and there is no value in the workmen's control of those things." I think that is true. I think that is what has happened where the decree has been carried to the full length.

SENATOR STERLING. Did he in that connection speak of the loyalty of the workmen and the good treatment they had been accorded, and that that was one reason why the factory was still doing business?

MR. ROBINS. Yes; and I said, "Now, what you want is to have the enforcement of this decree stopped? That is what you want? You want to be given a reprieve for the moment? You want to have that ultimatum raised or the time extended?" He said, "Yes." I went to Lenine and I said, "Now, there is a capitalistic enterprise, an American capitalistic enterprise, doing business in Russia for the purpose of making money, but in your formula, for the purpose of exploiting Russia. But it happens, commissioner, to be delivering the goods, to be manufacturing a product of prime economic necessity for an agrarian people—that is, agricultural machinery. Your decree, if it is enforced at this time, will wipe out that organization. So far as I am advised, the International Harvester Co. is the best producing organization for agricultural machinery in the world. They have the best brains not only for producing but also for marketing, I hear. I am not going to argue the case with you. You have got to have cooperation from America. You can not get a ton of space in any vessel in an American port and you can not get a dollar of interim credit between the time of shipment and until the raw material to pay for it comes back. You can not get a ton of space in any American ship for manufactured material if it can be successfully maintained in America that a going concern making a primary product for the economic life of Russia 18 versts from Moscow can not continue to produce because of your socialistic decrees. I am not going to argue. I will simply leave it to your own judgment." The fact was, a representative from the soviet council went down there and conferred with the representatives of the harvester company, and Mr. McAllister came back to my office and said he had a perfectly satisfactory arrangement with them in relation to the enforcement of the workmen's decree, and that everything was going on satisfactorily. When I left Russia that was the statement of those gentlemen to me, and I brought in information for the International Harvester Co. and turned it over to Mr. Edgar Bancroft, who met me at the train at Chicago on my way to Washington, urging cooperation and extension of credit and the possibility of doing business under the Bolshevik Russian government six months after that government had been in operation.

I wish to state further that in the day's work there were constant modifications of these decrees that showed the possibility of doing work with the soviet government, in my judgment. One was in relation to the nationalization of banks, and affected the National City branch banks in Russia. In each one of these instances I talked with the responsible managers of business enterprises and in most instances they said they could continue to do business. I said to McAllister, "McAllister, working out the future of manufacturing in Russia is possibly the biggest job left on the map, is it not, for a manufacturer?" He said it was. I said, "I will agree with you that trying to run a factory in Bolshevik Russia is a hell of a job, if you will excuse the profanity, but is it not the job that we have to engage in. McAllister, suppose you left Russia; in six weeks who would be running your factory?" He said that some German would; and I said, "Certainly, because he is the only one that has got the mind and that it would mean serving the German economic control if he left. I said, "I am going to stay on and meet what comes. Won't you?" I said exactly the same thing to Mr. Stevens, and both of those men were of that mind before I said anything about it. They agreed that there was this possible relationship of service that we ought to carry out in the Russian situation.

I now move to another question.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Robins, may I interrupt you a moment? What do you know as to the development at the plant of the International Harvester Co. subsequent to this conversation that you refer to with McAllister?

Mr. ROBINS. Subsequent to the conversation? If you mean immediately after it would be two months—I remained in Russia for some time, and subsequent to my leaving Russia I do not know what transpired. I left Russia in May and Vladivostok the 1st of June, and at that time they were in agreement with the general position I have stated.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know anything about the contributions that have been assessed or the taxes that have been assessed against that plant since that time?

Mr. ROBINS. Not since that time.

Mr. HUMES. You are not familiar with that?

Mr. ROBINS. No.

Senator NELSON. Would you mind giving us information about the various decrees that this government of Lenine and Trotzky announced? I would like information about their program and form of government.

Mr. ROBINS. I shall be very glad to go into that later, if I may. Why were the formulas, the hard, stark Marxian socialist formulas, powerful in Russia? Were they powerful? I make the statement that they were. I make the statement that I found more men, workmen and peasants, who said over those formulas, in proportion to those active in general affairs, than I ever found of one culture anywhere else, and I have been fairly vigorous and out in the open all of my life, and know this particular labor and economic struggle reasonably well. It was, I think, for this reason. For 60 years prior to the revolution of March 17 the structure of the Russian Government had remained practically in statu quo at a time when the structure of all the other governments, even of China, was being modified into more liberal and tolerable machinery of government. The Cossack whip and the Cossack sword, the power of the autocracy, held it absolutely static. Little efforts of educational enterprises, like that of Tolstoy on his estate, for peasants, when extended in any important direction were denounced as revolutionary and the leaders were imprisoned or killed. Little economic organizations among the workers in the Donetz coal basin, endeavoring to help the coal miners and their families, were denounced as revolutionary and their leaders were imprisoned or killed. Free speech, free press, right of petition, and the discussion of government were denounced as revolutionary and the leaders were imprisoned or killed. All those normal streams of progressive life and thought that would have moved out and fertilized the Russian social system were dammed up and forced back into a turgid current, into subterranean and dangerous channels, and men said over and over in garrets and cellars, in forests, and in Siberian prisons, "When we get power, we will pass this decree and it will settle that; when we get power, we will pass that decree and it will settle that; when we get power, we will pass this decree and it will settle the other thing," and the hard, metallic formula was said over and over again until men could say it backwards without missing a word. Never having had a chance to try this indoor formula against the outdoor facts, they could not know any difficulties in its application to life. Practical men all know that there never was an indoor formula devised that fits outdoors, that will not break up and require modification when applied to reality; but the Russian peasants and workingmen did not know, never had had a chance to try out anything in practice. Therefore they believed in their dogmas. There was faith in the whole revolutionary culture. Why was it socialist? It was socialist because that appealed to the collectivist Slavic mind. I do not want to pretend to have wisdom that I do not possess. I am not wise in these things, but I do know certain human reactions to a degree. The Russian peasant moves and thinks collectively; they act as a village; they move and think in groups; they act collectively; cooperative associations run with wonderful ease in the Russian life. They are not individualists; they have not the sense of personal responsibility and initiative that has been given to the Anglo-Saxon genius. Their natural collectivism made the socialist formulas and methods popular. The materialist antichurch side of it was also popular, and popular not because the Russian is not a religious-minded person, because he is. I have high regard for religion; I believe that the personal, social, individual control and social sanction that lies in a genuine religious life is of first consequence to civilization, and I believe that no democratic institution can survive without it. I went to Russia and during the Kerensky régime I tried to find some center of moral power, some center of religious restraint and enthusiasm, that would hold this wild life, with the bit in its teeth, in the religious institutions of the land. I went to the great sybor or conference of the Greek Church at Moscow, and I met the procurator of the Holy Synod and other leaders, metropolitans, and bishops, and I avow this testimony, and the Senators can find it if they wish, that I have worked steadily with the religious forces in this country, have done such work as John R. Mott said had not otherwise been done in the universities of this country, for a distinct religious sanction, and I bear this testimony with regard to my Russian experience, that I never found anybody there who thought that the church in Russia could exercise moral restraint and social power, either inside or outside of the church. It had lost its credit absolutely. It had become associated in the revolutionary movement, in the minds of peasants and workingmen, as a class institution. For instance, here is a peasant walking under the most holy gate into the Kremlin with me. He takes off his hat. Another crosses himself and kisses an ikon. I say to them, "You are religious?" "Yes." "You believe in God and in Jesus Christ?" "Yes." "You believe in the church?" "No!" The church has been the spy system of autocracy for 200 years. It was that resentment against the organized church that made them accept, as it were, the materialistic philosophy. Why did this philosophy have power in the villages? Nine per cent of the Russian people are city proletariat, and are educated in the formulas of revolutionary socialism. They are in the cities. Forty per cent of that 9 per cent goes back twice a year to the villages, at planting time and harvest time. They are the persons who have been away, who have had experience. They go back to the village and the village people gather around them and they hear their talk, and their talk is of the revolution, of the good time that is coming. Their talk is in the terms of the formula of social revolution. For that reason there was this widespread agreement in the formulas running through Russian life. These revolutionary formulas had a real power and a tremendous significance at this hour of Russian upheaval. These formulas had been talked and cultivated and quoted in Russia by people of the better classes, even by many who in the hour of their realization repudiated them. Madame Breshkovskaya, great old spirit that she was, for 40 years in the villages and the cities said to the peasants, "The land is yours; you should not pay rent to the landlords and barons"; said to the workingmen, "The factories are yours; your labor produces all. You should control the mills and mines." She had distributed thousands of copies of the communist manifesto and Karl Marx's Das Kapital, and when the hour came and the masses demanded the fulfillment of her promises, she, trying to exercise restraint, bravely and heroically spent her entire leadership and capital in trying to restrain the realization of the very things that she had led the peasants to demand. And that explains why this social revolutionary group and Kerensky were absolutely bereft of power and leadership. This old woman was the greatest figure in Russia, and she could have commanded more soldiers when I went there than any other one person, and she lost her influence because she constantly refused to recognize the demands that she had taught the peasants and workers to make.

The same thing was manifest among certain representatives of the American Government in Russia. For years I have been in the open fighting socialist doctrines, and certain men said that I did not have intelligence enough to be a socialist, which may be true, but I had heard one of these men to whom I refer down in Washington Square, in Greenwich Village, in New York, sitting with other high brows and uplifters, telling the wonderful gospel of Karl Marx; the class struggle, that that is the real principle of the whole social process; the economic interpretation of history, the iron law of wages, the law of diminishing returns; that that is the whole thing in social progress. He said that in comfort and in ease in Washington Square; but when responsibly engaged by the American Government in trying to protect American interests, national interests, if you will, allied interests, if you will, when these formulas came down the Nevski in the form of bearded, red-blooded peasants and workingmen with bayoneted guns and said, "This thing that you taught we are going to do, and we will push out of the way your Kerensky government and all the others," then these gentlemen threw up their hands and said, "Oh, my God; that is not socialism; that is German agents, thieves, and murderers!" It was nothing in the world but the realization in the time of strain, in the only way they will ever be realized, of those formulas they had taught in the ease and comfort of the parlor in Washington Square. And the movement from class struggle to class terror is perfectly understandable and foreseeable. If I believe that only one class has any right, if I believe it has produced everything and that the other class is nothing but a bunch of parasites, if that class gets in the way in time of strain, I will stick a bayonet into it.

Senator STERLING. Is it simply because that is the doctrine of the Bolsheviks that she objected to it?

Mr. ROBINS. The only point is that she cultivated it for 40 years.

Senator STERLING. And she never believed that it would come with the excesses and the atrocities that characterized it when it did come?

Mr. ROBINS. In other words, she did not believe that a revolution would be a revolution. She believed that it would be a perfectly nice, orderly thing, that would leave us in the leadership, we nice people; but revolutions come eating and drinking, and if you create a revolution, then, in the day of judgment, you ought not to be heard to whine about it. That, in my judgment, explains the sweep of the revolutionary formula in Russian life. And may I say this, even at the risk of being misunderstood: I have fought in the open all of my life. If I had lived under a state such as Lenine and Trotzky lived under, if I had lived under the Cossack whip and sword and had seen men and women by the thousand sent to Siberia without trial, if I had known the church as the church was known in Russia, as the spy system of autocracy among the poor, then I believe I should have been opposed to the state and the church. I thank God that I knew the state where my little county could meet in convention, in democratic fashion, and run the show, for I live in that part of the country where possibly are preserved in their purity more than anywhere else Anglo-Saxon institutions, south of Mason and Dixon's line. I remember the church as the little white church on the hill, where we went to hear the man speak that the people chose to have there, who taught us the old simple doctrines of Christianity, and I believe he was highly serviceable and not a betrayer of liberty and justice, but rather the friend of both. But I would like to have you really see the Russian situation and understand the lines of this movement, so that we can combat it effectively and not on false grounds.

Senator NELSON. I would appreciate your statement much better if you would outline to me a plan of government as outlined by their decrees. Then I would be very glad to hear your discussion of it, but you have not given us that yet. You have simply told us about the decree where they canceled all foreign debts—all indebtedness of the country. Now, if you will tell us the rest of the plan of government, we can better understand what you are proceeding to say. You have not done that yet.

Mr. ROBINS. Quite true. I rather assumed that the Senator knew those decrees; that there had been so much discussion about it, it was all in the mind of the Senator. I spoke of a decree of all lands to the peasants—distributing the land; the decree of all control of industry in the workingman; the formal decree of the control of the factories; the decree offering general democratic peace to the world; the decree that provided for the control of government to be in the soviet—of all power in the soviets. There were other decrees of similar character, but they are all accessible, and to go into a detailed statement about that would take so very much time that I thought that probably that had all been covered in previous discussions before this committee, but I will return to it again, if the Senator has any questions that he desires to ask.

May I suggest, Senator Overman, with a kindly, well-intentioned, generous government, like our Government, wanting really to serve Russia, seeking really to have her better her condition and free all of the people everywhere, why it is that we failed to connect in that Russia story? And may I suggest to the committee that you will find several lines of intelligence that will give you leading in the matters I will now discuss? One of them is the mission sent to Russia with the Hon. Elihu Root at its head. I regard Mr. Root as the ablest man on international questions in America. I do not believe that we could have chosen a man who by intent and past experience and integrity of character was more calculated to serve wisely America in that situation; but I relate simply the fact of the reaction to his appointment as I found it there. You may know that he had attacked at one time in this country a very important public person, and you may know that as a result of that attack editorials, the most brilliant possible of their kind, had been published for successive weeks, accompanied by cartoons, speaking of Mr. Root as the jackal of privilege, as the watchdog of Wall Street, and all that sort of thing. They had been run in the public press. Probably the German agents in America, immediately upon his appointment, gathered these up and sent them over, and they appeared in pamphlets in Russia, translated into Russian, with the cartoons and the words changed to Russian synonyms, so that even friendly papers said, "How is it possible that the great democratic President should send over to Russia to help make the world safe for democracy—to revolutionary Russia—the man who has spent most of his time, according to what we hear, in trying to make America safe for plutocracy?" I think it was thoroughly unjust and unfair, but none the less it was a real situation, and it was charged on the basis of that propaganda that Mr. Root was there for the purpose of getting Russia for Wall Street, for this, that, and the other special capitalist interest, just as it was charged against me, and with just as little truth.

Then there was another fact of importance. There returned to Russia immediately at the beginning of the revolution great numbers of Russians from America, immigrants, both Gentile and Jew, and they represented two classes. They represented genuine, honest men, who had met America at America's worst—and America's worst, when we are honest and frank with ourselves, is evil. I know and you know that. I have spent some of my time trying to help iron these evils out. I know that 97 per cent, or at least 90 per cent, of America is sound and true and competent and will ultimately take care of all bad spots, but there were and are bad spots. Men came back to Russia and spoke of the steel mills of Pennsylvania, spoke of the 12-hour day, spoke of the 24-hour shifts every two weeks, spoke of the seven-day week, spoke of those things of the nonunion coal mines of West Virginia, of the tenement sweatshops, of the political system of our great cities, and the political police court with its corruption; interpreted America as being a capitalist's heaven and the workman's hell. That was perfectly false, but it carried influence, because those men spoke the language, and they came back with that interpretation; and man after man, when I was fighting against the rise of Bolshevism, said, "We do not care for your democracy; we do not want political democracy; we are going to have a real economic revolution; we did not depose our Czar to get 20 czars; we are not going to have a czar of oil, a czar of coal, a czar of the railroads." You know the stuff; we are familiar with it. It was that playing upon the situation that made the Russian revolutionary movement go from a democratic enterprise onto a fundamental economic socialist revolutionary plane, if I know anything about it. To this group were added the agitators who were the paid agents of Germany or the doctrinaire socialists of the destructive groups, such as the I. W. W.

There are two or three other influences that ought to be in our minds if we are to know and understand the play in Russia. I have spoken of the 7 per cent, sincere, honest, and interested—selfishly in some instances. But that 7 per cent had all the contact in the foreign capitals, all the contact with the normal lines of ambassadorial and mission life, for they were the only people you needed to know in the old régime. They had the language and the contact, they were the people that furnished us with ideas; and then, second, after the decree of repudiation, there was the perfectly understandable position of France in Russia. It was summed up at one time by a representative of France there in a discussion with me, when the question of intervention was in point. I said to myself: "It seems to me that intervention is a mistake and will ruin our interests here, and it will turn European Russian people and resources over to Germany and make European Russia a German province, and I am against it for the time being. But, I said to myself, "Suppose I am wrong." I sought a conference with this French representative to whom I referred, and he said this to me when we put the map on the table and discussed intervention. Have you done that? It is 800 miles across Manchuria until you get to Siberia. There are the Chinese Eastern Railroad, the Upper Amur Railroad, and the Amur River, three lines of communication to control, 650 miles to Lake Baikal, with the road around precipitous mountain cliffs on either side, with 32 tunnels already mined; then 4,000 miles across Siberia with one line of railroad open on both flanks, and 800 miles across the Urals to the European Russian front, before you will divert a single German from the western front. This French representative said to me, "I know it is not practical, but it must be attempted." Then I said, "Why not get Russia's raw material and handle this economic situation here and win the war on the western front?" Then this gentleman said, "What is it to us if the allies win the war, and France loses the savings of a hundred years?" That was the heart of the French position in the Russian situation. There was the third line of influence. It was this. There came a time when the Bolsheviki were organizing soviets in Turkestan and distributing documents carrying the general propositions of no annexations, no indemnities, and self-determination of nationalities. Mr. Lockhart came to me one day with a cablegram from the British foreign office and said, "Here is more trouble," and the cablegram was to this effect, "We are advised of the organization of soviets in Turkestan. It is only a short distance across Afghanistan to India, and if the Mahometans in Turkestan begin to discuss self-determination it will be only a short time until the Mahometans in India will begin to discuss self-determination, and it may greatly complicate the situation for the British Empire." There were genuine complications of this character, movements for certain purposes in certain positions at certain points in the play. We have now in front of us the general situation.

May I now speak of the reason why I hold the judgment, as I do hold it unhesitatingly, that Lenine and Trotzky were not conscious German agents? I started to work with them and dealt at all points on the basis of uncertainty, question, suspicion, but delivery of each specific situation and task. One of the persons whom I came in contact with first was Zalkind, assistant commissioner of foreign affairs in the soviet government. When Trotzky went to Brest-Litovsk, all of the affairs that I had to deal with the soviet government about had to pass through Zalkind. I early became convinced that he was either a German agent or certainly a vigorous enemy of the allied cause. I waited for some real situation. I did not know whether he suited Lenine or not. If I had found he had suited him I would have simply gone on with that much more of the facts in front of me, but I wanted to know. I did not go to Lenine and say, "I am suspicious of your assistant commissioner of foreign affairs. I think he is a bad fellow. I think he is a German agent." I waited for a situation of definite fact. The situation came. I was called to the American Embassy one day and shown a letter transmitted by Zalkind in the absence of Trotsky, as acting commissioner of foreign affairs, in the briefest form transmitting a bitter, virulent resolution of an anarchist group, denouncing the American ambassador and the American Government—a clearly unfriendly act. I asked the ambassador to let me have that material. It was taken and laid on Lenine's desk. Trotsky was away. He was asked, "Commissioner, is that what you want? Does that meet with your approval? Here is an open, definite, direct insult to the American ambassador and the American Government by the responsible minister of your foreign office." He looked it over and said, "That must be a provocative"; in other words, an effort to provoke trouble by false statements and acts, that was always present in the Russian situation—provocation of one thing and another. You hear it constantly and see it again and again. He was answered, "I do not think so. I know Zalkind's signature. I think it is genuine, Commissioner. Would you mind calling him up on the telephone?" He called him up on the telephone and Zalkind admitted the transaction, and the commissioner then and there told Zalkind to make a formal apology to the American ambassador.

I was pleased. Two hours afterwards I called up the American Embassy to find out whether the apology had come over there, and the ambassador said, "No; there was not any apology. On the contrary, a representative came here from the foreign office of the soviet government and said that there was to be a demonstration of anarchists in front of the embassy to-night, and that the government was going to protect us; had ample power to protect us; was going to send down a special machine-gun corps, or something of that sort, to protect us."

Here was a lying camouflage of special protection, based upon an unfriendly act. I went out to the embassy, supposing that this man had talked to the ambassador. He had not. The ambassador thought he had talked with his private secretary, Mr. Johnston. Mr. Johnston was out. We waited until Mr. Johnston came back and found he had not talked to him but had talked to Mr. Bailey, the first secretary of the embassy. When Mr. Bailey came in quite a good deal of time had then elapsed, and we got a statement made by Mr. Bailey, dictated and written on the stationery of the embassy, to me, without mentioning anybody else, of the facts that had occurred. That was taken out and laid in front of Lenine after midnight that night, and we said, "This is the way your foreign office has followed your instructions for apology." The next morning the Izvestija carried the line that Zalkind had been removed as assistant commissioner of foreign affairs. I saw Lenine, and he said, "This man has some relations with our people of influence. If he is out of Russia, are you satisfied?" I said, "Entirely so." He said, "We are going to send him to Switzerland." I said, "Good! You can not send him too far for me." He was removed. In my judgment, he was not removed for the German interest, and it seemed to me another indication of the facts of the situation.

We went on then. I have spoken to you about the anarchist situation in Petrograd. Now let me speak of the anarchist situation in Moscow.

It is now after the ratification of the Brest-Litovsk peace. It is along in April. Anarchist organizations, financed, in my judgment, by German agents, are developing more and more, until important allied officers tell me that the anarchists are running Moscow. I say, "No; I do not think so. I think the Kremlin, where Lenine is, is running Moscow." Finally I, who had worked so steadily in the situation, began to be, I suppose, definitely objectionable. I had recovered certain property in certain quarters, taken by the anarchist clubs which were masquerading as anarchists when they were really thieves and robbers, in some instances at least.

Senator STERLING. Colonel, may I ask whether the Bolshevik government was doing anything at that time to repress the anarchist movement?

Mr. ROBINS. Nothing particularly serious, I guess.

On a certain day I am in the headquarters telegraph office at Moscow, sending my daily communication to the American ambassador over the direct wire. A furore starts and people run up the stairs. I go down the stairs and find a group of 10 or 12 anarchists with bayoneted guns surrounding my automobile and the guns pointed at my chauffeur, telling him to move on. I open the door of the automobile and get in and sit in with the others—there are a number of anarchists in there—and through my interpreter begin debating the matter with them—arguing the matter with them. They say that they have a requisition to take my automobile. Well, as there were a good many Government requisitions I did not know but that it was possible that the requisition was on the square. I ask to see the requisition, and they refuse to show it to me. I ask them then to take the automobile to the headquarters of the Petrograd soviet and there get a test of the matter.

We started, but when my chauffeur started to drive down a certain direction toward the soviet office they pushed a couple of guns against him and started him the other way. I then said, "Well, we will leave this situation and make another move at it." I did not want to go to the anarchist headquarters in the automobile, even if the automobile went, and they said I could not get out of the car; but we opened the door, my chauffeur stopped the car, and I stepped off the car, and they did not shoot us, but the man who was on the running board turned to me and said, "Sprechen sie Deutsch?" I said, "No; I speak English."

The car was taken to the headquarters of the anarchists. I went that afternoon to the foreign minister, Tchitcherin, and made a simple statement of the facts. I said, "I know this is a rough game, and this is probably just done for my comfort to make me quit the play, but I want that automobile, and I want a show of definite power in the situation. There are those who say that the power is over there at 9 Duvorskaya and those who say that the power is in the Kremlin. I have been saying it is in the Kremlin, and I want to know where the power is."

I was promised my automobile that afternoon. The afternoon came, but not the automobile. I went to see Derjinski, of the committee on counter revolution and sabotage. He said, "I will get your automobile." Later on he called up and said that he could not get it until the next day. There seemed to be backing and filling. I went to see Trotsky and talked with Trotsky about it. I went to see Lenine and talked to Lenine about it. I said, "Now, I do not give two raps about the automobile, but I want to know where the power is in Moscow. I have said it was in your hands. If it is over here with the anarchists, I know where that leads back to. It leads back to German control, and I am going to know."

Finally Trotsky asked me to come down to his headquarters, and I went down, and he said, "The real situation about this anarchist business is as follows: The Central Anarchist Club was organized in March, 1917, under Kerensky's government. Kerensky and the old Duma never dared to attack them, because they participated in taking over the power from the Czar. They have grown stronger. They helped us—the Bolsheviks—in our hour of revolution, and there are members of the Petrograd soviet who are tender on this anarchist situation; I agree with you that they are a menace; I agree with you that they are thieves and robbers; I agree with you that they have got German money; but we are holding elections this week out in the various factories, and the mensheviks and others have charged us with being brutal and with ruling with the bayonet all the time, and we do not want to meet this situation with force until after the elections."

Well, quite frankly, I understood that argument. It was very normal to me. I have seen other things set aside until elections are over. [Laughter.]

Senator NELSON. You have seen that in this country, have you not?

Mr. ROBINS. Even in this country, Senator; and I said to him, "Well, I do not care about a few days, but I want a definite expression of power in this situation, so we can know where we are, or I am going to cable my Government that there is a real question as to who is running this show." Three days afterwards, the last election having taken place, I was called up on the telephone, and he said: "At 2 o'clock to-morrow morning," which would have been a certain Friday, "we are going to move against the anarchist centers. There are not only the 13 centers that you reported on, but there are 26 centers, and they have a sort of organization, and we are confident now of what they mean, and we are going after them." That morning at 2 o'clock cavalry, 4-inch cannon, and infantry surrounded 26 centers in Moscow and its environs, palaces that had been fortified with machine guns, etc., and gave them five minutes to surrender. In some instances they surrendered. In some they began shooting at once, and when they did the soviet forces answered with machine gun and cannon. Every center was taken by about 6.30 in the morning. In some instances they threw smoke bombs down into the cellars to smoke them out. Some 14 persons were killed, some 40 persons were wounded, some 600 prisoners were taken captive, and a large amount of goods—jewelry, rubles, stuff of one sort and another—was found in these centers and confiscated, and certain machine guns, new, of a new pattern, not found elsewhere in Russia, of German make, were found in those palaces.

Now, this was another demonstration of power against what I thought was a definite German interest and what I now believe to have been a definite German interest.

The time came when I was instructed to leave Russia to report to the Government of the United States.

Senator STERLING. Colonel, there is one interesting thing we would like to know. Did you get your automobile? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINS. I got my automobile, unscratched, sir.

I wanted the Government to act; either organized cooperation or organized opposition. Drifting was ruinous to all interests, of America, Russia, and the allies. My later cables will show that I kept urging on the Government either organized cooperation or organized opposition, so that we could know where we were in the situation. I believed that the best plan was organized cooperation, for reasons that are now pretty well known to the world. I did not share the view that there was a vast mass of noble people lying outdoors, peasants who wanted the barons to come back, workingmen who wanted feudal masters to come back to the factories, and other people who wanted the grand dukes to come back. They were not there, if I knew anything about Russia. And then this idea that if you sent in one division, then the great Russian mass would rise up and would begin to roll like a snowball, and everything would be happy, never for a moment lived in my mind.

When I got ready to come out representatives of the allies in Russia said, "How are you going; by Murmansk?" I said, "No; I am not going by Murmansk. That road is built over the icebog. It is beginning to get warm. It may thaw, and I may be marooned 300 versts from the port." "Oh, you are going out by Archangel?" "No; I am not going out by Archangel. It is three weeks before the ice is out in Archangel." "Well, you are not thinking of going by Siberia?" "I am going by Siberia." "Why, don't you know that the wild bands of marauders, demobilized soldiers with rifles, robbers, and thieves are running all up and down over Siberia, confiscating everything in sight?" "No," I said; "I not only do not know it, but I do not believe it." "Well," they said, "don't you know that the armed war prisoners are going to take control of the Siberian Railroad under the soviet?" I said: "On the contrary, the investigation made by Capt. Hicks, of the British mission, and Capt. Webster, of the American Red Cross, exposed that false statement thoroughly."

I have that report here. Let me advert to it a moment. Some weeks prior to this time there had been coming out constantly a general statement about armed war prisoners in Siberia planning to take the Trans-Siberian Railway and stores for the central powers. I did not believe it, gentlemen. I did not believe that any people who had recently won their own soil by giving their own blood for it were going to turn it over to some foreign force to take it away from them; but I said: "If it is so, it is so. What I believe is of no consequence"; and I called, of my mission, William B. Webster, and said to him, "You have never been in sympathy with the cooperation policy that I have been working with the soviet. You have the confidence of the American Embassy, through your splendid work in relief of war prisoners for a year prior to your coming into our service in Siberia. You know the Siberian game. I am giving you power and money and resources to send you to Siberia to investigate war prisoners. I want you to find the facts. If there are so many armed war prisoners, in numbers that are dangerous to the allied cause, you say so, and I will back you through the piece. Come back here with chat, come back here with mere talk, and make a report that does not rest on fact, and I will follow you to the end of the road in opposition. Now," I said, "go to it."

I went to Lockhart, and I said, "Lockhart, I had a talk with Trotsky this afternoon, and said to him that there was continual rumor about this armed war prisoner business in Siberia, and if it was a real thing I was going to know it; and he laughed and said, 'What do you want?' I said, 'I want to send men into Siberia, and I want you to give them the frank and power of the soviet and I want to investigate that situation.'" He gave a special train and gave full power to those men, Capts. Webster and Hicks. I said to Lockhart, "I want you to send Capt. Hicks, because Capt. Hicks is the ablest man on your staff, anti-Bolshevik, was wounded on the French front, and will probably find the facts. He is a trained military man," as Mr. Webster was not.

Those two men went. They spent six weeks from Ekaterinburg to Chita. They made their report. Their report is here. I file it with the committee. On that report I was satisfied of the actual conditions in Siberia. When I started out I said to Lenine, "Commissioner, I am going out by Siberia. There are a great many provincial soviets. I should like to have a letter from you, saying that I am to be given free passage and protection everywhere." He wrote that letter. I have it. I went 6,000 miles across Russia, the largest contiguous territory recognizing one authority in this world. We crossed 15 provincial soviet jurisdictions. At the first important town at every new jurisdiction the train was met by a platoon of soldiers and a commissar of the local or provincial soviet. They inspected the train; they confiscated what they said was contraband, and arrested what they said was counter-revolution.

I had this letter of Lenine, this autograph letter with the seal of the council of the people's commissars. In every instance I met this group of inspecting officers at the platform. I said: "Who is your commissar? Will you come in and sit with me a moment? Then, if you want to inspect this car, all right." I had seven persons on that car. I had more papers than had been brought out from Russia since the revolution up to that time. I had certain documents for the American Government under seal. I had certain documents for other governments under seal. I had five rifles and 150 rounds of ammunition, given to me, put in the car when I sent the car to Jassy, in Roumania, as I told you before luncheon, one of the 32 cars sent down there in the first instance, when things were very stormy. They were still with the car. They permitted me to violate the decree against carrying arms; they permitted me to move my car from one train to another; they permitted me to violate the decree about food; they permitted me to do the things necessary to get out in the speediest possible fashion. I crossed the 6,000 miles, and I was never inspected a single time. In every instance, when the commissar came to the train Lenine's letter was sufficient. Even at Khabarovsk, which is 4,500 miles away from the farthest range of the Red Guards from Moscow or Petrograd up to that time—when I got to Khabarovsk, which is away up on the upper Amur, as you will see when looking at it on the map—they read this letter and gave to me the right to inspect the fleet of the Bolshevik power on the Amur River and other particular courtesies, based simply on the letter of Nicolai Lenine. Not a shot was fired. I did not fire a shot nor hear one fired. I did not hear any question of the soviet power during the 6,000 miles, and I passed on that 6,000-mile journey in soviet Russia in only a few hours longer time than was necessary under the old régime.

Under those circumstances the unity and control of soviet Russia over Siberia as well as European Russia and central Russia at that time was definite. It was subsequent to that time, Senators, that the Czecho-Slovak movement began, when Siberia was taken finally from soviet control, or taken for the time being, at least, from soviet control.

Is there a menace in Russian Bolshevism? A fundamental menace, gentlemen, in my judgment; a menace so much more far-reaching, going so much deeper, than has sometimes been suggested by its bitterest opponents, that I think it well that we should take high ground and really know the thing we deal with. For the first time in the history of the human race there has been a definite economic revolution, an attempt to realize the stock formulas of Marx in a socialist, economic materialist, class control by force.

Senator OVERMAN. Right there, I should like to hear you express yourself as to what ground we should take if it is a menace to this country.

Mr. ROBINS. I will, sir.

I regard the soviet program as economically impossible and morally wrong. I regard it as carrying class, materialist, force formulas beyond the range of theory, to where those formulas produce class terror and economic ruin. I think we had in Russia the most extraordinary laboratory revelation, if it had been left to work itself out, of the failure and the wrong of the Marxian program, that was humanly possible.

Nicolai Lenine, sitting in the Kremlin, said to me, "The Russian revolution will probably fail. We have not developed far enough in the capitalist stage, we are too primitive, to realize the socialist state; but we will keep the flame of the revolution alive in Russia until it breaks in Europe. It will break first in Bulgaria, and the Bulgarians will cease fighting. It will break next in Austria, and the Austrians will cease fighting. When you hear that the workmen's, soldiers', and peasants' soviet is in command of Berlin, remember that the little man in the Kremlin told you that a proletarian world revolution was born."

He said that to me in April of 1918. He said to me, "We challenge the world." I said, "Yes?" He said, "Soviet Russia, and the control of the producers, challenges every social control of middle-class, bourgeois, political democracy as well as autocracy, and will bring them all into judgment." "Well," I said, "some contract!" He said, "You think that America is immune." I said, "Yes; I do." He said, "Your Government is entirely corrupt, Col. Robins." I said, "Commissioner, I am sorry, but you are mistaken. I know the corruptions in my country, but I also know district after district where the free citizens, after discussion, elect the men they choose to elect, and they are their honest representatives." "Oh," he said, "I do not mean grafting. You mistake me. I mean that your Government lacks integrity. Your political social control of politics lacks integrity." Now, if you get lost here, I am glad, because I got lost. I am not wise when they get into these realms. I want to get down to the ground again. I got out where I was beyond my depth, but I wanted to get before you what was in his mind. He said, "You are electing men to your Congress and your Senate in America now on large, expansive ideas of Democrat and Republican, but that is not what they are elected on. They are elected on hidden economic interests." I said, "That is not true." He said, "It is true."

Senator OVERMAN. Was that Trotzky talking now?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; this is Lenine. He said, "It is not genuine." He said, "If you were going to have the proper representation from Pennsylvania, you ought to have the producers' representation. Instead of having a lawyer who will really serve Mr. Gary or Mr. Schwab or some other interest, you ought to have Mr. Gary and Mr. Schwab in the Senate. They are the producers of steel. You ought to have the producers of transportation and the producers of coal representing you." He said, "That is what we are doing. They libel us by saying we are only putting workmen in the soviet." He said, "You know so and so," naming a certain engineer from the Donetz coal basin. "We are putting in the producers, but we are not putting in the parasites. We are not putting in anybody who simply owns stock, and simply has ownership. We are putting in the producers. We are going to challenge the world with a producers' republic. The Donetz coal basin will be represented by producers of coal; the railroad system of Russia will be represented by producers of transportation; the postal telegraph by producers of that communication, and so on through." He said, "We challenge every political society to-day in exactly the same way that the French revolution challenged every political society of its time. It was the bourgeois, capitalist, middle-class control against the old feudal system, which was moribund and worn out. The French Revolution was overwhelmed, but it destroyed every feudalism in Europe. We may be overwhelmed, but we will destroy every moribund political social control in the world."

Now, Senators, there is the genuine thing. If you get the menace of your Russian revolution on the basis of German agents, theft and murder, and all that sort of thing, you get a wholly unsound view of the actual scope and power and menace that there is in it. I believe that its decree of workmen's control will destroy production in Russia. I believe that its class theory makes in the end for the class terror and the destruction of life and people without regard to right. I believe that its materialist program challenges the Christian conscience of the world; and I believe that when we understand what it is, when we know the facts behind it, when we do not libel it nor slander it or do not lose our heads and become its advocates and defenders, and really know what the thing is, and then move forward to it, then we will serve our country and our time. I believe in political democracy. I believe in the Christian conscience. I believe they are challenged as they have not been challenged in the past periods of the world's history, and I believe that America alone can meet that challenge to the nations of the world. I believe it, sir, because class control and the betrayal of great sanctions by class domination has broken the credit of every other nation in the world.

The war is over and we can now speak some truth that we could not before have spoken. I have not spoken before on this situation. The power of the German militaristic autocracy is crushed. Until it was crushed it was the supreme duty of every man to do his part in the war, and no man could do or say aught to lessen the capacity of every free people in the world to win the war against the German power.

Over in England, the land of my fathers, I think there is the ablest European statesman of recent times, Lloyd-George; and yet the English Government was so uncertain of the power of the law that when Sir Edward Carson and the Ulsterites challenged the English Government, as they did challenge it when Lloyd-George was there, with a liberal majority behind him, they did not enforce the public law of England against it. The other day, with an overwhelming Tory majority behind Lloyd-George, they hesitated and neglected to enforce the law of the military and public statutes against Belfast soviets, against the strikers in Liverpool, and against mutinous soldiers at Dover. Why? Because there is an uncertainty of the faith and credit of the national power. Let us be honest with ourselves. The religious sanction of the Church of England has become a class sanction, so much so that large groups have chosen the economic socialist class, materialist control, and are following it to-day. The challenge of the Russian soviet by the English Government can not be met, in my judgment, successfully to-day.

We know France. Old heroic, splendid Clemenceau will survive that assassin's bullet. His fame is safe, but his cause is dead. Underneath the French social order to-day is that growing socialist class materialistic pressure, with the Christian sanction lost out of the common life at many points.

You know what Italy is. It is a powerful class group masquerading as a government over a volcano. America alone can meet this challenge. Behind the American democratic, political, social control there are enough men, women, and children who live a decent, contented, successful life to bind with power the institutions of our Government, so that whether it is a Wilson or a Taft or a Roosevelt that is President, there is a majority of such numbers and faith in support of our Government that there can not be any question of its genuine authority and sanction; the mass of the people will fight for it, suffer for it; if need be, die for it.

Behind the Christian sanction and conscience in America there is an uncorrupted faith that still continues with abiding power. We can meet that challenge. We can raise these forces into united action. You can be instrumental in rallying these forces against the real challenge of the Russian situation, understandable as it is in the light of Russian history, coming out of the Russian story, out of its terrible past. The evils here in our country most of us will acknowledge willingly, but we know there is energy enough in the institutions we have to meet them on the square. But, Senators, mere force is an old failure against ideas. I am one who would use the force of the public power to meet that man or that group of men who conspired by force and violence or sought by violence and force to overthrow our Government or to deprive others by these methods of legal rights or property. I would meet this challenge at all times and places with unhesitating and sufficient force to maintain the public law. But I would never expect to stamp out ideas with bayonets. I would never expect, sirs, to suppress the desire for a better human life for men, women, and children, no matter how ill founded in political fact and political experience, with force. The only answer for the desire for a better human life is a better human life. I believe that our institutions furnish that better human life for more men, women, and children than any other institutions in the world. I believe that whatever is wrong can be ironed out within the Constitution and the law. I believe that we have the means of meeting this Russian challenge when it is really understood and known.

Senator STERLING. Suppose, Colonel, that the manifestation of the idea is through force and through atrocities and through great excesses against society and law and order, would you meet it with force?

Mr. ROBINS. Absolutely.

Senator STERLING. Why, certainly.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; but there is a large expanse of ideas and purposes in the situation which can be met only by knowing what the thing is we are meeting, what its conditions are, what it came from, what in the nature of things we can expect from it in its development.

Senator NELSON. I gather from your statement that you are in the condition of this old lady that was mentioned—that is, you believe there is a good deal of virtue in the Bolshevik doctrine when it is called for, but you do not believe in its practical application?

Mr. ROBINS. On the contrary, I do not believe in the doctrine at all.

Senator NELSON. I rather got the impression that you did.

Mr. ROBINS. That is one of the difficulties that I have been in since I came back from Russia. If I told the truth, as I have tried to do in this presence under the pains and penalties of an oath, and did not lie and slander folks, and did not say that they are German agents and thieves and murderers, criminals utterly, then I am a Bolshevik. And I can not do that. I have got to try to tell the truth. There are people who believe that this is the great gospel. You have had several of them in here as witnesses. My idea is that their wheels are not running around accurately. It may be mine that are not running correctly; but a fellow has to use the brains he has got and do the best he can with them. [Laughter.] I refuse to libel either side of this situation and controversy. I think that the truth lies where I have been trying to open up the situation.

There is just one thing that pleased me thoroughly when I got back from Russia, and that was a cartoon in the New York Tribune, by Darling. It was a picture of a man being carried forcibly down the street. You could see that they were taking him right along. It was rough stuff. His eyes were blacked and his collar was unfastened, and the men that were carrying him showed some signs of punishment themselves. A bystander butts in and says, "What are you so brutal with that fellow for? What are you doing with him? where are you taking him?" They say, "You stay out of this thing. This fellow is incurably insane." "What is the matter with the poor fellow?" "He thinks he knows all about the Russian situation." Now, that is a perfect statement of the situation, in my judgment. When I have said this, you can see that I do not think that I know all about it. Then I say this, also, that if I do not know more about it than any other allied representative—even though that may seem arrogant—I wasted my time. I had the best window or outlook of any allied representative in Russia. I worked for three months, sincerely and honestly, constantly, with Kerensky, and I worked for six months with the revolutionary soviet government authorities, and I was trying to keep my feet on the ground all the time and to see facts, and not to be stampeded by rumor or the unfounded opinion of others, and I tried to serve the allied Governments and the Russian Government and people from day to day, and I am ready to meet the day of judgment on what I did. I doubtless made mistakes, as all people do. I doubtless made misjudgments. But on the whole, the history of the situation has vindicated my position.

As soon as I came out I put the facts as I understood them before the Government. I hoped the Government would not enter into the enterprise of intervention. I believed that at that time, in the situation and under the circumstances, present and prospective, it was doomed to fail. I thought that economic cooperation would save the raw materials and economic power of Russia for the allied cause. Intervention was decided on. As soon as it occurred I went to my place in the South, so that I might not be constantly under the pressure of speaking on the Russian question. You know from the time that I arrived back in this country I was front-page news, and you know that up to this time there has been no single authorized statement from me, written or spoken. I have tried to keep faith with the obligations of the situation as they existed. I went down there and buried myself in the South, because I said that even to tell the truth about Russia now is unfair to our Government and the cause of the allies. I did not speak. I have been censured and condemned as cowardly because I would not speak. When certain documents came out people wanted me to tell what I knew or thought about them, and have clamored for me to do so, but I have refused, and I have taken my share of abuse.

When the armistice was signed I said, "My duty is to see that no more American boys and Russian men and peasants are killed because of false interpretation of this Russian situation," and I came back and tried to find out what the policy of the Government would be, and we worked to get light on our policy in Russia and failed; we seemed drifting helplessly in the situation; and then certain Senators of the United States asked that we might be advised about our Russian policy, and the effort was made to get it out into the open; and now at last I have been privileged to meet here with your extraordinary courtesy and to make the statement that I should like to make, in this official group. I have told the truth as nearly as I know it. I will now meet the questioning of the committee and of counsel to the best of my ability. I thank you.

Senator OVERMAN. Maj. Humes, have you any questions to ask?

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Robins, with a view of a clearer understanding, perhaps, of several of the statements that have been made, I would like to ask you some questions. You have on repeated occasions referred to the 7 per cent and to the 93 per cent. Are we to understand by that that it is your impression that the Bolsheviki are 93 per cent of the people of Russia, or is the line between the 7 and the 93 per cent simply a line between the great masses of the people and those who were connected with the former government of the Czar's régime?

Mr. ROBINS. Rather the latter, Mr. Humes, but with this effort to clarify.

Mr. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. Men have said to me, "Robins, you do not pretend to say for a moment that the mass of the peasants care about those formulas or are for them: that they have any real articulation of mind about them?" I said, "No; I would not say that. I would say that of the peasant group, of 84 per cent, there were not more than 5 or 6 per cent that were conscious at all of the formulas. Those persons are, however, the leaders of the masses. What I would mean is this, that in Russia there was practically 93 per cent who would either work with the Bolsheviki and their program or would not work against it; that they were inert when they were not actively with it, and that the leaders believed in the formulas and carried the mass of the people with them."

Mr. HUMES. Are we to understand you, then, as saying that probably not over 3 per cent of the 93 per cent are conscious of the cause they are advocating?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; I said about 5 or 6 per cent of the 84 per cent who are peasants were conscious, with the formulas in their minds, and that this 5 per cent were the leaders of the groups in the soviets who carried the masses with them. Nine per cent of the remainder of the Russian people are proletarian workers in the cities and mills and mines.

There are perhaps 90 per cent of that 9 per cent who are formula men; that is, are conscious socialist revolutionists. You see, the revolutionary proletariat in the cities practically embrace the workmen in the factories to a very large degree, and that group are taught these formulas and are very largely conscious. You will find here and there a group that is not, but the great mass were conscious of the formulas.

Senator OVERMAN. Assuming that to be true, as you say, that 93 per cent are in favor of these formulas, more or less, and they stand for them; yet what per cent of the Russian people favor the administration as carried out by Lenine and Trotzky—what we call the Bolshevik government, as it is?

Mr. ROBINS. It would be hard to say that. May I go away from that question to what I think will be to your minds an informing fact, and to every mind here?

Lenine issued at once the decree for the land distribution, which was the most important single thing in the mind of the peasant mass. The thing that the Russian peasant wants more than anything else is land. Lenine issued this decree, but with extraordinary wisdom, it seems to me, did not distribute the land on the basis of superior wisdom at Moscow, but he arranged that the distribution should be made by the local soviets in each considerable division or division of considerable size and homogeneity. In these soviets the question of how to divide the lands taken from the landlords—it was not all taken from landlords. A hundred and thirty-odd million was taken from the state and special Czar lands.

Senator STERLING. And church lands?

Mr. ROBINS. And church lands. They said, "We will distribute it in this way," and they adopted their local method of distribution after discussion, and by final majority vote in the local soviets made the actual distribution to the peasants of the community. On that decision they hold their title to the land through the soviet, not through the soviet at Moscow but through their local soviet.

Now, Senators, they have cultivated the soil for a year, for one season, and they have eaten the fruit of their own labors, from land that they now call their own; that is, from land which they had the right to cultivate without paying any landlord rent. They do not care anything about the actual title in fee. What they want is the right to cultivate it and not pay rent to a landlord. They have done that and they have eaten the fruit of their labor. The land is theirs, through the soviet. Will the peasants of Russia fight for the instrumentality, the government or power, that has given them the land and that guarantees their title? I simply leave that with you as a reason why in every one of the localities where the reaction has started it has been defeated, not by foreign rifles, not by rifles from Moscow or Petrograd, but by the local rifles of the peasants fighting for the local soviet, which meant the land; and whether Germans come in from the Ukraine against the Red Guard revolutionary forces or Ukrainian Rada battle against the soviet power or whether the White Guards come down from Finland, or whether it was in Siberia or wherever it was, you found the local community arrayed against the effort to overthrow the soviet; not that they had any great enthusiasm for the formulas as spoken at Moscow, possibly; not because they thought that they had administered things any too well; but because "this is where we get our land"; and, sirs, that is the power of the soviet; and also it is because I had sensed that thing that I risked my opinion and position against great authority that the soviet would endure and last away beyond the period given for it, stated for it as the longest term of life by those studying the facts from an intelligent viewpoint of the old order but not getting contact with the present facts and people outdoors.

Senator OVERMAN. Realizing that is true, Mr. Robins, and I have no doubt you are stating what you believe to be true, I can not understand why it is that we find it testified here by eyewitnesses that there is this reign of terror. If that be true, how do you account for this reign of terror?

Mr. ROBINS. I would account for it by this statement, that certainly up to the time I left Russia the violence that took place or was alleged to have taken place, and I have read many accounts since I got back, very largely is false. I went through the situation, I had my eyes open, I tried to get facts as I went along. I had to act and to put other people's lives in the issue. I was trying to know the facts. Up until I left Russia there had been no such thing as any general terror in Russia, in my judgment.

Senator NELSON. I want to ask you a question in that connection.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, Senator.

Senator NELSON. Do you know anything about how the so-called red guard—you know what I mean by that——

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator NELSON (continuing). Was organized, and what elements helped to organize it; what it was composed of?

Mr. ROBINS. The red guard was in the main composed of working men in the industrial cities, and they were factory operatives and laborers.

Senator NELSON. Did it not include many criminals?

Mr. ROBINS. Doubtless there were some criminals among them.

Senator NELSON. Were there not a great many Germans among them?

Mr. ROBINS. Very few, in my judgment.

Senator NELSON. Did not Germans help to organize it in the beginning?

Mr. ROBINS. Not at all; no, sir.

Senator NELSON. In your judgment they had absolutely nothing to do with it?

Mr. ROBINS. In my judgment nothing.

Senator NELSON. In that you differ from almost everybody else.

Mr. ROBINS. I am sorry it is so, but I have to report the truth as I saw it.

Senator NELSON. Did you ever see the red guard take possession of buildings, there, and turn the occupants out and occupy them?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. In Petrograd?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Did you see them confiscate the property and furniture of people who lived in those houses?

Mr. ROBINS. I did.

Senator NELSON. Did you see them stand people up and shoot them?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. You never saw anything of that kind?

Mr. ROBINS. I never saw anybody shot. I know that people were shot, but I never happened to see anybody shot.

Senator NELSON. You knew that the red guard killed a good many people, did you not?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; I knew they killed some people, Senator.

Senator NELSON. But you think they were rather moderate in that; is that your view?

Mr. ROBINS. At the risk of great misjudgment, may I say this, that up to the time I left Russia the thing that was constantly in my mind, again and again, was the lack of vindictiveness, was the lack of actual destruction of life and property, under the circumstances. If it had been America, if it had been any other land I knew of where a mass mob, as it were, had taken power like that and had the rifles back of them, I should have expected vastly more of destruction.

Senator NELSON. Your view is that they were very moderate?

Mr. ROBINS. That is, up to the time I left there.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. The wonder to me is that the people, after all these years, when they had taken the bit in their teeth and were running wild, should not have destroyed more people and property.

Senator NELSON. When did you leave Russia?

Mr. ROBINS. I left Vladivostok the 1st of June.

Senator NELSON. Nine or ten months ago?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; I had six months of Bolshevik rule.

Senator NELSON. We have had good Americans here who have been over there on business, and who were put in prison, and who saw men from time to time led out, with every evidence that they were killed and disposed of. You have seen nothing of it?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. What part of the country did you percolate in?

Mr. ROBINS. I percolated pretty well all over.

Senator NELSON. You went down into the Ukraine?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Were you in Kiev?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. Were you at Samara?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. Were you at Perm?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir. I was at Ekaterino-Slav and Kharkov, in southern Russia; in Siberia twice—across twice—in Petrograd and environs, Moscow and environs, and Vologda.

Senator NELSON. Did you go down the Volga or the Dneiper or the Dneister?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir.

Senator NELSON. Were you in Little Russia or White Russia?

Mr. ROBINS. I was in White Russia.

Senator NELSON. Did you not confine most of your work and operations to the big cities—Petrograd and Moscow?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. And get your impressions from that?

Mr. ROBINS. To a very considerable degree; but I went twice pretty well all over Russia.

Senator NELSON. Did you go to the country and interview the peasants in their mirs?

Mr. ROBINS. I went into the country and interviewed them in their groups.

Senator NELSON. What is the difference? You know the system of land distribution that prevailed, of the mirs; the communal system? That was the right to use the land, was it not?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That was assigned by the mir, always?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That was the system that prevailed under the Czar's government, was it not?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Wherein does this present system of the soviet, this Trotzky and Lenine government, differ from that? Does not the state take hold of the land and own it, and does it confer any other right upon the man that cultivates it than the right that the peasants got in the mirs—that is, simply the right to use the land?

Mr. ROBINS. In the main—

Senator NELSON (continuing). With no title? They are not even tenants by lease. Is not that true?

Mr. ROBINS. In a way. The distribution was made in that way by some of the soviets.

Senator NELSON. So that that is simply an application of the mir system, that has prevailed in Russia for years and years, by this new soviet government to all the lands of Russia?

Mr. ROBINS. That is it, very largely.

Senator NELSON. They have confiscated it.

Mr. ROBINS. Very largely.

Senator NELSON. They have confiscated the crown lands and the church lands and the lands of the big proprietors, and if you read their decree literally they have confiscated the mir lands, too.

Mr. ROBINS. Very true.

Senator NELSON. And made them State lands?

Mr. ROBINS. Very true.

Senator NELSON. So that it is practically impossible now under their decree for a Russian peasant to acquire title to a foot of land. Is not that true?

Mr. ROBINS. I would not think that was quite true, sir.

Senator NELSON. I mean to acquire a fee title to it?

Mr. ROBINS. I think there were certain local soviets that distributed the fee, but very little in relation to the total, and very small quantities in each jurisdiction.

Senator NELSON. That may have been the case in the past.

Mr. ROBINS. No; I mean now.

Senator NELSON. But now, under this decree, all the land in Russia is nationalized, is it not, and made the property of the State? That is the way the decree reads, is it not?

Mr. ROBINS. That is the theory of the national decree.

Senator NELSON. Is not that the way the decree reads?

Mr. ROBINS. The national decree, Senator.

Senator NELSON. All the lands are in the government, and nobody else can get any interest or title in those except the men that cultivate them, and they can only get the use of the land so far as they cultivate it. Is not that the whole of it?

Mr. ROBINS. That is the general decree.

Senator NELSON. Now, would you like to have that system applied to America or any other country?

Mr. ROBINS. Under no circumstances at all. I would do my best to prevent it.

Senator NELSON. Would it not be more of an encouragement to a Russian peasant to say to him, "You can get title to your little farm, build your house, and cultivate the land, and make a farm of it, and you will become the absolute owner"? Would not that be more legitimate and encouraging?

Mr. ROBINS. It certainly would be to us.

Senator NELSON. And why, then, if you believe in that doctrine, do you preach in favor of the soviet gospel?

Mr. ROBINS. I have never preached to anyone, in a single instance, either in Russia or America or anywhere or any time, in favor of the soviet form of government.

Senator NELSON. Now, I got this impression. I will tell you the impression that you have left on my mind.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, Senator.

Senator NELSON. The impression from your whole talk is that our Government has made a mistake in not entering into some kind of an alliance with this new government, the Bolshevik government, of Russia; that at all events, to use your own terms, they ought to have entered into an economic alliance with it.

Mr. ROBINS. That is absolutely right, Senator. That is it.

Senator NELSON. Now, you think our Government has made a great mistake in not entering into association and cooperation with this soviet government? That is your theory, is it not?

Mr. ROBINS. Within the terms as stated, absolutely so.

Senator NELSON. Yes. That is your theory, and you think our Government ought to cooperate, then, with them in carrying out their land program and their socialistic program?

Mr. ROBINS. Not at all, Senator. It does not follow, at all.

Senator NELSON. What should we cooperate with them in, do you think—simply in introducing a new government into the country?

Mr. ROBINS. In a measure, Senator.

Senator NELSON. That would be your cooperation? All you would want our Government to cooperate in would be in sending American goods there, and you would not want our Government to cooperate with them in establishing the principles of the soviet government in their land system?

Mr. ROBINS. Absolutely right.

Senator NELSON. So that, boiled down, all there is in your gospel of cooperation is simply this, that we should cooperate with them in order to build up our import trade into that country? Is not that the sum and substance of it?

Mr. ROBINS. As I have stated to you, my object was, at the time I started, to prevent raw materials from going from Russia into the central empires; to keep Russia from being dominated by Germany, and to let our Government and the allies get the benefit of the Russian economic situation.

Senator NELSON. Do you think that the peasants there and the proletariat, who were connected with this Lenine and Trotzky government, were worrying over the importation of sugar and coal and oil and textiles from this country, or were they worrying over the land system and taking and distributing the land, and taking possession of the factories and the banks and attempting to run them?

Mr. ROBINS. Their fundamental desire was for land; but, Senator—

Senator NELSON. Do you think you could have made an impression upon the Bolshevik doctrine by preaching your gospel of American importations?

Mr. ROBINS. I think we did make an impression on it. I think that the modification of the decree in the Harvester case and the modification of the decrees in the case of the two banks shows that there was an actual helpful influence in the situation.

Senator NELSON. To sum up your doctrine, if I understand you right, our Government ought to cooperate and associate with them in order to build up our foreign trade connection with that country, but you do not believe that our Government ought to cooperate with them in any manner in establishing the socialistic land system or industrial system?

Mr. ROBINS. Absolutely right, Senator. That is the situation, in so many words.

Senator NELSON. So that you would limit your cooperation entirely to building up American trade with their country?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; and preventing Russian people from starving to death.

Senator OVERMAN. You have observed, I suppose, that there is a good deal of Bolshevik propaganda in this country for the overthrow of our Government and you think that it ought to be stopped where it is?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. You have said that. How would you stop it? I want to get your views on it.

Mr. ROBINS. I think if this committee makes a report on just what Bolshevism is, on what the soviet program is; if the report of this committee is circulated and makes clear to the minds of America what is involved in this class materialist economic force—social control—that the American public mind, everywhere understanding it, in vast majority would repudiate that whole program. I think that if we answer to whatever there is of economic wrong in our own situation by intelligent legislation through Congress and the several States; if we answer the economic wrongs which fester and make centers of resentment and indictment against our institutions, make breeding spots, we can meet and answer the agitation and unrest. Take the I. W. W. All these troubles between them and the regular trades-unionists are the result of industrial sore spots. The troubles with the I. W. W. sprout and grow always on the basis of some economic wrong in some place that has been left over, as it were, like the lumber camps or the copper mines, etc.

Senator NELSON. May I ask you there—this is very interesting—is there a kinship and resemblance between the I. W. W. and the Bolshevik doctrines?

Mr. ROBINS. In some of the doctrines, yes, sir; undoubtedly so. But, Senator, if we meet by a real, intelligent reconstruction policy these left-over spots, and take from the workman's table the specters that I as a workman knew, the fear of unemployment, accident, and sickness, which can be protected by intelligent systems of pensions and insurance, and safeguard old age and premature death—if those three fears are banished from the workingman's table—we will have laborers and their families implicated in the security and permanence of the Government, because the Government is backing him at these points. Then you have given him a situation in which this land, being for him thoroughly worth living in, is worth dying for and is worth protecting at all points.

Senator OVERMAN. You mean, legislate for the betterment of the workingman.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir; and the general social situation, whatever it may be.

Senator OVERMAN. What would you advise in legislation of pains and penalties to stop this propaganda system in America, or would you do it by publicity? How would you correct that evil? You admit it is an evil.

Mr. ROBINS. I would study that evil. I do not think, for instance, that a law against carrying the red flag in a procession is very effective. I think they would take a green flag very soon. I think it is superficial, and this sort of hysteria does no good.

Senator OVERMAN. I agree with you that far. But what would you think of a law preventing the carrying of the red flag where there is an organization to overthrow the Government. Would you stop the carrying of a red flag if it was inspiring people to go and overthrow the Government? I am asking you that because there is a bill now pending for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINS. I would prefer not to do it that way, Senator. I should be doubtful of any real result. If there was any organization anywhere that was directed toward the overthrow of the American Government by force, every man who recommended the overthrow of the Government by force I should arrest, indict, try, and convict.

Senator OVERMAN. The first section of the bill is one prohibiting the carrying of the red flag by any association of people who are organized for the purpose of overthrowing the Government by force, and the second section is to punish anyone along the lines you suggest.

Senator NELSON. Here is one side of the question about carrying the red flag. Where a procession of men carry a red flag, and they are not repressed by law, people will resent it and take the law into their own hands, and it will lead to a breach of the peace. That has occurred frequently during the period of the war here where men carried such banners, or where they were in processions opposed to war. People would resent it and take the law into their own hands. Now, to my idea, where men carry flags, if it is simply a social matter, it is only a flag, but where they carry a flag and indicate that they want an upheaval and overthrow of the Government by force, in that case, because of its tendency to lead to a breach of the peace, on that account I think it ought to be suppressed.

Mr. ROBINS. It might be so while the war was on, but now that the war is over the feeling would be less, would it not?

Senator NELSON. I do not know. I have in my room a mass of publications with red covers and in red type, circulars and papers preaching the Bolshevik doctrine, the most radical form of it, a revolt against this Government in America by force, by violence, by men who do not believe in the Government, by men who call the laboring men in this country nothing but serfs and slaves of capitalists, and all that. Now, do you believe in the free circulation of that kind of literature in the mails?

Mr. ROBINS. Of course not.

Senator NELSON. Let me tell you another thing. We have now a law on our statute books prohibiting the sending of poison by mail. If we have a law against what I would call—it may be a bad expression—physical poison, why should we not have a law against the sending of moral poison, the kind I have stated?

Mr. ROBINS. We ought to have, Senator. The only question in that legislation is, Where do you draw your line between legitimate propaganda of ideas and the protection of the commonwealth? I believe that wherever there is an appeal to force in this country to overthrow the institutions of this country with that kind of printed material or by the spoken word, whatever it may be, it is clearly within the law, and should be suppressed by the law. But our doctrine is rather clear in our past experience that we are careful about constructive conspiracy and constructive crime in order to protect the liberty of speech and of the press.

Senator NELSON. You are undoubtedly right.

Mr. ROBINS. And therefore we say, as it has been said in the Supreme Court, that we will allow a man to make a public statement, to make a speech, and we will not suppress the publication of it, but if it has the result that having made a public statement or having published a statement, there do come from it results that are criminal, then we reach back and fine or imprison that person responsible for the criminal result. That has seemed to be a sound method in our working out of our principles, so that anything that takes from that principle of freedom is taking away something of the right of the free people.

Senator NELSON. That supposes that the crime may be committed, and you would only punish the criminal after it has been committed.

Mr. ROBINS. Quite so.

Senator NELSON. We have a principle of the old common law that if a man threatens to kill you, you need not wait for him to attack you, but can appear and have him put under bonds. Why should we not meet the evil before it has been accomplished? Why should we not repress it?

Mr. ROBINS. Only for this reason. If you had bureaucratic officials enforcing general repression, so much under their own wills may be done that really limits the freedom of speech and of the press. We have preferred in the past to take those evils that flow from this misuse of liberty as less evil than would be the restriction of the liberty and freedom of the press.

Senator NELSON. We have four classes of laws on our statute books. One relates to what we call fraud propaganda—frauds attempted through the mail. Then we have the repression of lotteries.

Senator OVERMAN. And poison.

Senator STERLING. And obscene literature.

Senator NELSON. Then we have those laws relating to obscene literature of all kinds, and then we have those in regard to poisons and drugs of all kinds that are deleterious. We have four classes over which the post office has jurisdiction. Now, I have not kept much track of it, Mr. Robins, except in one case, as to the oldest one of the laws, that in respect to frauds. I have seen the great value of the Post Office Department in protecting our people against these villainous frauds that are perpetrated by educated and intelligent scoundrels.

Now, there is another thing I would like to hear your views of. We had a witness here yesterday, a Scotchman by birth, brought up in England, who claimed to be a Presbyterian and to have affiliated with the Quakers. He was a pacifist and a conscientious objector, and he made this statement, and I want to see your views on it. He said there was more humanity in the soviet government and their plan of government than there was in Christianity as it existed in the world. What do you think of it?

Mr. ROBINS. I will absolutely dissent from the whole thing.

Senator NELSON. How?

Mr. ROBINS. I disagree absolutely.

Senator NELSON. I thought you would.

Mr. ROBINS. I have no sympathy, Senator, with the pacifist non-resistant position. I know nothing more alien to what I think is necessary to preserve our real institutions. I believed so much in this war that while we were drifting I went to Canada and stumped Canada for recruits before our country went into the war.

Senator OVERMAN. Have they suppressed the press over there—the Bolshevik government—have they suppressed the press or any of the newspapers over there?

Mr. ROBINS. They did, yes. Kerensky suppressed the Bolshevik papers, and as soon as the Bolsheviks got in power they suppressed the Kerensky press, and the press of the privileged class was cut off for a while.

May I bring to your minds a matter which will show the soviet situation better than anything else, a matter which happened on last Easter Sunday in soviet Russia? From time long past it has been a rule—I think it was a decree secured by the church—that whenever there was any publication, periodical, or paper published on Easter Sunday it should begin with a headline in Russian that, translated, means "Christ is risen," as a recognition of religion. On the first Easter Sunday in the soviet republic, I was challenged by this—and it gave me a sense of the whole setting more than almost any one incidental thing that had happened—by the fact that all the papers of the dead church, all the papers of the dead state, all of the papers of the dead social order, that were there published on that day had the Russian words, "Christ is risen" at the top, and every one of the soviet papers had this headline, "One hundred years ago to-day Karl Marx was born."

The absolute issue was drawn between a betrayed state, a betrayed church, a betrayed social order that had brought injustice and oppression to folks' lives until they were ready to turn to this gospel of Marx, of this very materialistic economic gospel, believing that it was really greater than the Gospel of the Gallilean, and I know of no single instance that affected me more with utter sorrow and regret, and the wonder of how far it would go, and the desire that we might not be permitted to develop that class cleavage in my own land.

Senator NELSON. Do you know anything about Mr. Sisson and the papers he got there?

Mr. ROBINS. I knew him real well.

Senator NELSON. Who was he, and what was his mission over there?

Mr. ROBINS. He was a gentleman who was sent by the Government, from the Committee of Public Information, to find out what we were doing, or trying to do, to stabilize the Kerensky government; but when he got there the Bolshevik government had come into power.

Senator NELSON. Did he get hold of those papers that have been published? I refer to those papers——

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, Senator; and if it is the pleasure of the committee I will speak about them. But I understand that Mr. Sisson is not in this country, and it has always been my practice to "give a man a chance for his white alley."

Senator NELSON. I do not want you to go into his character. I am not after that. Do you know about those papers that he captured there and turned in to our Government?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; but even if I make a statement and do not refer to him personally, if I refer to the facts of this matter it would reflect, inevitably. I feel not disposed to do it, for a variety of reasons, yet I will do exactly as the committee desires. Probably the committee has not spent much time on those papers.

Senator NELSON. I do not think we have spent any time.

Mr. ROBINS. Would it not rather be a more severe judgment, possibly, and condemnation, 10 years from to-day for it to be true that anybody should go to Russia——

Senator NELSON. Perhaps so.

Mr. ROBINS. And be there—he was there for four months and he saw this wonderful thing transpire, of 180,000,000 people trying to throw off this oppression of centuries, with the bit in their teeth, brutal and all that, yet struggling from the darkest tyranny toward freedom, even though blinded by the unaccustomed light, and he got the cooperation of that government at certain important points, and then left that land denouncing that government, and all he got out of that wonderful experience was certain documents and a German agent theory of the first fundamental economic revolution.

Senator NELSON. It might be better, as you say, not to ventilate it now. Let me ask you another question: Do you not think there is danger, an existing danger and continued danger, of the commercial and industrial invasion of Russia by Germany?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; precisely.

Senator NELSON. And do you not think that danger will continue as long as the present disorganized state of government prevails there?

Mr. ROBINS. You have put your finger on one of the continuing reasons why I to-day think that an intelligent commission should go into Russia to deal with the situation, because of this very economic vacuum which exists at the top of the economic life of Russia. This vacuum will be filled either by us or by German intelligence and cooperation from Germany, and in that event the central powers will run that show in a very great way for a long time; or else we are going to run it. Which shall it be? I would like for us to run it.

Senator OVERMAN. You think Germany will run it instead of us?

Mr. ROBINS. I would like—

Senator OVERMAN. Your idea is to have a commission go there now and look into the situation to preserve our economic position?

Mr. ROBINS. Exactly so.

Senator NELSON. You know the plan and the program covered by the 14 points of the President involves the establishment of Poland as an independent government? You know that?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. In order to establish Poland they would have to take Austrian Poland, Russian Poland, and German Poland and give it all to one state, would they not?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Is not that apt to breed a good deal of friction both on the east and the west?

Mr. ROBINS. I think it would breed a good deal of friction on the west, but not much on the east.

Senator NELSON. You think the Russian Bolshevik government favor an independent Poland?

Mr. ROBINS. I should say yes, sir, on theory, provided it be a genuine Polish unit. Their doctrine of self-determination has been applied even in the Ukraine. It was applied in Siberia. It was applied in Finland. They are committed to it. Individuals might oppose it, but the soviet mind in Russia believes genuinely, in my judgment, in self-determination of nationalities.

Senator NELSON. So they would be in favor of the independence of Finland?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir; in my judgment they are in favor of the independence of Finland, but are not in favor of the domination of Finland by Germany or any foreign land for imperialistic purposes.

Senator NELSON. But German influence has been expelled from there. The Germans were backing the Red Guard there.

Mr. ROBINS. No, Senator; the White Guards were opposing the Red Guards. The White Guards were backed by Germany.

Senator NELSON. Now, they have organized a government—I forget the name, but they have organized a government now—under Gen. Mannerheim, who is at the head of the present government for the independence of Finland and is anti-Bolshevik, and one of the problems connected with independent Poland is the question of giving them an outlet at Danzig. What do you think about that matter? Danzig is on the line between east and west Prussia and those countries, east and west Prussia, are mainly settled by a German population, and to give the Poles an outlet by way of the Vistula River at Danzig, do you not think that is apt to create a great deal of friction?

Mr. ROBINS. I should think it might, but I do not have intimate knowledge enough to have any opinion of value there.

Senator OVERMAN. These officers, what became of them? Have they all been killed?

Mr. ROBINS. Who?

Senator OVERMAN. I mean the Russian officers.

Mr. ROBINS. Many of them are emigrants out of the country, and probably a very great number have gone back into the soviet and are now leading the soviet troops, have accepted the soviet situation. I read at one time a statement from the soviet war department that there were so many major generals, and so many other officers—7,000 officers in all of the old régime—now engaged in leading the soviet forces in Russia to-day. Based on the best information I have been able to get there is much truth in this statement. For instance, here is this young man who was our interpreter, who was a Cossack soldier of noble birth, a splendid young man, who joined the soviet later on, saying, "That is the only thing in Russia, and I am now with the soviet."

May I say that the fear of foreign domination that grew up in Russia after I left there is quite an understandable thing? If there is one thing more definite than another in Russia it is the resentment and fear and the age-long hostility to the yellow race. White Slavic Russia, Christian Russia, had fought the Tartar through generations, had fought the Mongols, and had been menaced by the Japanese as they thought again and again. They said, "Will the great, free democracy of America get behind the heathen yellow dogs against Russia?" I do not agree with that designation, but it was frequently used in the Russian press. When we started in with intervention, they said we were trying to get markets in Russia. They said, "I told you so. They are coming to back these Japanese; imperialist robbers; American soldiers and flags behind Japanese flags and bayonets, and are trying to rob Russia." Then they also said that the allied forces were invited there by the Russian bourgeois. Therefore a terror began against the intelligent and propertied classes, and naturally a number of those were killed by a terror that was wholly unnecessary, and some of the best men in Russia probably were killed.

Senator NELSON. But do you not know that it has been testified to by a number of witnesses that they have a great many Chinese in the Red Army? It has been testified to.

Mr. ROBINS. I have seen the statement. It may be true; but there were not any up to the time I left.

Senator NELSON. I will tell you where they got them. They got a lot of Chinese as laborers to build the Murman railroad, that railroad up to Murman and the Kola Peninsula. They had a lot of Chinese laborers then and they were left in the country, and they have incorporated a large share of those laborers in the Red Guard.

Mr. ROBINS. It may be so, sir, but I would question it.

Senator NELSON. It has been testified that they have a lot of Chinese in the Red Guard.

Senator STERLING. You left European Russia in May, 1918, I believe?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. You have described conditions up to the time you left, Colonel?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Have you kept track of conditions since you left?

Mr. ROBINS. As near as I could, but without any real assurance as to the accuracy of such information as I have got. May I illustrate it? I was here and met Senator Hitchcock and some other Members of the Senate and was talking, when a gentleman came into the conference where we were and put a paper on the table, and he said: "What have you got to say to that?" What he meant was the headline of the paper. You may remember that the last part of June or the first part of July it was reported that Lenine and Trotzky were fleeing toward Murmansk from Moscow, and that the soviet government had been overthrown, and Kaladines was coming in with one division at one gate and Korniloff with one division at another gate had captured Moscow and overthrown the soviet. "Well," I said, "all I have got to say is this: The last two people in Russia I would expect to run away would be Lenine and Trotsky, and the last direction that they would go would be Murmansk, because they would be hung as soon as they got there. As to the rest of it, Kaladines killed himself on the porch of his home at Rostov on the Don three months before I left Russia, and Korniloff was killed by his own soldiers about 30 days before I left Russia, so I doubt their leading any divisions anywhere. With these modifications, the report is probably true."

Senator STERLING. What is your opinion with regard to the conditions, first, in regard to the power of the Bolshevik government? Does it possess a greater or less power than it had at the time you left?

Mr. ROBINS. All that I can get, and I have dealt as best I can with what intelligence I have, tells me that the soviet government is stronger, especially since foreign rifles came in and it has been able to capitalize the national spirit to protect itself against foreign invasion.

Then I think probably they have modified a good many of their decrees. I do not care what a man's formula is, if he must get out and feed and clothe the people, he will modify his formula or give place to somebody else.

Senator STERLING. From the accounts you have received, have distress and starvation increased since you left, in Petrograd, Moscow, and elsewhere?

Mr. ROBINS. I think they have increased in Petrograd; probably not in Moscow.

Senator STERLING. Do you know what the population of Petrograd is normally?

Mr. ROBINS. About 2,000,000. The war brought it up to something like 3,000,000. What it is now I do not know.

Senator STERLING. After the Bolsheviks moved in there, the population decreased gradually, did it not?

Mr. ROBINS. I am sure it did, because they organized committees for sending people back to the villages. Here was the situation: Millions of people came up to the cities from the larger villages as the result of a foolish policy of Kerensky and the Czar's Government, which was to pay a larger or smaller amount for sustenance to the wives of families of soldiers in the army in relation to the cost of living in the different localities, without restriction upon residence. It varied on a sliding scale. In the cities they got more; so the peasants left the villages, where they should have stayed, and came in in large numbers to Petrograd and Moscow. The Bolshevik government at once began an effort to demobilize those people, and try to get them back to the villages, and the police in some instances took them out by force. There was a considerable diminution in population in the first few months.

Senator OVERMAN. Did many of the bourgeois leave from fear?

Mr. ROBINS. Great numbers, sir.

Senator STERLING. The population was actually diminished more than one-half?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know the proportion, Senator. It was diminished a great deal.

Senator NELSON. You have kept track of Russia since you left? Do you not think that if they had the means of distribution, by boat, water and rail, there would be enough bread—enough wheat—in the whole country to supply themselves with, if they could distribute it and divide it up?

Mr. ROBINS. Surely, Senator.

Senator NELSON. There is no need of importing anything there? What they need is transportation?

Mr. ROBINS. Transportation and manufactured products. As soon as we sent troops out into Siberia it prevented them from getting anything from that section, and as soon as the Ukrainians shut off the supply from Odessa two great fields of food supply were cut off.

Senator NELSON. One of the greatest fields of supply is southern Russia—the Ukraine and the black belt. That is the great grain-producing country.

Mr. ROBINS. Quite right.

Senator NELSON. And they have there, unless it has been destroyed in this revolutionary condition, a good supply of grain, if it could be distributed.

Mr. ROBINS. I think so. And the last crop in Siberia is the best they have had in years.

Senator NELSON. Yes; Siberia is good. And in Siberia they have more dairy products than in the Ukraine.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir.

Senator STERLING. Do you know how successful the authorities at Petrograd, for example, were in supplying the people of Petrograd with food supplies?

Mr. ROBINS. There was a failure everywhere, Senator. This economic breakdown was the most significant underlying fact in the Russian situation; but I think following the Bolshevik revolution there was more grain in Petrograd than under Kerensky.

Senator STERLING. Do you know of their efforts to procure food from peasants?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Do you know of their taking food by force from the peasants?

Mr. ROBINS. In some instances. But, Senator, there is an illumination of that event. There was and is in Russia, in the peasant villages, what is called the "fist," the peasant speculator in grain, who buys at a low price from the grain-growing peasants and stores it for a higher price. The taking of grain by force was in the main from these speculators, and in that they had more or less the laughing cooperation of the other peasants. In other words, the working peasants had got theirs, and when the speculator was exploited, there were only one, two, or three, or half a dozen men in the village friendly to the "fist," the poor peasants were rather pleased that he was forced to give up the hoarded grain.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it not true that these peasants refused to sell wheat on account of the value of the money?

Mr. ROBINS. I imagine they did; and they tried to make distribution in kind by barter, instead of money payments.

Mr. HUMES. Col. Robins, that is the point I want to get to: Are you familiar with the financial system of the government and the theory upon which they are manufacturing money—the use of the printing press so freely?

Mr. ROBINS. I know something about it, Mr. Humes.

Mr. HUMES. Have you any decree or decret that has been issued on the subject of issuing paper money? I have been trying to locate something on that subject and have not been able, as yet.

Mr. ROBINS. I think I have among my papers some such decree, and if I have, I shall furnish it to you.

Mr. HUMES. Can you tell us in a general way what the regulation of the government is or the decree of the government on that subject is? In other words, has an unlimited supply of money been provided for, or is there a limit?

Mr. ROBINS. I think it is limited by the printing press and the paper. But may I say to you, Mr. Humes, that the real intelligence of an informed financial mind could be gotten from some of these gentlemen of the National City Bank, as I do not know and do not pretend to know finance intimately, and really I have not followed it with any real intelligence.

Mr. HUMES. They have not any decree on the subject?

Mr. ROBINS. I should think they have.

Mr. HUMES. I thought maybe you would have that.

Mr. ROBINS. I think I have, and I will turn it over to you.

Mr. HUMES. Their theory is that all it is necessary to do is to print the money and put it in circulation. It is based on no reserve or guaranty of any kind?

Mr. ROBINS. No; I would not say that it is, so far as I know; but I want to recognize my own ignorance. The gold in the state bank and the platinum resources were always looked upon, in every conference I had with the government in relation to the financial situation, as security for purchases abroad when it came up. I never had any direct conference in relation to finances, but where it came up they said, "For foreign trade we have got to preserve our gold and platinum resources, and certain other valuable raw materials, and in the domestic situation we are going to use money of this kind for a while." But Lenine had planned premium or token money that was to represent an exchange of products. Whether that was ever put into effect, I do not know. It certainly was not up to the time I left Russia.

Mr. HUMES. That was based upon products? It would simply be issued representing products, but not based upon the products as reserved to redeem the money?

Mr. ROBINS. I will not be able to say about that.

Mr. HUMES. Is that not correct?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know that I know enough about it to answer intelligently.

Mr. HUMES. Have you any idea about the amount of paper money issued by the government?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; I have seen all kinds of estimates. I think there have been great quantities.

Mr. HUMES. A moment ago you referred to the fruit of the toil of the landowner or the land cultivator under the one year of Bolsheviki rule. Is it not a fact that the fruit of his year's toil was either his grain, or a considerable amount of that paper money with which he could buy nothing, and that consequently he was without all of the other necessities of life, with plenty of money but nothing to buy for that money? Is not that the position that he has found himself in?

Mr. ROBINS. Well, Mr. Humes, the fruit of his toil was, of course, his grain. If he sold it for rubles, then the fruit of his toil was rubles. If he sold it for products—

Mr. HUMES. What sort of products?

Mr. ROBINS. Factory products; for instance, thread, cloth—large quantities of thread and cloth. Large quantities of that stuff were sent down to the Ukraine and the grain districts for exchange for wheat and meat in cooperation with the soviet.

Mr. HUMES. About when was that?

Mr. ROBINS. In April and May.

Mr. HUMES. For how long a period did those mills continue to operate?

Mr. ROBINS. Well, some were operating when I left Russia. How much longer I do not know.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that about the only factory that is operating at this time is that of the International Harvester Co.?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not think that is a fact. It certainly was not when I left Russia, and I have understood from such information as I have been able to get that there are more of them. For instance, the munitions factory—

Mr. HUMES. I want to include the munitions factory with the International Harvester factory. Is it not a fact that there are only two in operation?

Mr. ROBINS. I can not say as to that, sir.

Mr. HUMES. The munitions factory was being operated by the Government prior to the revolution.

Mr. ROBINS. I could not answer. I do not know, sir.

Mr. HUMES. Therefore the organization of that plant was a Government organization even before the revolution, so it was in a different situation.

Mr. ROBINS. If it was taken over by the Czar's government I am not so advised.

Mr. HUMES. That is the testimony introduced here.

Mr. ROBINS. It is probably true.

Mr. HUMES. What other decrees have you in your possession?

Mr. ROBINS. I am not sure. I can not answer that.

Mr. HUMES. Will you furnish us with all the decrees you have?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; everything I have you may have, in relation to decrees.

Mr. HUMES. At the time you left Petrograd what became of the supplies of the American Red Cross?

Mr. ROBINS. You mean, when I first left Petrograd?

Mr. HUMES. Into whose hands did they fall when you left Petrograd and went to Moscow as a Red Cross officer?

Mr. ROBINS. Let me get what you mean. Do you mean when I left Russia or when I left Petrograd to go to Moscow?

Mr. HUMES. When you ceased to handle Red Cross supplies.

Mr. ROBINS. I never ceased while I was in Russia. I was in command of the American Red Cross organization after my appointment in November, 1917, at all times until I left Russia.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that the Bolshevik Government seized more than a thousand barrels of pork from the American Red Cross?

Mr. ROBINS. The fact about the supplies is this—this is the thing that is being said. We brought down from Murmansk, Senators, four hundred thousand and odd cans of milk for the babies in Petrograd, we brought down a considerable amount of groceries, and we brought down some medical supplies, and we stored them in a large warehouse in Petrograd, and put a Bolshevik guard around them, and we never lost a pound. In transit down from Murmansk two cars—possibly four, I would need to refresh my memory—of salted beef—

Senator STERLING. May I interject a question right there.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Were the allied forces at Archangel or on the Murmansk coast at that time?

Mr. ROBINS. Not in any force.

Senator STERLING. There were allied forces there at that time?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; not at first. About March there came down from Murmansk a request to the soviet foreign office that it cooperate with the Murman soviet and that the Murman soviet be permitted to cooperate with the French and English. Lenine ordered it to cooperate with them, and it did. But I think our stuff was brought out before that took place. In January, when we started to bring down our stuff, Gen. Poole of the British economic mission said that it was perfectly impossible to move anything from Murmansk; that even if anything could be started it would be stolen along the road. Maj. Wardwell was sent out and brought down everything, brought down practically all of our stuff, with less than 1 per cent loss. Some of it was thrown out on the shore and was stolen, but some of it was brought back. We brought it down to Petrograd and had it distributed under guard, through the local soviets of Petrograd, to the babies of Petrograd, finishing the distribution along in May, starting some time in February.

One car of meat was separated from the train along the line, but was later returned in good order.

Senator STERLING. Was Maj. Wardwell one of your Red Cross staff?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; Maj. Allen Wardwell was in charge of transportation from Murmansk. Maj. Wardwell took command when I left. Maj. Thomas D. Thacher was secretary of the mission and had charge of distribution—was in general charge under my command.

Mr. HUMES. It is a fact, is it not, that there was a very considerable amount of stores in the possession of the American Red Cross that had been intended for Roumania?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMES. What became of that?

Mr. ROBINS. The Roumanian supplies that were in the possession of the Red Cross in our warehouse and under our protection had been sent down to Jassy. There came a time when the representative of the Red Cross in Jassy thought we should not send more supplies down, that there was a question of his being able to handle and distribute them, and so on, and when there came, during a certain period, a breach between the soviet government of Russia and the Roumanian Government, under an order from Trotsky the stuff was held in our warehouse to await final liquidation of the conflict between Roumania and the soviet government of Russia. In the development of that situation there was a conflict of authority in Roumania between a Bolsheviki group, a revolutionary group, and the old authority, the court group, the king and queen, and so on. In the conflict of authority, the debate going on, this stuff was held pending final settlement. After the situation in the Ukraine had developed into a German situation, and any supplies that were sent down there had a better chance of reaching Germany than anywhere else, I was in no eagerness to have the stuff so sent, and it finally was evacuated, if I am correct—and if I am not correct Maj. Allen Wardwell can correct me; he knows the exact situation—it was sent to Moscow and distributed there, and it was thought that that was a better distribution against the German power than to send it into what would probably be German hands.

Mr. HUMES. Were those supplies turned over to the Bolshevik government?

Mr. ROBINS. They were taken by the Bolshevik government.

Mr. HUMES. They were taken by the Bolshevik government?

Mr. ROBINS. Absolutely.

Mr. HUMES. During the time the Red Cross headquarters were still in Petrograd—during the time that you had a supply depot there, at least—was there any demand made by the American colony or any appeal made by the American colony for food?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Did they succeed in getting food?

Mr. ROBINS. They did.

Mr. HUMES. Is it or is it not a fact that it was represented to the American colony when they were seeking food that the Red Cross had no supplies in Petrograd but had sent all their supplies to Moscow?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; it is an unqualified falsehood.

Mr. HUMES. Are you acquainted with Dr. Simons?

Mr. ROBINS. I know Dr. Simons; yes, sir.

Mr. HUMES. Did he ever make an appeal in behalf of the American colony—ever appeal to you or any of your representatives?

Mr. ROBINS. I think that he made an appeal that he and his organization should be used for distributing supplies, not only for the American colony but for others, and we, knowing the situation and acting in full knowledge of what I thought was the situation, refused to allow him to be the medium of distribution. I believed that our own organization was better.

Mr. HUMES. Did he not at that time make an appeal to you for an issue to the American colony because of their dire want?

Mr. ROBINS. No; he did not.

Mr. HUMES. And was it not represented to him at that time that all the supplies of the American Red Cross had been moved to Moscow, and that there were no supplies in Petrograd available?

Mr. ROBINS. It was not, so far as I know. I was in Moscow probably at that time.

Mr. HUMES. Col. Robins, you say that the slogan of the present government is the rule of the class, an appeal to the class?

Mr. ROBINS. I so understand it.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that that appeal is made by not to exceed 5 to 10 per cent of the people representing the Bolshevik party or government, as you term it, and that the rest of the people that acquiesce in the Bolshevik rule are simply acquiescing because of the terrorism, and because of fear; and do you not think that the Russian officers that you speak of and others who have become a part of the Red Guard have joined the Red Guard as the only means of getting food and the only means of getting a living?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not think that any of the supposititious statements of fact in that series of questions are true.

Mr. HUMES. Then you do not believe the testimony that has been produced here by a great number of very reputable witnesses?

Mr. ROBINS. I have not heard their testimony.

Mr. HUMES. As to their experiences and observations in different parts of Russia.

Mr. ROBINS. I have not read their testimony, and do not know what they said.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know whether it is the fact that families of persons serving in the Red Guard are held as hostages in order to insure the conduct and loyalty of the soldier?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know it at all, sir.

Mr. HUMES. Do you say that that condition does not exist?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know. But I say that it did not exist up to the time I left Russia, within my knowledge.

Mr. HUMES. It has been testified here that on one occasion 20 prisoners were taken out of the prison in Moscow and shot without a trial, and simply for the purpose of making room for some 26 prisoners that they had no place to incarcerate. That statement has been made by a gentleman who says that he was present and saw the occurrence. Do you question the correctness of that statement? Do you think that that was untrue?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know anything about it. It ought to be true if he was there and saw it.

Senator OVERMAN. I do not think that is the way to ask the question.

Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON. I am not a member of the committee, but I want to submit that in any court you would not be permitted to ask the witness concerning testimony concerning which he knows nothing, whether the testimony of a certain witness is true or not; not that it needs to be suggested so far as you are concerned here in this committee.

Mr. HUMES. Col. Robins, I understand you to say that during all of your experience in Russia you saw nothing of terrorism.

Mr. ROBINS. I saw no organized terror, Mr. Humes. That a revolutionary situation should bring violence and killing of people is inevitable. I happened to see nobody stood up and shot.

Senator STERLING. Did you hear, Col. Robins, of men being taken from prison under Red Guard escort, and, without any chance to be heard, and without any formal charge being made against them, shot?

Mr. ROBINS. I heard that, Senator Sterling, and in every instance where I investigated it it proved to be false. I heard that the women of the women's battalion had been violated in a certain barracks after they had surrendered. I had it investigated, and, on the word of no less a person than Madame Turcova, it was repudiated absolutely. The air was full of rumors. If you chose to believe those, you could hear and believe anything, Senator.

For instance, they arrested the head of the Russian Red Cross, a nobleman. They arrested the secretary of the Russian Red Cross. They were going to be shot overnight. I had heard that they had been shot. I went to the government and asked for their release. They showed me the evidence that purported to show that this particular secretary of the Russian Red Cross had sent Russian Red Cross supplies to Kaledines and the leaders of the counter-revolution at Rostov, where there was an organized headquarters of the counter-revolution. I said, "Suppose that is all true. These men are Red Cross officials. I ask you, as the representative of the American Red Cross, to release them." They were both released. I have their letters of appreciation for my intervention.

Senator STERLING. On the other hand, Col. Robins, we have the testimony of a witness here—apparently a most credible witness—who was in two different Russian prisons and talked with the men who were led out to be shot, and I think in both instances, but certainly in one—I am not quite sure as to both, but certainly in one—the man knew the hour at which he was to be led out to be shot, and begged that he might converse with the witness who testified to the fact until his time came, in order that he might pass hours that would otherwise be unendurable.

Mr. ROBINS. Well, it may have all been true. Let me say, gentlemen of the committee, I will not be put in the position of defending violence or crime wherever it has occurred. Let me say that I speak of the facts as they come to my mind. Let me give another instance.

Why do I feel that there is a question in regard to these widespread stories of violence, and so on? I heard it all while I was there. It went on in the way of statement and counter-statement before I left. It did not differ greatly from the stories I hear here. I think there was a much more serious time after intervention than before. I think we can understand why. But a certain Russian colonel named Kolpishnikoff is arrested and put in jail. He is found to have cablegrams that on the face of things indicate cooperation for service and relief to reactionary country-revolutionary forces at Rostov on the Don. This colonel was an excellent person, in my judgment. He was in favor of Korniloff, as most intelligent officers of that group were at the time. There came to Petrograd a request from the American Red Cross in Roumania asking that the American Red Cross in Petrograd send down to Rostov on the Don 80 automobiles or 60 automobiles and certain supplies and money to get them down there. It so happened that at that time Rostov on the Don was the center of a counter-revolutionary movement. I immediately cabled back, or telegraphed back, to the chief of the mission in Roumania that I could not fulfill his request. He wired the American ambassador and sought to get Kolpishnikoff and his automobiles, and probably a hundred thousand rubles, sent through the aid and cooperation of the American embassy to Rostov on the Don.

Now, the colonel of the American Red Cross in Jassy was doing the very best he knew how. He conceived the scheme that if things got too hot in Jassy he would send his unit, with the queen and some of the court, out to Rostov and then 700 miles across a mountain range to Mesopotamia, where they would be with the British front. It was quite a fantastic program, but it was sincerely believed. When it reached me, what it meant in European Russia and Petrograd was support to the counter-revolution whose center was Rostov. Of course I could not move with that play, and refused my cooperation. Then it was planned to go out surreptitiously, and this particular Col. Kolpishnikoff said he could break by the Bolsheviki all right; that he would bribe his way through in the good old prerevolutionary fashion. Well, they let him get his train practically well loaded, and doubtless had him followed with the very excellent secret service that they have, and when he got ready to leave they arrested him and took the paper off the wall in his apartment, translated all of his telegrams, translated everything in connection with it, and it looked as if the American Red Cross in Petrograd, working with the American Red Cross in Jassy—which they believed in Petrograd, by reason of false statements, was under the bourgeoisie influence or the royal influence, etc.—as if the American ambassador and myself were involved in an effort to aid a counter-revolution movement; and there had been enough counter-revolutionary activities in certain quarters, of the allies, in Russia to lay the foundation for the belief that it was general.

This man, Col. Kolpishnikoff, was arrested and thrown into Peter and Paul. They got what they claimed, under their method of judgment, was "the goods" on him. They attacked the American ambassador. It so happened that certain communications in his possession at the time seemed to exonerate me from complicity in the situation; but, none the less, it was threatened that our headquarters were to be raided and that the members of our mission were to be arrested, and it seemed as if it was the end of the play, and they stopped me from sending certain supplies to Jassy by reason of this alleged plot.

I went up to see Lenine. This is the thing that I referred to some time earlier as a time when I had a showdown with Lenine. I went to his office. I went where I usually could go at once, to his inner office, and was not permitted to go. I stayed there two hours, cooling my heels, and then I thought it was time to leave and I started to walk out, and the two red guardsmen walked to the door and crossed their bayonets, and I decided I would stay. I sat down for a while, and finally I looked at my watch and I said in the few Russian words I had, something about "It is now the time for my appointment," and walked through the little passageway, as it were, or hallway that was the exit from Lenine's private roof. You went in this way and came out that way. Well, I thought I would walk around that way and see if I could get in to Lenine. I turned the knob of the door and the door opened and I was in Lenine's room, and he was sitting at the desk and he scowled at me when I entered unannounced, the only time he had seemed ugly. I walked up to his desk and I said, "Commissioner, I expect that you do not wish to see me. I do not wish to make any explanation now, but a full explanation in regard to the American ambassador and the American Red Cross can be made. I know that the face of the papers, from your interpretation, looks bad. Commissioner, I have told you the truth and I shall keep on telling you the truth. I know exactly why and how I am walking around the streets of Petrograd under Bolshevik rule in Russia. I know that at any time you want to you can press a button and call a platoon of soldiers and send them down there to the hotel Europa and they will take me, dead or alive, to Peter and Paul and stand me up and shoot me if you say so; and it is a long way from the Atlantic Ocean to the Neva for an American gunboat, and that is the only answer. Now, commissioner, I have told you the truth; first, because I like to tell the truth—on the whole it is the simpler way around, and if I am going to meet trouble I like to meet it at once and get done with it—and I have told you the truth for a further reason. I have a profound regard for my good health. Now, if you wish me to give you a statement about this, I will be only too glad to do it at any time and I think I can satisfy you"; and I turned around and walked out. It was on the basis of that situation that finally the American ambassador was absolved from all suspicion in the matter and we went on doing business in the situation. It was subsequent to that time, three months, that this man Kolpishnikoff, who was supposed to be a definite counter-revolutionist and who stayed in Peter and Paul a number of months, was released by the soviet government.

Senator NELSON. That Russian colonel?

Mr. ROBINS. That Russian colonel. I do not know whether anything ever happened to him afterwards, but I see here Mr. Johnston, the secretary of the ambassador, who will probably know. It was incidents of that sort, like the incident in relation to the head of the Russian Red Cross, a nobleman who was released on my request, and who came to me with profound expression of his appreciation, and other situations of the sort, that made me feel and act and think as I have felt and acted and thought.

Senator STERLING. Col. Robins—

Mr. ROBINS. I want to say one other thing, though. There seems to be some question—I do not know what may have been said before this committee—in regard to Red Cross supplies in Russia and in regard to the distribution of Red Cross supplies; but I make this deliberate statement: That everything done in relation to the American Red Cross I was responsible for; that every member of the American Red Cross unites with me in judgment as to the wisdom of the action at that time. Maj. Allen Wardwell and Maj. Thomas D. Thacher are conservative lawyers of privilege and position in the city of New York. Other members of that mission are of similar character. When I got ready to play this hand through after the Bolshevik revolution and was told that I was to be commander of the mission, by the then commander, I said to him, "These are the men I want to stay in." He said, "I will order them to stay in." I said, "No, sir. I want no man staying in this game because of military authority that orders him to stay. I want him to stay because he wants to." He said, "What are you going to do?" I said, "I am going to ask each one of them whether he wants to stay, and if he says he wants to stay he is going to stay."

I took them one at a time into my room and said to them something like this: "I have been working with you three months. You know something about the situation. I have got the authority to have you stay. I will not exercise it. You are free to go if your obligations at home are such that you feel that you ought to, or for any reason at all. I can not tell you what is going to happen in this game. Nobody can. I can tell you this, that while I am in Russia the Red Cross will ring no backing bells. We will stay with the situation. At no time when there comes difficulty will there be any question of our personal survival. That is of small moment. If we can take care of ourselves, we will do it. I will ask none of you to do anything that I will not do myself. I am going to give you no foolish orders if I know it, but we are going to stay with this thing through to the end. If you do not like that outlook, leave." They stayed.

The hour came when it was very perilous, in the opinion of many. I remember one time when it looked as if we were through with the play quickly. I said to them, coming into the room where they were, when machine-gun fire was going on in the streets, "I hope we will all get killed," and they looked at me as if I was crazy. I said: "I mean it. Fellows, we have had the greatest privilege ever given, almost, to men, to see this tremendous hour, to share in it, and not only to share in it but to deal with it; not to believe the lies and slanders and stuff, and not to be buncoed by it, either, but to do our level best day by day. If we ever get out of Russia alive and go to living an ordinary, humdrum life in America, it will be so infernal dull we will wish we had been killed"; and the group stayed through, and every one of the group agrees with me at this hour—I do not mean in all points, but I mean in every substantial way—and every one of them played the hand through.

If there is any statement about supplies of the American Red Cross let it be said that the American Embassy knew of the facts, and the American Embassy at no time suggested that there was anything being done with Red Cross supplies in any way unsatisfactory or against the American or allied interest in Russia. We will meet the full issue on that, and I challenge anybody who has made a statement to meet that situation in the open, and not in some secret way.

Senator STERLING. Let me say, Col. Robins, that one witness here testified in regard to Col. Thompson's activities, and he gave to Col. Thompson a very high character, indeed, in the management of the Red Cross work while he was there, and I think the committee—I was, anyhow—were impressed with the truth of that witness' statement in regard to Col. Thompson.

Mr. HUMES. I do not want you to misunderstand my inquiry, Colonel. I asked you with reference to some thousand barrels of pork. My information is that during the closing days of the work of your mission that quantity, or approximately that quantity, of pork fell into the hands of the Bolsheviki, either by force or otherwise, and it was regarding that that I was inquiring. Did it or did it not fall into their hands?

Mr. ROBINS. It did not; and the verification of the facts, with all the circumstances, is within reach of the committee through Maj. Allen Wardwell, who was in charge in Petrograd at the time.

Mr. HUMES. Now, as I understand, the avowed purpose of the Bolsheviki is not only to rule Russia, but to overthrow by revolutionary means this Government, as well as all other governments?

Mr. ROBINS. Every government in the world.

Mr. HUMES. And I do not understand you to favor the formal recognition of the Bolshevik government.

Mr. ROBINS. Correct.

Mr. HUMES. I do not know that you have declared yourself on that, but I gathered from your testimony that you do not favor such a course.

Mr. ROBINS. Correct.

Mr. HUMES. But you do favor economic support?

Mr. ROBINS. I do.

Mr. HUMES. In other words, through economic support you would sanction and encourage and support a further development and strengthening of a government whose avowed purpose is the overthrow of our Government. Is that correct?

Mr. ROBINS. Well, now, Mr. Humes—

Mr. HUMES. Does not that necessarily follow?

Mr. ROBINS. No; it does not follow at all. You have got there—

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact—

Mr. ROBINS. Well, won't you let me answer this first, now?

Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON. You have a right to answer.

Senator OVERMAN. I am going to let him answer.

Mr. HUMES. Let me state the question in another way. Is it not a fact that the economic strengthening of the Bolshevik government, the building up of that government, the furnishing it with more raw materials, with more material things, would make it possible for them, financially and otherwise, to carry on a stronger propaganda and a stronger agitation and a stronger warfare against our Government than they could carry on if they did not have the economic support that you favor?

Mr. ROBINS. Well, now, I think I have got your question, and I do not agree with it at all, and I do not think it is a statement of a sound fact. I agree rather with your chief and mine, as a citizen of this Government, that the best answer to Bolshevism is food. I think, sir, that economic misery, as I have tried again and again to say in this statement, the paralysis of the economic life in Russia, and the misery that grew out of it, and that whole setting, just as in Germany—Mr. Humes, if the Germans are hungry enough, if there is economic misery enough, the Germans will be Bolsheviki. That is inevitable, in my judgment. That is just what I say in regard to Russia. I believe that the reorganization of Russian life economically, the beginning to give substantial hope here and there, beginning to recreate the property interest and the stake in life, would begin at once to disorganize Bolshevik power and the adherence to the formulas. I believe the matter should be dealt with on that basis. And wherever there was a little situation—an oasis, as it were, separated from the general situation—where they were getting along fairly well, and people began to have a property interest in life, a hope in life, the formulas had less power. I believe that the best answer to Bolshevik Russia is economic cooperation, food, friendliness on the part of America, the relationship that we could bring about that would help us, help Russia, and operate in this country to weaken the authority and power of Bolshevism.

MR. HUMES. On the assumption that there is this need for food, that conclusion might necessarily follow; but you a few moments ago made the statement that the peasants, who represent 84 per cent of the people of Russia, by reason of the productiveness of the soil and their having acquired the ownership of the land had enjoyed the fruits of a new era during the last year, and that therefore this want and this starvation that you now refer to did not exist; and I think that I was justified in drawing that inference from your statement. If they are not hungry, if they have plenty of food, why is it necessary to take food to Russia? The information that this committee has had up to this time has been that there was want, that there was privation, that there was suffering there.

MR. ROBINS. Well, now, where was that, Mr. Humes? Was not that in Petrograd and Moscow—in the cities rather than in the country?

MR. HUMES. No; that was all over the country, even among the peasants.

MR. ROBINS. Down in the Ukraine and in Siberia, where the grain is?

MR. HUMES. Even among the peasants; that the peasants were not raising any more than they needed for their own personal use, and were raising no grain to furnish to the rest of the population of Russia. Your statement to-day has been that 84 per cent of the people are living in a new era; that they are satisfied with the fruits of their first year of possession of the land. If that is true, and that degree of contentment and joy exists among 84 per cent of the people, I do not see that the same necessity for the economic answer to Bolshevism presents itself.

MR. ROBINS. Well, I am sorry that I have made myself so unintelligible to you, because your interpretation does not seem to me to rest upon what I said, and certainly it does not rest upon what I meant to say.

Senator OVERMAN. Col. Robins, will you be here to-morrow?

MR. ROBINS. I will, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. It is late, and I think we had better adjourn now.

MR. ROBINS. I shall be very glad to be here at 10.30 if you wish.

Senator OVERMAN. Thank you.

MR. ROBINS. I will be here, Senator.

(Thereupon, at 5.40 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 7, 1919, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

FRIDAY, MARCH 7, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), Nelson, and Sterling.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee will come to order. Now, Major, if you have any other questions you want to ask Mr. Robins, proceed with your examination.

TESTIMONY OF MR. RAYMOND ROBINS—Resumed.

Mr. HUMES. Colonel, in order that we can understand your viewpoint—and possibly I have been too obtuse to catch it—I would like to ask you with regard to the degree of contentment that you have said existed among the peasants. It is my recollection that you said yesterday that the peasants were so contented with their first year's possession of the land and with the fruits of the first year of Bolshevism, that they could not be shaken in the faith; that they felt that it was a new era, a new life that they had entered upon. Did I understand you correctly in that regard?

Mr. ROBINS. You did not, Mr. Humes. What I said was in answer to a query, to one of the members of the committee—I think it was Senator Overman—in which I suggested that the prospective strength of the soviet government rested back upon the fact that there had been a distribution of the land, which was what the peasants had desired above any other one thing in Russia; that under this distribution they had raised a crop, the last year's crop; that they had enjoyed the fruits of their labor on land that they now called their own, without paying any rent for that land; and that the title to this land and the right to use it free of rent came to them from the soviet; and I suggested to the inquiry of the Senator that they would probably defend—or I asked him whether it would not be apparent that they would defend—the soviet through which they held the title to their land.

Mr. HUMES. Yes. Do I understand, then, that you are discriminating between the soviet as an institution and the Bolsheviki, as we frequently term the present Russian government?

Mr. ROBINS. I should always seek to do that, Mr. Humes. The soviet is a form or framework or method of Slavic democratic social control, exactly as the Constitution of the United States is a framework or method or form of political democratic Anglo-Saxon social control.

Senator NELSON. Mr. Robins, will you allow me to interrupt you there?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; certainly.

Senator NELSON. Is it not rather an evolution from the old mir?

Mr. ROBINS. I think it is an evolution from the old mir; decidedly so.

Senator NELSON. It is an evolution from the old mir system of government?

Mr. ROBINS. I believe that to be true.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. Mr. Humes, the particular party that invests that framework of government as the directing officers, and the particular party program that for the moment is the government program, is Bolshevik in Russia; but the soviet might easily endure with the Menshevik party taking control from the Bolsheviks and using the same framework of government; as in the United States we have a Republican party with Republican principles investing the framework of our Government at one time, and at another time we have the Democratic party investing the framework of the Government; and if the socialists were to get command of the American Government by popular vote, they would then invest the framework of the Government. I think, therefore, we should in careful thinking always distinguish between the soviet and the Bolshevik party; but for the purposes of description and in general speaking, we might easily interchange Bolshevik and soviet, because the Bolshevik party for the hour and in the present have taken possession of, have invested the soviet framework.

Senator OVERMAN. Right there, I want to understand your viewpoint. I want the facts. It is not like this country, because they have no framework, no constitution; but the Bolsheviks are the constitution and the framework and everything else; is not that so?

Mr. ROBINS. Senator, I would not think that that was wholly so. There is this soviet form which the Russian mass—the peasants and workingmen—have adopted as a framework. "All power to the soviet," which was the cry on which Lenine and Trotzky took possession of the government in Russia, was not "All power to the Bolsheviks." They really, discreetly—or rather cunningly, with real political judgment—saw that the people liked their self-governing soviets; saw what the Senator suggested, that the old mir that they were familiar with was the thing that the people wanted; that this new constituent assembly idea was largely an importation of the intelligentsia; doing what in this country we do partly by having a written Constitution. As one peasant leader said to me, "Our all-Russian soviet is our constitutional assembly, and the decrees passed in there are our constitution. We are more like the British Parliament, where there is no fixed constitution limiting the enactments of the people, than like your America, and it suits us better." Somebody said that to me in discussion about it, I constantly urging a constituent assembly, constantly urging it, largely out of my ignorance, because I like the Government that I had been used to; and I think we found, in course of time, in Russia, that there was this definite framework that had grown up out of their historic past, which the clever political minds of the Bolshevik leaders fell upon as the way to get into power; and so I think there is really something there in structure as well as the actual Bolshevik domination.

Senator NELSON. Mr. Robins, the only plan of government they have now is those decrees issued there at Petrograd, issued by the central soviet; is not that so?

Mr. ROBINS. That is the national control, Senator.

Senator NELSON. Yes. Well, that is simply certain decrees promulgated by what you might call an oligarchy right there; it is not the product of anything in the nature of a constitutional convention?

Mr. ROBINS. Let us look at that and see if that is a correct definition. Here is the all-Russian National Soviet Assembly, the delegates elected from various local provincial and trade groups throughout the nation.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. There being several kinds of classifications of delegates, as it were. That national convention elects an executive committee of 250 to 300 members.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS (continuing). Which sits, as it were, as a permanent parliament in between the sessions of the national convention. Every decree that is passed has to be approved by the executive committee of the permanent parliament of the national, the all-Russian, soviet, and it is promulgated by statement of the council of the people's commissars. All three actions are required; in other words, first the national assembly; second, the all-Russian executive committee of the national assembly; third, the council of the people's commissars; and until the decree has been approved and issued through the council of people's commissars, it is not a decree, and they consider it and speak of it there as being a definite enactment of the representatives of Russia, and—

Senator NELSON. So that those decrees, then, according to your view, are at present the constitutional form of government there, adopted in that way?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes. If you will look back over the record, Senator, you will find that in the Fifth Russian Soviet, which met, I think, some time in July, 1918, there was passed a definite general framework, the so-called constitution of the soviet.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. It was published in this country, and doubtless it is in your record.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. That outlined certain structural framework, but the whole government, as I seemed to see it, was, as it were, in flux—in movement. Just as the old village mir was growing up here, just as the revolutionary councils in the cities were being fused, just as you found territorial delegation districts and then found craft delegate districts, you found that there were a number of methods, as it were, being slowly fused into a general type; but it was a movement toward conscious revolutionary mass control, or so seemed to me to be.

Senator OVERMAN. I am interested to get this. You describe this as a party rather than a government. Is there any way possible for the people of Russia to get rid of Lenine and Trotzky without a revolution?

MR. ROBINS. I should say so, absolutely, sir. I should say that the moment that any considerable mass in Russia wants to get rid of Lenine and Trotzky, they can do it. I remember now Lenine saying to me one day in the Kremlin, shortly after he had come from Petrograd to Moscow, I telling him some of the reasons why there was such bitter prejudice against his government, and among them the use of force and the charge that they had simply changed dictators—that from dictator Nicholas, from dictator Czar, it was now become dictator Lenine—“Ah,” he said, “are you familiar with the philosophy,” said he, “of the dictatorship of the proletariat”; and I confessed total ignorance. He said, “To take over the institutions of existing bourgeois capitalist society it is necessary to move by force. As soon as you have overcome the force of the existing order, then you revert back to the democratic method.”

SENATOR OVERMAN. In what way could they go about getting rid of Lenine and Trotzky?

MR. ROBINS. Just a moment.

SENATOR OVERMAN. Pardon me.

MR. ROBINS (continuing). He said, “They say that I am a dictator, and I am for the moment. I am dictator because I have behind me for the moment the will of the mass of peasants and workers. The moment I cease to do their will they will take the power from me, and I would be as helpless in Russia as the Czar was.” And I believe that is so; that the reason that their power has held has been that for the time they expressed, as between the old experience of the past and the new experience, a larger expectation of hope and opportunity for the mass of the peasants and workers of Russia than they had before; and as long as that expectation holds they will support Lenine. When it ceases to hold, their rifles and their power will be against him, and he will pass from the scene.

SENATOR OVERMAN. You say “their rifles.” That is what I say; how are you going to get rid of them except by revolution?

MR. ROBINS. Senator, I do not know that you can, except by the development of the soviet membership. For instance, here is a Fourth All-Russian Soviet called to ratify the peace, called at a time when there is a debate between even the two wings of the dominant party, between Lenine and Trotzky. Lenine calls it, and he goes down to the old holy city, the center of the old order of church and state and industrial and commercial power, to meet this assembly in the hour of greatest strain and confusion, and he has the one great clear program. He stands up there, when they said that peace could not be ratified, and it was ratified. In other words, he is indorsed by the delegate body because he wins through knowledge of the facts of Russian life and interpretation of their desires.

Then they meet again in July. Again the executive committee, or the mass, indorses Lenine.

The theory of the soviet government, as I understand it to be, is that every three months it must meet—it can be called oftener, but every three months the All-Russian National Soviet must meet—and that in that delegate assembly all the acts of the executive committee and of the council of people's commissars and the actual commissions as people's commissars go back, as it were, to the national assembly, and the national assembly has to reelect the council of people's commissars and to reelect the national executive committee, and has to indorse their actions in the interim; so that at any moment there was a majority of delegates elected to the National soviet with a program for the National All-Russian Soviet in opposition to Lenine and Trotzky they simply would not be reelected, and other persons would be elected in their stead. It was stated at this Fourth All-Russian Soviet that Karolyn, one of the leaders of the left, was to be elected in Lenine's stead. It was childish talk, but I think any time there is a change of mass leadership they have two methods of changing, either by the constitutional method, if I may use the word "constitutional," in relation to such a system as exists in Russia, or by the exercise of powers of force that exist in Russia. There were demobilized 12,000,000 soldiers, and they were demobilized largely armed, and all over Russia, in the villages, are peasants with their arms, and not a few machine guns, in practically every important village in Russia, as the result of the demobilizing, without any real control by force from the center. That happened at the time the break-up was going on two months before Kerensky's government was overthrown; so that, in every village in Russia where they wish to exercise power against the soviet control, there are rifles and machine guns, and if you have men to man them in sufficient numbers they can take command of things.

Senator STERLING. Let me just ask, have you been out among the villages where these peasants live, and have you seen these rifles and machine guns in the hands of the peasants? Do you know that they are there, from your personal knowledge and observation?

Mr. ROBINS. What I know about that is this: I know that there were in the villages around Ekaterinoslav, in southern Russia; I know that there were in the villages around Karkov; I do know that there were in all these villages where we stopped as we came out through Siberia. Further than that I do not know of my own personal knowledge; but I do know that every revolt started from anywhere, whether supported by foreign rifles or supported only by local and bourgeois interests in Russia, has been repelled not by the power of rifles sent from Moscow or Petrograd, but by the power of the local peasant revolt against the effort to return to the old order.

Senator STERLING. Now, Colonel, do you not know that the peasants in many places along the Volga, and when the Czecho-Slovaks were there, were powerless as against the Bolsheviki; that they wanted to assist the Czecho-Slovaks, wanted to rise up against the Bolsheviki, but they had no arms, and the Czecho-Slovaks or the allied forces furnished them arms in order that they might join in a Russian people's army to assist the Czecho-Slovaks?

Mr. ROBINS. No; Senator.

Senator STERLING. Is not that a fact?

Mr. ROBINS. No; I do not think that is a fact. I have heard it, of course, a number of times.

Senator STERLING. Do you know Col. Lebedeff?

Mr. ROBINS. I have heard of him. Do you mean the ex-minister of marine?

Senator STERLING. Yes. He is a man of good repute?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator STERLING. You know of nothing to the contrary?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir.

Senator STERLING. Have you read his book?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; and, primarily, I would not expect to get from any representative of the old order in Russia a fair judgment upon the revolutionary workmen's and peasants' revolution in Russia.

Senator NELSON. From what source would you get it?

Mr. ROBINS. I would try to get it—

Senator NELSON. From these academic fellows, from these peace-at-any-price fellows, and conscientious objectors?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; I would put those on the left hand and the others on the right. I would try to get in between there, Senator.

Senator NELSON. Now, I gather from your whole statement that you are rather of the opinion that Lenine and Trotsky are the men of the hour for the Russian people at this time?

Mr. ROBINS. No; Senator, I do not think you would get that, unless we qualify it so that we really know what we say, if we mean to say that is the total result it would be wrong. The question you asked, Senator, might involve the assumption that I thought that they were right in their program. I do not think so. If what you inquired was, did I think that they represented the revolutionary mind in Russia and were the best interpreters of that revolutionary class conscience, socialistic revolutionary mind, I say yes, absolutely, that they are the incarnation of it.

Senator NELSON. Do you approve of that revolution?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not approve of their program. I am glad for the Russian revolution and the overthrow of the Czar.

Senator NELSON. Without any circumlocution about this matter, do you believe that our Government ought to recognize the government of Lenine and Trotsky over there now?

Mr. ROBINS. No; I should say that in the present situation, before any recognition of the government takes place there should be a careful investigation by competent and unbiased men, if it is possible, to find out just what the present facts in Russia are.

Senator NELSON. But suppose you were the investigator, and you went over there, would you recommend, from your knowledge of conditions there and of the character of these men, that our Government acknowledge that government of Lenine and Trotzky?

Mr. ROBINS. Senator, I would not recommend it at this moment. If I went over there and found a state of facts that seemed to show that they were supported by the mass of the people, that they had stabilized at certain points, that there was a reasonable expectation that they would be the power of Russia for a considerable period of time, I should recommend recognizing them and working with them.

Senator NELSON. What is your opinion on that point? Are they of that character?

Mr. ROBINS. I certainly do not know. I tried to indicate here yesterday that after I left Russia, constant rumor that came out, constant conflict of testimony, left me, in regard to what was actually going on in Russia, in very real doubt at this present time. I do not believe it is possible to have a sound judgment. I should like to see an inquiry made. I should like to have seen a conference held. I should like to see a mission go in there and get a real statement of the actual situation.

Senator NELSON. Then, as at present advised, you are not prepared to blame our Government for not recognizing the Bolshevik government of Lenine and Trotzky.

Mr. ROBINS. You mean recognizing at the present moment?

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. Absolutely, I would attach no blame.

Senator NELSON. Do you not believe, if that system of government should prevail in Russia, with their gospel and their creed and their mode of operation, that they would attempt to spread it all over the world—to internationalize it?

Mr. ROBINS. Largely, I think they would.

Senator NELSON. Would you not regard that as a menace to other civilizations, to our country and to England and to other civilized countries? Would you not regard it as a menace?

Mr. ROBINS. I tried to make plain yesterday that I regard the formulas, the challenge, of the Bolshevik program as the first challenge and menace to all political democratic governments of the world.

Senator NELSON. Now, then, why do you want to nurse it in Russia?

Mr. ROBINS. I am not wanting to nurse it in Russia or anywhere. I would like to tell the truth about it.

Senator NELSON. I gather the impression from your statement, in the aggregate, that while you do not believe in that system of government, you are rather in favor of the operations of Lenine and Trotsky.

Mr. ROBINS. Not at all.

Senator NELSON. You describe Trotzky as a very fine man.

Mr. ROBINS. Oh, I beg your pardon.

Senator NELSON. Oh, yes. You said that he was highly educated, a very able man, and an orator, and all that.

Mr. ROBINS. He was all three of those things, but I have known men who were those three things, whose character and principles I would be bitterly opposed to. I would like to tell the truth about men, and about movements, without passion and without resentment, even though I differed from men and from movements. I think that that is the essential thing, if we are going to get the truth about it. And there is in this whole Russian situation so much partisan bias. If this will suit your thought of what I am meaning, I am perfectly willing that the Russian people should have the kind of government that the majority of the Russian people want, whether it suits me or whether it is in accord with my principles or not.

Senator NELSON. I thought so. And your idea is that the Russian people, if they want a Bolshevik government full-fledged—

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. As it is to-day, ought to have it?

Mr. ROBINS. Absolutely.

Senator NELSON. So that, boiled down, your mission here is, your first intention is, that the Russian people, if they want a Bolshevik government, ought to have it?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And your next point is, you believe the Russian people want that kind of a government?

Mr. ROBINS. At the time I left Russia I believed the majority of the people were for that government.

Senator STERLING. And yet on yesterday you condemned Bolshevism in the severest terms.

Mr. ROBINS. And I do this morning.

Senator STERLING. And you consider it one of the greatest menaces to government and law and order and civilization?

Mr. ROBINS. Absolutely, Senator.

Senator STERLING. And yet you want to see it work its way out in Russia?

Mr. ROBINS. Senator, what I want to see is this—

Senator STERLING. Just let me add this. Instead of excusing the acts of the government as your testimony seems to do, would it not be better, and would it not be more in accord with patriotism and with good government and real love of order and humanity, to discourage rather than to say, "Here, this is a movement which has its foundation in certain great abuses," and let it go on—just let it go on, although you know that it would be a menace to the rest of the world by its establishment in Russia. It seems to me that there is an inconsistency in the position you take—first condemning it and treating it as a menace and so regarding it, but trying to find excuses for its existence.

Mr. ROBINS. I do not want to make excuses. I would like, however, if I could, to tell the actual truth about it. You know perfectly well that two views have been expressed in America. Here is the view of certain gentlemen who believe in the present soviet government and who think they ought to extend their principles over the world. Then there is a group of people who speak of the whole movement as a German agent, thief, and murderer movement. I do not believe that either is a sound position. I think that to know what has actually happened in Russia is of the very first moment, for us and for our country to deal with it honestly and fairly, rather than in passion or on a statement that is not true—that that is the sound way to combat it. I think to know your disease, just how it came, the circumstances of it, and then to apply the cure—the intelligent cure rather than the unintelligent cure—is the sound way of dealing with the situation.

Senator NELSON. And what is the cure that you prescribe? The cure is that if the Russian people want that style of government they should have it. That is the cure. You do not propose any missionary work, to go over there and convert them from the error of their ways, but you say if they want that form of government we ought to let them have it. That is the cure that you propose.

Mr. ROBINS. On the contrary, that is not quite it.

Senator NELSON. You are not consistent.

Mr. ROBINS. I try to be. On the contrary, there was a cure advocated and presented and attempted by the American Government. It was the cure of intervention. Senator, that cure strengthened and deepened Bolshevism in Russia and created a sense of resentment against the use of armed force to overthrow a democratic movement, so called, a revolutionary movement in another land, that made a revolt of troops in England and questionable situations in Canada and questionable situations in France. Senator, that was the wrong way to deal with Bolshevism. That strengthened Bolshevism in Russia, and that extended Bolshevism, because it had been treated unfairly, in the thought of men's minds who like fairness and justice. It created a resentment and a bitterness in this country on which Bolshevism could live and grow.

Senator OVERMAN. Right there let me interrupt you. I have been delighted to hear you and have your expressions, and I have been very much interested myself, and I have no doubt the whole country is; but suppose that after hearing all the evidence the committee should find it to be a fact that red-handed murder is everywhere, that they are looting everybody's homes, that there is no government there, and all is chaos and anarchy, that the people are starving to death, the little children are dying everywhere; in the interest of humanity would you say that this Government ought to keep its hands off and let them go on with that sort of government?

Mr. ROBINS. Senator, if you had the facts that you could rely upon that that was the actual condition, then probably the civilized world should take action; but I would warn those who would reach that conclusion to be careful of their facts.

Senator OVERMAN. I do not say that we are going to reach that conclusion.

Mr. ROBINS. To be careful in the testimony submitted.

Senator OVERMAN. I agree with you; but suppose it is true. You have been away from there some time. Suppose the overwhelming evidence is that that is the condition, then would you favor this Government intervening?

Mr. ROBINS. I would favor civilization saving any people that were absolutely being murdered and starved and ruined by a power that was held up by bayonets over there, when they have no remedy except for somebody to come in and liberate them by force.

Senator NELSON. You leave the impression upon my mind from your whole statement that your mission here is to have our Government keep its hands off from the Bolsheviki over there and let them have their own sweet will about everything. Is not that what you are here for, and what your mission is?

Mr. ROBINS. I have not any definite mission of that sort.

Senator NELSON. Is not that the drift of your evidence and of your conduct?

Mr. ROBINS. You can judge of the drift of it. I am against the use of American arms and American men in Russia against the Russian revolutionary government, on a false judgment of the facts in the case.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. I believe that is a betrayal of American principles, of the principles upon which this Government was founded, and a violation of the whole constitutional method of our land.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. I believe that such exercise will raise in this country and in other lands the feeling of class resentment and throw men toward the class cleavage and division, which is the supreme menace of the age.

Senator STERLING. Now, it seems to me that you either do not know the facts in regard to some atrocities of the Bolshevik government, or else you are diligent, a little, in trying to excuse it. Let me call your attention to a statement made by Col. Lebedeff in regard to one particular atrocity. He says:

The uprisings in Yaroslavl and Meïrom were temporarily successful; but in most places the half-armed people were mercilessly slaughtered with artillery and machine guns.

I want to say that that statement may be taken in connection with your statement that the peasants in all the villages were thoroughly armed, had their rifles and machine guns. But here is this further statement:

In one instance—

Says Col. Lebedeff—

in the village of Senenikha the Red Guard shot about 100 young peasants and forced old men to dig graves for their sons, killed in the presence of their families.

It seems to me that Col. Lebedeff was in quite as good a position as you ever were to know the situation.

Mr. ROBINS. When did he leave there?

Senator STERLING. Because he was there during the time of the movement of the Czecho-Slovak army, and you left about the time that that movement began. You left European Russia in May?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; May 14.

Senator STERLING. And it was in the late spring and summer of 1918 that this Czecho-Slovak army movement was, and that was during the time when they held about 200 miles along the Volga front.

I want now to call your attention to another thing. You spoke against intervention. You are against it?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator STERLING. I want to call your attention to a statement of Lord Milner with reference to the reasons for intervention. He says:

The reason why allied, not merely British, forces—indeed the British are only a small proportion of the total allied troops—were sent to Russia, is that the Bolsheviks, whatever their ultimate object, were in fact assisting our enemies in every possible way.

I think you made some statements in your testimony that practically admit that?

Mr. ROBINS. No.

Senator STERLING. German propaganda.

Mr. ROBINS. There was German propaganda, but on the contrary I wish now to state that the commissioner of Great Britain said, over his signature, that the Bolshevik government—that Trotzky himself—had helped the allies in specific instances that he indicated.

Senator STERLING. But the Bolsheviks were officered to a great extent by German officers, were they not?

Mr. ROBINS. Not while I was in Russia.

Senator STERLING. Have you learned that they subsequently were?

Mr. ROBINS. I have heard so. But I heard that large groups were officered by German officers when I was there, but it was not true.

Senator STERLING. A part of the Bolshevik army was made up of released German prisoners.

Mr. ROBINS. A very small portion.

Senator STERLING. Others were Lettish.

Mr. ROBINS. There were some Letts.

Senator STERLING. Quite a contingent of the Bolshevik army were Lettish, were they not?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not think so.

Senator STERLING. How about Chinamen who had been helping build the railroads?

Mr. ROBINS. While I was in Russia I never saw an armed Chinaman in the Red Guards or in the Bolshevik forces.

Senator STERLING. Were you in that region—the region of the railroad extending north to Archangel?

Senator NELSON. The Murman coast?

Mr. ROBINS. No; I was not at Murman.

Senator STERLING. Let me call your attention further to what Lord Milner says. He says it was owing to their action that hundreds of thousands of German troops were let loose to hurl themselves against our men on the western front, and it was owing to their betrayal that Roumania, with all of its rich resources in grain and oil, fell into the hands of the Germans. He says it was they who handed over the Black Sea fleet to the Germans, and who treacherously attacked the Czecho-Slovaks when the latter only desired to get out of Russia in order to fight for the freedom of their own country in Europe. Do you deny the fact that they did treacherously attack the Czecho-Slovaks?

Mr. ROBINS. I do.

Senator STERLING. Did they not assure them of safe conduct?

Mr. ROBINS. Do you wish me to make a statement in regard to the Czecho-Slovaks at present? I know the development in part of that situation, and I would be glad to do it.

Senator STERLING. I would be glad to have you answer the question, whether they assured the Czecho-Slovaks safe conduct through Russia?

Mr. ROBINS. I think they did.

Senator STERLING. Was their promise kept to give them safe conduct?

Mr. ROBINS. I think the promise was not kept on the part of the Czecho-Slovaks or on the part of the soviet government.

Senator STERLING. Did they not disarm the Czecho-Slovaks?

Mr. ROBINS. No.

Senator STERLING. On the Volga front?

Mr. ROBINS. There was some disarming of the Czecho-Slovaks.

Senator STERLING. And they were afterwards attacked, were they not, and attacked under the orders of Lenine and Trotzky; and it was supposed that Lenine and Trotzky had their orders from Germany to not let the Czecho-Slovaks pass through Russia?

Mr. ROBINS. Now, will you let me make a statement about the Czecho-Slovak situation?

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. And first let me say this: I refuse now and at all times to be put in the position of defending atrocities, murders, or any kind of violation of law, or of the rights of persons or property. I did not defend it at any time. I do prefer to understand the situation rather than to denounce it. I do prefer to see the reasons that lead up to extraordinary situations rather than to reason from those situations back into an ordered and normal life. Since I came to America I have found a bitterness, a resentment against the revolutionary development in Russia because of violence and anarchy and arbitrary conduct—a great deal more resentment against that than I found in my country here against bloody Monday under the Czar, and that long line of tyranny and abuse, and the use of the Cossack whip and sword over Russian peasants and workers that went on for generations. I find that the atrocities of the Bolsheviki, terrible and wrong and to be opposed by all intelligent and honest men, create more excitement and interest than the atrocities of the Czecho-Slovaks when they take a Bolshevik village and stand up and shoot the Bolsheviki without trial. The whole situation is full of a bitterness of wrong, of crime, of mad movements that have gotten away from reason and intelligence and law and order.

I would like to get to the heart of the whole situation, not to be the advocate of one side only, one group of feeling. I would like to have America's Senate committee, with the great responsibilities it has, comprehend the Russian revolution, the facts of it, its development, and what it now means and presages to the world, and then to make answer to the American people, so that there can be organized in America the intelligent conscience in both parties, in all parties, to make our Government at all points correspond to the growing purpose and need of the times, to answer that condition to which the President referred when he spoke of "this tide that was moving in the hearts of men." It is moving in the hearts of men, and mere resentment and passion will not answer it.

I would like to see the Christian forces of America organized to meet the challenge of the materialist, class conscious, socialist government of Russia with the real answer of a serving church, as I would like to see our Government answer with a serving state—the only effective answer; and, gentlemen, just merely taking Col. Lebedeff, who was a minister of Kerensky's government, who was thrown roughly out by the Bolsheviki, who naturally feels the resentment of his situation—taking his testimony on the one hand and not taking the whole situation—will not lead us to the truth.

I would like to get and I believe that you can get the truth of the Czecho-Slovak situation also. What is it? The Czecho-Slovaks were 60,000 as good soldiers as there are in the world—patriotic men, men who were forced to enlist by the Austrian power when they did not believe in that power, when they wanted to have free Bohemia. They allowed themselves to be taken prisoners in groups. They were taken prisoners in twos and tens and in hundreds. They came into Russia. They were armed and equipped by the Russian Army. They went on to the Ukraine front and they held it in splendidly courageous fashion. Then the Bolshevik revolution came over; bread, land, and peace, under the conditions I spoke of yesterday. They, the Czecho-Slovaks, were in resentment against any armistice; and why? Not only because of patriotism, not only because of honor, but because they wanted free Bohemia; and bread, land, and peace for Russia did not bring anything for the Czecho-Slovak soldier for liberty in Bohemia. It may have been bad for free Bohemia; it may have put it further away.

Then, after the armistice was signed, they wanted to go to fight in France, like courageous soldiers. It was agreed in conference in Moscow that the Czecho-Slovak corps should go by Murmansk to Archangel, with safe conduct of the soviet government, and in that event they would reach the French front in three weeks instead of in three months, as it would take the other way, with 6,000 miles across Russia, with transportation bad and food bad, then across the Japanese Sea, across Japan and the Pacific to America, and then across the Atlantic to the French front. The reason they were not sent by Murmansk and Archangel, if I know the truth, was because the French interest in Russia had determined that the soviet government should be overthrown at any hazard. The Czecho-Slovaks were sent the long way, through Siberia, and it was promised—and I saw the telegram from the Japanese consul and the French consul at Vladivostok—that as soon as they reached Vladivostok there should be transportation for those troops. About 15,000 reached Vladivostok without the firing of a single shot, in obedience with the safe conduct given by the soviet government.

There was no shipping, and the word came back to Moscow that the shipping was not there and would not be there, and there never was any intention of taking them out, but, on the contrary, they were being taken around through Manchuria and Siberia and were to aid Semenoff to attack and overthrow the soviet in Siberia and starve Moscow and Petrograd by controlling the Trans-Siberian Railway. Then the local soviets said, "What is this; are we sending Czecho-Slovaks out armed to come back and to overthrow our government? If Trotzky is fool enough to send them out, we won't do it. At least, we will disarm them." And they went down to the trains scattered along the Trans-Siberian Railroad and demanded that the arms be given up by the Czecho-Slovaks. They did not give them up, and I do not blame them. I would not have given them up. Then a clash occurred between an honest-purposed local soviet and the heroic-purposed Czecho-Slovaks, and you have the situation that grew out of those things, where the cards were not all on the table and will not be until the passion of this whole situation dies out and the truth is allowed to come forth.

Senator STERLING. In this very connection, may I read just a short paragraph from Col. Lebedeff's statement? [Reading:]

At the end of May I was sent to the Volga region and farther down to Uralsk as a special representative of the anti-Bolshevist forces, to organize the struggle. Right then the first encounter between the Czecho-Slovaks and the Red Army took place, in Penza and Rtischevo. It was a result of Trotzky's famous order to disarm the Czecho-Slovaks and to bar their way to Vladivostok. On June 8 the Czecho-Slovak units approached Samara. In spite of Trotzky's order and the opposition of the local Soviet the workmen of Syzran decided to let the Czecho-Slovaks pass. Part of the units proceeded to Samara. The majority of the Czecho-Slovaks had reached Ufa when a new order came from Trotzky—by all means to stop them in their march onward.

Mr. ROBINS. And that order came, as a matter of fact, after the rumors had come back, and after there was a claim of actual fact that the Czecho-Slovaks had turned back into the Semenoff forces, and I know—I do not guess; I know—that they had been transported as agreed and that the terms of the agreement were not kept by France and Japan, for I passed over 6,000 miles, and passed train after train of Czecho-Slovaks, sidetracked, in entire understanding of the situation at that time. Fifteen thousand of them were in Vladivostok when I got there. Then the movement took place, based on the fact of there not being shipping there for them. That created the suspicion of bad faith. Subsequent to that Trotzky then changed the order that he had made before from the basis of the transactions as alleged, and ordered that they should not go forward. That I believe to be the truth.

Senator STERLING. Then you agree substantially with the statement here?

Mr. ROBINS. No; I do not agree with that statement.

Senator STERLING. You do not agree with the statement that Trotzky issued the final order not to let them pass?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; but there is involved in that statement a pre-judgment of why he did it, with which I do not agree.

Senator STERLING. Do you dispute the statement that the workmen of Svzran decided to let the Czecho-Slovaks pass?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know the facts, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. Now, see if I understand you.

Senator STERLING. Just to follow up the question that I was about to ask before we got into this immediate Czecho-Slovak statement, quoting again from Lord Milner, he says:

The allies, every one of them, were most anxious to avoid interference in Russia, but it was an obligation of honor to save the Czecho-Slovaks, and it was a military necessity of the most urgent kind to prevent those vast portions of Russia which were struggling to escape the tyranny of the Bolshevik from being overrun by them and so thrown open as a source of supply to the enemy.

I say nothing of the enormous quantities of military stores, the property of the allies, which were still lying at Archangel and Vladivostok, and which were in course of being appropriated by the Bolsheviks and transferred to the Germans until the allied occupation put an end to the process.

I am reading this for the purpose of giving you the British viewpoint as to the reason for intervention and the occupation of Vladivostok and Archangel and the Murmansk coast with allied forces.

Mr. ROBINS. You give me the opinion of a British statesman of very great character and quality, intimately known as the same British statesman that favored the overthrow of the free Boers in South Africa and was recalled by a liberal government because of his well-known support of autocratic and dictatorial methods in dealing with other peoples for the advantage of English trade and commerce.

I ask that there be incorporated in the record, side by side with the statement of Lord Milner, the very competent and careful analysis of his statement in the Manchester Guardian, one of the most important papers of Great Britain, where it takes the whole situation and makes the other statement—the statement not for the particular group interested, as Lord Milner has always been, simply in the commercial advantage of Great Britain, but in the interest of the working and labor people of Great Britain, which is a directly opposite statement of conditions and facts.

Senator STERLING. I might say here that there is great room, I think, for difference of opinion as to Britain's course in South Africa and in the Boer War, and a great difference of opinion as to what was the best for civilization.

Mr. ROBINS. I agree with you, Senator.

Senator STERLING. You will agree with that, will you?

Mr. ROBINS. I will, Senator.

Senator STERLING. And that there are many men who will say, of course—candid men—that Great Britain's course was right in that respect.

Mr. ROBINS. Sincere men say that; yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. We have gotten a little far afield from what I wanted to ask—what I was leading up to—that is, that I understood you to think that Bolshevism is not only a menace to this country but a menace to the world?

Mr. ROBINS. I do, sir. I think it is the first challenge of the age to our social order.

Senator OVERMAN. I so understood you. Now, that being so, would you be in favor of this country recognizing a government that is such a menace to the world?

Mr. ROBINS. Senator, as I understand that, the question of recognition of a government does not rest upon the character of the government. If the government really is the government of a people, that is all that any foreign government has any right to inquire into. Recognition does not say that you approve of a government. Recognition is simply the acceptance of a fact. "Here is a de facto government. Therefore we recognize that for the purpose of inquiring into it, and working with it, and, if necessary, ultimately opposing it and going to war with it." The thing I would be opposed to, Senator, was to blind ourselves to actual facts in Russia, not to deal with the actual facts, not to inquire into them, but to prejudge the case and deal with it on a basis that does not exist.

Is it not true, Senator, that intervention in Russia, as adopted last July, rested upon a view of something as really existent in Russia that is now known not to have existed? Is it not true that Madam Botchkareva and others, perfectly sincere and honest, said to the government, "The whole of Russia is just waiting for this thing, this intervention by foreign troops. The whole of Russia will rise as one man." We have been there how many months, Senator? How many foreign rifles in how many parts of Russia are there? And yet what has happened? The people rose to resist, just as we would resist foreign aggression. We get the word that the Red army is stronger. We get the word that behind the Bolsheviks now have come the Mensheviks and the other social revolutionists of the right, saying, "We must protect our fatherland against foreign invasion." My whole contention is, Senator, that we are dealing with the disease in a wrong way, because we do not know what the disease is, as yet, and that our remedies are not calculated, when we get the facts in front of us, to cure the disease we are trying to combat.

Senator OVERMAN. This great old heroine, as you call her, who was here—certainly a patriot and a heroine—who fought the Czar for 32 years, and suffered in prison that long, has testified before this committee, saying "For God's sake, come over and help us. Our people are dying and they are starving; and so far as I am concerned give me the old régime of the Czar rather than the Bolshevik rule." Are we to pay no attention to her testimony?

Mr. ROBINS. Not at all, Senator. You are to consider her testimony and consider every other bit of testimony that you think is credible and sincere, and out of the sum of that testimony and out of the use of your own intelligence you are to make a report to the American people. I ask you, Senator, is it reasonable to believe that two men, just two men, standing against a government that is in power, by whatever means—German agents or otherwise, any way you please—shall take over power, that they shall absolutely absorb a whole national domestic culture and life, that they shall hold it for 14 months, that they shall hold it against foreign rifles, that they shall hold it against suffering and misery and terror of all kinds, and still hold it, and that it rests only on the foundations that have been indicated by some of the testimony here? I submit, Senators, it is not reasonable. I submit that there is more behind Soviet rule and the revolutionary government of Russia than has been suggested in a great deal of the testimony before this committee.

Senator OVERMAN. Could we have a better witness than this woman that you have praised so highly?

Mr. ROBINS. Senator, I should say you could have a better witness. I should say that any person who has spent 40 years in organizing a revolutionary movement, with great consecration and character, who has gone to village after village and said to the peasants, "You ought to have the land; it is yours; it does not belong to the landlords; you ought not to pay rent for it"; who has gone to workingmen and said to the workingmen in factories, "The factory belongs to you; your labor has created everything here; listen to this gospel of Marx, of the producers' rights as against the parasites"; who has distributed among them the communist manifesto—you know the formulas of the communist manifesto; it is the very foundation of class socialism—who has distributed among them "Das Capital," the Bible of the socialists, translated into Russian; and then, when this thing, this genie, this Frankenstein, has been raised up by 40 years of culture, this splendid old woman finds herself there in Petrograd trying to bolster up her friends, Kerensky and his government, and finds that this thing is a little radical for the allied cooperation, and Kerensky has to have loans from America to hold on, and then she begins and spends all her credit, all that she had, which was a very great credit, and these peasant revolutionary people said, "Why, the dear old grandmother told us this, and now she tells us 'No'; she must be getting old"; and then, when they do this thing that she had urged upon them to do and her government is thrown out, and she is a refugee and is in great terror that really in my judgment was not founded on fact—I saw her a number of times during this period, knew where she was; the soviet knew where she was—I was very much concerned for the old lady. I knew her and honored her when she was doing various things that might tend to stabilize the Kerensky government and oppose the Bolsheviks, and I finally said to Lenine, "What is your disposition toward Madame Breskovsky?" "Why," he said, "We have not any disposition toward her. She belongs in the picture gallery." I said, "She believes that the Red Guard will kill her if they find her." He said, "Absurd!"

He said, "If you want a platoon of soldiers to protect her you can have them, if you want to put them around her." He said, "The only danger she is to us is that she might get run over and killed, and if she did it would be charged against the soviet government." He then seriously said, "We will not allow her to be taking part in counterrevolutionary activities. If she starts a counterrevolution, and they try to use the past credit of the old woman, we shall, if necessary, imprison her." But there was absolutely no disposition to bother her at all as long as she was not used as a counter revolutionary force against the revolution. And if you ask for what I really think to-day, Senator, I would say that one of the most pathetic things in the world to my mind at this moment is that this splendid old woman, with her great record of revolutionary service, by reason of personal pique, by reason of a very terrible situation and discouragement, has turned so that she can unconsciously be used against the revolutionary movement in her own land that she helped to create and which seems to me to be fact at this hour.

Senator OVERMAN. In the course of our investigations, in addition to this dear old woman we have had American officials here—for instance, Dr. Huntington, whom you have praised, and we have had Dr. Simons, and we have had the officers of the National City Bank, and we have had the officers of the Harvester Co., all corroborating this old lady in what they say as to starvation and red-handed murder among those people. Now, that is the testimony we have. I suppose you have read it. Are they to be believed?

Mr. ROBINS. I have not read their testimony, Senator. So far as I know, the persons that you have suggested are reputable witnesses. I do not know, sir. The committee is free to judge of that.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee wants to be fair; it wants to be impartial, and it wants to be just. We have your testimony. Of course, we have great respect for you as a man of character and ability and honor, and with you Miss Bryant and two or three others; but on the other side here are Government officials, and these other people coming over here, who corroborate this old lady in what she says. We ought to pay respect to her and her testimony. The question before us is how to get at these facts. Of course, we want to get at the facts, and I do not know of anybody else that can give us the facts except these parties and yourself and others. You really left there—and do not know what occurred afterwards—a considerable time before these people left, and they speak of conditions as they saw them, and you speak of the conditions as you saw them. What transpired after you left you do not know?

Mr. ROBINS. Absolutely right, Senator.

Senator STERLING. Col. Robins, if you will permit me, it seems to me that there is this difference between you and Madame Breshkovsky, and your two viewpoints. Madame Breshkovsky, of course, is called the grandmother of the revolution, and she surely is a heroine.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir; she is entitled to it.

Senator STERLING. She is entitled to be called that. She spent 32 years in prison or in exile, according to her testimony.

Mr. ROBINS. That is absolutely true.

Senator STERLING. She was the leader of the socialists—the revolutionary socialist forces—and fought all these years to overthrow the government of the Czar, but now she sees the Bolshevik terror. She may have sown some of the seeds of it in her propaganda for revolution in Russia, unconsciously, in talking about socialism and the overthrow of the constituted powers. But now, when she sees what it involves, the terror involved, the cruelty involved, the starvation involved, the tyranny involved, in Bolshevik rule, she protests, and cries out for help, for allied help, for American help—for economic help and armed help, both—and you bow before the storm.

Mr. ROBINS. I do not think I bow before the storm.

Senator STERLING. That is the difference between the two.

Mr. ROBINS. It has not been my reputation to bow before any storm, Senator. I have caught more bricks than I have bouquets in my lifetime, straight through, and expect to until I am through with the world, but, Senator—

Senator STERLING. Well, I mean this: You understand, I think—

Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON. I think the witness has a right to respond to an imputation of that sort. I am not a member of this committee.

Senator OVERMAN. He has a right to respond, but if he does not object—

Mr. ROBINS. Not at all; I beg pardon.

Senator STERLING. I was simply explaining further what I meant by the question; that is all. I did not intend to interrupt the witness, except that I mean you would rather let the Bolshevik revolution run its course than to do something to stay it?

Mr. ROBINS. No, Senator; I would rather that the Russian people should run their course, and get the kind of government that they want, at considerable hazard and waste and cost, than that it should be changed by foreign rifles for the benefit of investments or for the benefit of advantage of one kind and another. That is an advantage, I think, secondary to the right of people to have their own government.

Senator STERLING. Do you not think you assume something there when you say such intervention would be simply for the sake of investments?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not think so, sir, for this reason. After the Brest-Litovsk peace was ratified on the 16th day of March, every allied military mission in Russia agreed in conference to help train the red army, as a sound action to protect the allied interests in Russia, working with Trotsky, and it is in the record, if the committee wishes to reach it. I know that after that time the request was made of this Government to send in the railroad mission on the basis that we could cooperate. I know that when intervention was begun by the Japanese, and the desant took place at Vladivostok, there was a conference in Vologda in which the allied ambassadors, all that were in Russia, and the allied military chiefs, sat in, and the judgment was against intervention, and that a recommendation against intervention was made to the several allied governments, and I have a record of that fact. Further than that, I know that when it was discussed in Russia, there was on the part of our friends and allies at that time, the French Government, the desire to overthrow the Bolshevik government because of their repudiation of foreign loans—a perfectly legitimate desire on their part, but not one in which I thought America should share.

Senator OVERMAN. Now, Colonel, I think we all agree with you that all people ought to have such a government as they want. The question in my mind is this: It has been testified here repeatedly that those people are terrorized; that they can not get the government they want; that they have been disarmed, and whenever they attempt to assert their opinion as to what sort of government they should have they are murdered, shot down; that the peasants have some of them risen up and asked for the soviet, as they want, or the Kerensky government, or such government as they want; that they have nothing to fight with; that they have absolutely risen with sticks and pitchforks, when they have been assaulted by the Trotsky people; that the Trotsky people have gone down into the soviets where the people were having their meetings to elect their representatives and when they elected their representatives the red army have gone into the meetings and overthrown the results of the meetings and elected their men instead of the men the people wanted. Now, what would you do in that situation? The people are not able, according to the testimony here, to have the government they want, because the arms, the machine guns and the rifles, are in the hands of these people, and they absolutely will not let them have the government they want. You do not indorse such a thing as that?

Mr. ROBINS. Of course not, Senator. The whole question is a question of fact.

Senator OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. Now, Senator, we have got 14 months of history behind us. This is the fact; that the revolution starts in Petrograd with the Bolsheviki, and they take possession of Petrograd with a very small fatality and wipe out the other provisional government with very little resistance; that the entire army, practically, from one end of it to the other, votes in its committees to support the soviet government; that province after province votes to support the soviet government; that down in the Ukraine, the Ukrainian rada opposes the soviet government, and there rises a peasant movement in the Ukraine that defeats the Ukrainian rada, that captures Kiev and Odessa and holds them until the Ukrainian rada, encouraged by us mistakenly, sells out to the German power and brings in foreign rifles to overcome the local resistance of the peasants of the Ukraine. It is true that up in Finland the white guard starts to come down against red guard opposition. We mistakenly support the white guard at that time, thinking that they are our friends because they seem to be nice people—and at least they are fighting the terrible red guard—until we learn that von der Goltz has come in with a division of German soldiers, and Mannerheim the white guard general writes a declaration speaking of the noble Kaiser and the noble German troops and urging upon Finland that it recognize the great debt of gratitude due to Germany; that in the strain of the present time she will send troops to help the white guard.

Senator NELSON. There you are mistaken. It was not Mannerheim; it was Kuehlman. Mannerheim is the man who is in charge now, and who is opposed to the Bolshevik government.

Mr. ROBINS. I am sorry, but I can show the Senator that it was Gen. Mannerheim, in charge of the White Guard, who wrote the declaration—I have a copy of it—in which he made his statement to the German general who had come in and made a protestation of fealty to him; and the Senator will know that under the White Guard control in Finland they elected a German prince as the King of Finland, and it was only after the failure of the German power that again the White Guard switched, and said, "We will work now with the English and the allies."

Senator NELSON. Mannerheim left the country for a while, came through Sweden, came through England to Paris, and was gone, and has only lately returned to the country.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. At the last account I saw of him he was at Stockholm. He was not in that movement that you speak of, at all.

Mr. ROBINS. On the contrary——

Senator NELSON. No, sir.

Mr. ROBINS. I am sorry, Senator, but you are mistaken.

Senator NELSON. He was not, at all.

Mr. ROBINS. I do not wish to——

Senator NELSON. And he did not have a hand in the movement to elect a German prince. He was opposed to it.

Mr. ROBINS. I am sorry, sir; but I think that when——

Senator NELSON. Well, I am sorry for you, sir. I am sorry for you, sir.

Mr. ROBINS. I may deserve the sympathy, Senator, and I regret it if I do; but you would not have me say anything I did not think was so.

Senator NELSON. Well, you would not have me say anything I did not think to be so, either.

Mr. ROBINS. I know you would not do it, Senator, and I think maybe you think the same of me, that I would not say anything consciously that I thought was not true, and you would not have me agree with a statement, if it was made, however honestly, if I thought it was not true. You would not have that, I know——

Senator NELSON. No.

Mr. ROBINS. Because you believe I am an honest man.

Senator OVERMAN. After all, it is a question of fact.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; it is, Senator.

Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON. May I ask you whether or not there is in existence a statement by Gen. Mannerheim, and whether or not it can be obtained?

Senator OVERMAN. We would like to have it.

Mr. ROBINS. There is such a statement here. I shall be very glad to furnish it to the committee.

Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON. Can it be obtained?

Mr. ROBINS. It can.

Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON. All right. May it be put in the record, Mr. Chairman?

Senator OVERMAN. Why, of course.

Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON. Then it will decide the question between Senator Nelson and the witness.

Mr. ROBINS. I will furnish it for the record.

[(The following three paragraphs constitute a statement furnished by Mr. Robins after the close of the hearings:)]

The welcome of Gen. Mannerheim, commander of the Finnish White Guards, to the German troops landing on Finnish soil, was published in the London Daily News, No. 22491, on April 11, 1918, in column 7 of page 3 of that paper. The authority given is a Reuter dispatch from Stockholm dated Wednesday, April 10, 1918. Gen. Mannerheim's statement as published follows:

At the request of the Finnish Government detachments of Germany's victorious and powerful army have landed on Finnish soil to help us drive out the Bolsheviks and their murderous adherents. I am convinced that this brotherhood in arms, which during the present struggle is being sealed with blood, will only serve to strengthen the friendship and confidence that Finland has always felt for Germany's great Kaiser and his mighty people. I hope that Finland's young army now fighting side by side with Germany's historic troops may become permeated with that iron discipline, perfect order, and lofty sense of duty which have served to create the greatness of Germany's army and which have led it on from victory to victory. In bidding Germany's brave warriors welcome to Finland, I therefore trust that every man in the Finnish Army will prove his appreciation of the great sacrifice which Germany's people are now making for our country at a time when every man is needed for their own country's war.

Confirming the accuracy of this Reuter dispatch, the fact is that I received about this time information in Russia that a statement substantially as quoted above had been issued by Gen. Mannerheim in welcoming the German troops. Upon receiving this information I communicated the substance of Gen. Mannerheim's statement to Hon. David R. Francis, the American ambassador to Russia, who was then at Vologda.]

Senator STERLING. May I just call your attention, Col. Robins, to a statement that was made by Madame Breshkovskaya in her testimony, just to get her viewpoint and her idea as to the needs of Russia? She was asked these questions [reading]:

Senator STERLING. Do you think a sufficient allied force in Russia would help to restore the constituent assembly to power and give you a democratic government?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Not only a large force of troops would help, but if committees would come to Russia and ask to have an assembly formed in Russia, it would help. If you had come to our help a year ago, perhaps 20,000 of your troops would have been sufficient. Now it will take 50,000; not less and perhaps more. Fifty thousand armed troops that would fight would help us to reestablish the constituent assembly.

Senator STERLING. Do you think, Madame, that an army of 15,000 or 20,000 allied troops would have prevented the establishment of a Bolshevik government in Moscow?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. I am sure of it. Even yesterday a Czecho-Slovak said to me that if they were not supported they could not hold out; they could not fight alone. The Russian people have no arms and the Bolsheviks would be sure to get through into Ukrainia, and with the aid of the German troops they would go straight through the country. If you put a million troops in a place and they did nothing, they would not be as good as 50,000 troops who could fight. If you get 50,000 troops that will fight, that will be enough.

Senator STERLING. Do you think such troops would be welcomed by all but the Bolsheviks?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Certainly, if they asked for them a year ago. They are crying, "Save us. Come and defeat the Bolsheviks, for we can not exist. There is no work in Russia."

Senator STERLING. Suppose this Bolshevik rule goes on, and as a result of Bolshevik rule there is disorder and chaos in Russia, will it not lead eventually to the domination of Russia by Germany?

Mrs. BRESHKOVSKAYA. Certainly.

MR. ROBINS. The last conclusion I agree with—the only one of the statement. Senator, is that greatly different from what Madame Botchkareva said? Did we not act in a sense on that basis, and have we not had a rather poor story as the consequence of acting on that sort of testimony?

Senator STERLING. I do not know what Madame Botchkareva said. I did not hear her testimony.

MR. ROBINS. Senator, may I ask, did Madame Breshkovskaya say that she would like to have allied troops and French and Japanese in Russia?

Senator STERLING. She does not say that she would like to have Japanese in Russia.

MR. ROBINS. Would the Senator agree with the suggestion that the international situation would not permit any one nation to go in and deal with the situation; that intervention has always involved a cooperation with the Japanese by reason of proximity and interest; and that because of that, any intervention that did have Japanese troops with it immediately raises the boldest, most historic resentment, and the national and race hatred that exists in Russia and unites around the standard of Russia, even Soviet Bolshevik Russia, all those who have the ancient, historic opposition to yellow domination in Russia?

Senator STERLING. I think this, Col. Robins, in regard to that, that the Russian people would have faith in the assurances of the other allied powers in regard to Japan and as to how far Japan might go. I think they would have faith, if the representation was properly made and made by the right kind of people, in the statement that Japan should not, by means of her help in Russia, acquire territory or extend her sphere of influence in Russia beyond what it is already. I think the allied powers would give such assurances.

MR. ROBINS. Is the Senator familiar with the claim that has been made in Russia that already the mineral region of the Amur has been turned over to the Japanese, and that that is one basis of a very considerable culture in Russia against any further surrender to any sort of allied intervention?

Senator STERLING. No: I am not familiar with that at all.

MR. ROBINS. I think the Senator can be familiar with that if he wishes.

Senator OVERMAN. You may proceed, Maj. Humes. I am sorry we got off on this subject, but it is very interesting.

MR. HUMES. You have referred to counter-revolutionary movements. Is it not a fact that counter-revolution in Russia, as viewed by the existing government, means any government opposed to the Bolshevik rule rather than a government intended to restore the old régime or to interfere with the March revolution? Is not that a fact?

MR. ROBINS. The answer to that, if I know the answer, Mr. Humes, is something like this. The situation is a situation of reality rather than of words. Every group that has achieved any sort of opposition to the Bolsheviks, no matter what it has called itself at the start, has finished under the domination of a semidictatorship that represented, when it was analyzed, the old régime. Take, for instance, the movement at Ufa, in which Nicholas Aksentieff and Tchernoff and certain others of the social revolutionists of the right formed a provisional government, and then in a night, as they claim—I have Aksentieff's statement for it—reactionaries under Kolchak took possession. We know what Admiral Kolchak was under the old régime, those of us who wish to know. We know what it means. We know what Denechine means in the south. It means exactly the same thing, the return of the old order, even though it be claimed to mean every nice and attractive thing; and the situation in revolutionary Russia is that the real interest behind these movements is the old order, and that is the reason why "Save the revolution; all power to the soviet" creates such a unity in the Russian revolutionary mind against foreign intervention.

Mr. HUMES. In other words, the Bolshevik government uses as its slogan "Save the revolution" as propaganda to defeat any movement, even though it be revolutionary in its nature, that is opposed to another control than the Bolshevik control?

Mr. ROBINS. That is just exactly what I did not say, Mr. Humes.

Mr. HUMES. That is what I understood you to say.

Mr. ROBINS. I am sorry.

Mr. HUMES. Is not that a fact?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; I do not think it to be a fact.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that the Bolshevik government has disarmed all elements of the population who are not in accord with the Bolshevik rule, as distinguished, now, from the soviet—the political party as distinguished from the so-called form of government?

Mr. ROBINS. Wherever they have met opposition, wherever there have been movements that have been called, whether rightly or not, counter-revolutions, and they have taken possession of that movement, as they have in countless instances, they have disarmed the participants in it.

Mr. HUMES. Yes; and at the present time the Bolshevik party and the controlling element control all of the rifles and all of the firearms and all of the ammunition that is available in Russia, do they not?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know. On the contrary, I have heard that several of the soviets since the cooperation of the Mensheviks and social revolutionists of the right, which grew out of the intervention movement—some of the local soviets are Menshevik and are not Bolshevik at the present moment. I do not know whether that is true or not.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that those who are advocating the cause of the Mensheviks are looked upon as counter-revolutionists by the Bolsheviks?

Mr. ROBINS. On the contrary, the Mensheviks, as I understand it now, are in alliance with the Bolsheviks and are sharing in the government. If we could ascertain the facts, we would know whether that is so or not. I do not know whether it is so, but I have seen enough of statements to that effect for me to begin to believe it.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that the press of Russia, all of the press of Russia that is not supporting the Bolsheviks, has been suppressed?

Mr. ROBINS. Well, it was not the fact when I was in Russia. It was the fact when I was in Russia that at certain periods of real disturbance and excitement under the Kerensky government they suppressed all opposition to the Kerensky government; and there was also a time later, when the Bolsheviks took power, for three weeks or so, that they suppressed all opposition to the Bolsheviks. Then, one by one, the other papers came back, and when I left Russia there were in daily publication in Moscow the Noshe Slovo and other papers which are bitterly opposed to the Bolsheviks in their leading editorials every day. I had my translating force give me the whole reaction from the opposition press day by day, and I have those translations, most of them, in this country now.

MR. HUMES. Mr. Albert Rhys Williams, of whom I presume you know—

MR. ROBINS. I know of him; yes, sir.

MR. HUMES. He admits, and admitted here on the stand, that the press had been suppressed. Can you conceive that that admission would have been made by him if it was not a fact?

MR. ROBINS. I would not try to conceive in regard to any of the mental operations of Mr. Williams at all.

MR. HUMES. Do you know of your own knowledge what the situation is with reference to the press since you left Russia?

MR. ROBINS. I do not, sir, except this—with just this qualification—that Maj. Allen Wardwell brought out with him a number of papers, some of which I have seen, some of them along as late as the 1st of October—issues of the opposition press in Russia.

MR. HUMES. Is it not a fact that even in the constitution of the soviet republic and in the decrees that have been issued, the freedom of the press is denied and justified?

MR. ROBINS. That the suppression of the press, or what they call the counter-revolutionary press, was justified in public statement by certain immediate decrees that were not permanent, is absolutely true so far as I know.

MR. HUMES. Even the constitution, which I assume is somewhat fundamental, provides for a suppressed press, does it not?

MR. ROBINS. I do not think so, sir.

MR. HUMES. You have read that constitution?

MR. ROBINS. Yes.

MR. HUMES. Does not that constitution provide that all of the newspapers of the republic or of the country shall be nationalized and become the property of the government itself, together with all of the facilities necessary to the publication of public prints?

MR. ROBINS. In the inception of the government that resolution was passed.

MR. HUMES. And it was deemed a part of the so-called fundamental law, was it not?

MR. ROBINS. I do not understand that to be true.

MR. HUMES. Section 14, provision 2—I will not take the time to read it—covers that subject.

MR. ROBINS. What I think counsel is reading from is certain decrees thrown together and said to be the constitution. Counsel can get the actual constitution. It was published, if I am correct, in the New York Tribune in the first instance in this country, and I think other authenticated copies have been extant. There have been a number of publications, Mr. Chairman, of alleged constitutions of the soviet republic which embodied a number of decrees, and people eager to get out with an issue have said this was the constitution, when they had really the special decrees either of the executive committee or of the commissars' council, and sometimes mixed those decrees with the definite constitution of the 5th of July—or whatever time it was in July—1918.

Mr. HUMES. Col. Robins, you need not discuss that, because I have a copy of the constitution printed in Moscow, published by the department of foreign political literature of the people's commissariat for foreign affairs, Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic.

Mr. ROBINS. What time?

Mr. HUMES. 1918.

Mr. ROBINS. Do you know what time it was?

Mr. HUMES. The date on this is Moscow, 1918, and it says: "Published by the department of foreign political literature of the people's commissariat," and we have a right to assume that their official publications are authentic.

Mr. ROBINS. Of course, what we are really after is the facts. The little pamphlet that the counsel holds in his hand, if I am correct, is one that was published before I left Russia, and was brought out—some of them, I think—by Mr. Williams. That was before the actual constitution of the soviet was passed, and it is simply a collection of decrees passed by the executive committee.

Mr. HUMES. When was the constitution finally adopted, then?

Mr. ROBINS. So far as my knowledge goes, it was adopted some time in July, 1918, and as I understand from comparison of several copies, in which there are some differences, the largest agreement seemed to me in the one published in a certain Sunday issue of the New York Tribune. I will send counsel a copy of it.

Mr. HUMES. The man who came to this country or proposed to come to this country as consul general of the soviet government, and Mr. Albert Rhys Williams who came to this country for the purpose of establishing a Russian information bureau, both of whom say that this is the constitution of the soviet republic, are in error, and these quasi-official representatives of the soviet government lack authentic information as to what the fundamental law is in Russia at this time, and have not as much information on that subject, apparently, as you have, Colonel?

Mr. ROBINS. Now, Mr. Humes, I do not want to claim any special wisdom here, and I meet these dignities and authorities that you have given my friends—if they be my friends—thus suddenly, and I may be found in variance with their statements, as I may be found in variance with the statements of others; but I shall make the statement that I think to be true, under the pains and penalties of perjury here, and keep on making that statement, and I can not be led into making any statement but what I think is true, without regard to the statements made by others, whether they be friends and allies or not.

Mr. HUMES. Do not misunderstand me. I am trying to find out what the constitution of the soviet is.

Mr. ROBINS. I am trying to tell you where you can get it.

Mr. HUMES. Both Mr. Reed and Mr. Williams produced here a publication from Moscow, published under the authority of the commissariat of the Russian republic, and they say that that is the constitution. Now, you tell us that if we are seeking the facts of the constitution we will have to resort to the New York Tribune for something that is more authentic than the publication from Moscow that they have presented as an authentic document. I am simply trying to ascertain just what this fundamental law is and what your authority is for saying that the constitution printed in the New York Tribune is more authentic than the one that has been produced by the quasi-official representatives, at least, of the Bolshevik government.

Mr. ROBINS. If you will ask me that, I will tell you quite frankly that the constitution as published in the New York Tribune was the constitution adopted by an all-Russian national soviet in, as I understand it, the early part of July, and this was a combination of decrees of the executive committee, and otherwise, and some decrees passed by previous assemblies, and published for the purpose of propaganda.

Mr. HUMES. Now, what all-Russian soviet was that, by number?

Mr. ROBINS. Five.

Mr. HUMES. Five. Then I will call your attention to the fact that this is that constitution. It is headed "Decision of the fifth all-Russian convention of soviets, adopted at the session of July 10, 1918."

Mr. ROBINS. Then I was simply mistaken in the looks of that pamphlet as I have seen it, looking at it from over here. I have not seen it closer. Will you let me look at it over here, because there was a pamphlet of that sort distributed. [After examining pamphlet.] This is not the pamphlet that I thought it was, and is the other pamphlet, and I believe, so far as I can see it by just looking it over, that it is the same that I spoke of as published in the Tribune.

Mr. HUMES. I thought that I was not in error when I was using it as an authentic document.

Senator NELSON. Read the part that pertains to the press there in it.

Mr. HUMES (reading):

14. For the purpose of securing for the toilers real freedom of expression of their opinions the R. S. F. S. R. abolishes the dependence of the press upon capital and places in the hands of the working class and of the poorer elements of the peasantry all technical and material means for publication of newspapers, pamphlets, books, and all other press productions, and secures their free circulation throughout the country.

That is one provision. Then, here is another:

23. Guided by the interests of the working class as a whole, the R. S. F. S. R. deprives individuals and separate groups of any rights which they may be using to the detriment of the Socialist Revolution.

Now, is not that the taking over by the government of the press of the country; and, pursuant to that, did the government not seize all of the presses and all of the things necessary to the printing of publications of various kinds, and in effect nationalize them?

Mr. ROBINS. Mr. Humes, there are two questions there. The first question is whether or not the one provision provides for nationalization of the press. I understand that it does, as it provides for the nationalization of everything under the particular formulas of socialism that mark the government. That the actual result of that is to suppress freedom of expression or protest against the Bolsheviks is absolutely untrue, based on past experience, unless it is changed since I left there. The bitterest and most savage attack that I heard against the Bolsheviks in Russia was the attack of the social revolutionists of the Left, a party constituent of the government that accepts the soviet but utterly rejects the Bolshevik party as such, and is contending for control of the soviet against the Bolshevik party. There were seven such parties—seven parties in the soviet—and those seven parties had organs, and they spoke in contest, one with another, on principles and methods, and all claimed to be revolutionary and claimed to be in favor of the soviet.

Mr. HUMES. You, of course, have no knowledge as to what has been done with the press since you left there last June?

Mr. ROBINS. I have not, except I have these several issues of the papers that I spoke of as having been brought out, which are in opposition to the Bolsheviks.

Mr. HUMES. The testimony which has been produced to this committee by those who are defending the Bolsheviks, as well as by those who were not in sympathy with their activities, in so far as it affected conditions as they existed last fall, in October, November, and December, was uniformly to the effect that there was no freedom of press and no freedom of speech; that no newspaper was permitted, except those that were controlled and dominated by the Bolshevik government. Have you any authentic or personal information contrary to that information which has come to the committee with complete unanimity from every witness?

Mr. ROBINS. I have translations from the newspapers in Russia for a period after I left, and statements in relation to opposition papers, of their having been fined 10,000 roubles and 25,000 roubles, and other numbers of roubles, for printing what the court, or whatever the authority was, said were false statements of fact, calculated to betray the minds of the people in Russia; showing that if they fined them so many rubles for publishing the statement, for which they were fined, they must have been in publication at that time.

Mr. HUMES. During what period of time was that?

Mr. ROBINS. Well, if I am to go to it, I will try and find one of them here.

Mr. HUMES. I do not mean by exact dates, but by months, say?

Mr. ROBINS. June and July.

Mr. HUMES. June and July.

Mr. ROBINS. And the latter part of May, after I had left.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not probable that a procedure of that kind was a preliminary step in the suppression of the freedom of the press, as the imposing of severe penalties is probably one of the most effective methods of putting a newspaper out of commission?

Mr. ROBINS. Of course you can make the argument and the deduction. It is open to one.

Mr. HUMES. Well, is it?

Mr. ROBINS. Is it?

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a logical deduction?

Mr. ROBINS. I should not say so. I should think if they had the power and wanted to keep the paper from being published they would keep it from being published. They had the power.

Mr. HUMES. Then we must assume this, that if the newspapers were being fined for publications that were being made of false statements of fact, there was at least as stringent a limitation placed upon the freedom of the press as is being complained about in this country under existing laws?

MR. ROBINS. Was it not rather interesting that you should get there, Mr. Humes? As a matter of fact, the suppression of some papers in America—and I am in favor of the suppression of any newspapers that counsel force as soon as they have done so—the suppression of certain papers for no reason at all has taken place in our country, and there are those who are full of question and resentment about it; and the suppression of the press in time of struggle and conflict is no new thing in the story of men. I do not know just what you are after in this inquiry, but really, where does it lead us? What is the point in view?

MR. HUMES. One of the continual contentions of those who are defending Bolshevism in this country to-day is that we have not the freedom of press and the freedom of speech in this country, and Bolshevism is pointed to as one of the remedies for this alleged evil that we are meeting with in this country. Now, is it not a fact that the Bolshevism that is being defended by these same agitators in this country is adopting even more drastic methods to suppress the press and to suppress freedom of speech than have been ever undertaken in this country?

MR. ROBINS. My own belief about that is that that question involves a statement that is true. But may I say this? You are mistaken in the witness if you want anybody to defend the Bolshevik program, and I shall not be put in any such position. I have never defended it and never shall, but I opposed it steadily in Russia. I did my best to see that it did not get a foothold. Then after it got a foothold I did my best to see that it be not used so that Russia would be turned over to the German power. I did my best to get the national and international interests of the allies protected in that position. I simply refused, and shall refuse steadily, to libel anybody, and to say that I saw things that, honestly and frankly, I did not see. I may be entirely unintelligent; I may not know anything about it; but I am going to state the facts as honestly as I can, as I know them to be, and have been doing so; and you will not have any real success in trying to have me defend the Bolshevik government, nor will you have any real success in having me criticize people who have made statements differing from mine. They are responsible for their statements, and I hope they have told the truth; and they are as much concerned as or more concerned than I myself; and whether this be Madame Breshkovky [Breshkovskaya] or Mr. Williams, who has made statements different from mine, I do not care. I am not in their position nor responsible for their statements.

MR. HUMES. Do not misunderstand me. We are not seeking to put you in any position.

MR. ROBINS. Yes, Mr. Humes.

MR. HUMES. We are seeking the facts. For instance, I have before me what has become an official publication of the Bolshevik activity in this country. It contains many statements of fact, or alleged statements of fact, presented to the people of this country for the purpose of trying to convince them as to the condition of affairs that exists in Russia. Among other things, Mr. Williams declares that we are without freedom of press or freedom of speech in this country, and the Bolsheviks guarantee that thing which we lack in this country. I want to determine, if I can, whether or not Mr. Williams in his propaganda is giving the people of this country a true comparison of the relative positions of this Government and the Bolshevik government.

Mr. ROBINS. I am sorry that I can not agree with the statement or with the conclusion; and if I am in error Mr. Williams is right, and if Mr. Williams is in error I am right; but I know of no justification for that statement.

Mr. HUMES. Col. Robins, why, if you know, is there a discrimination between the representation that is accorded to the workingmen in the soviet in Russia and the representation allowed to the peasants, who are the large and predominating proportion in the population?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not understand that that is true, as any fixed rule.

Mr. HUMES. The constitution provides that the representation in the soviet in the cities and among the workmen shall be 1 to every 25,000, while in the provincial districts and among the peasants the representation in the soviet is only 1 to every 125,000.

Do you know from your knowledge of the situation in Russia why that discrimination was made and as to whether or not the attitude of the peasants against the Bolshevik rule was responsible for the insertion of that provision in the constitution which gives the peasants less representation than those in the city districts?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not; but I think I know this, that the Fourth All-Russian Soviet contained a majority of peasant delegates, and that the peasant delegates were in a majority in favor of ratification and the workingmen's delegates from the factories were in majority against ratification, and the Fourth All-Russian Soviet, instead of being dominated by the workingmen, was, in my judgment of the facts, dominated by the peasant delegates.

Mr. HUMES. What was the situation in the Fifth All-Russian Soviet?

Mr. ROBINS. That took place after I left, and I can not answer.

Mr. HUMES. It was the Fifth All-Russian Council that adopted this constitution.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; as I understand.

Mr. HUMES. Yes.

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know what the situation was there.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not your opinion, from your knowledge of the situation, that the discrimination was made in order to prevent the peasants from controlling, to a considerable degree, the Bolshevik government, and to preserve the power of the Bolsheviks in Petrograd and Moscow and a few of the cities; in other words, to permit that 9 per cent to dominate the 84 per cent?

Mr. ROBINS. Not in my judgment. But I wish to say that I have no special wisdom, here. I should say that the reason for it was that on the basis of producers' social control, which is the theory, as I understand it, of the soviet organization, the representation in regard to crafts, in regard to occupational production in manufactures, which is more diversified and represents a less number for a single production than the general agricultural peasant production, accounts for larger representation of persons on smaller basis of number in the industrial districts as against the peasant districts.

The soviet, as I understand it, is not based on any idea of necessarily one person for so many other persons, but one person for so many persons engaged in a craft or engaged in a particular production, and the effort of the soviet program, as I understand it, was to have adequate representation of all of the producing forces in the economic life of Russia that help to feed and clothe and house the people. Whether it was worked out or not I do not know.

Mr. HUMES. The constitution provides as follows:

25. The All-Russian Convention of Soviets is formed of representatives of the Soviets of the cities on the basis of one deputy for 25,000 electors, and of representatives of the provincial ("gubernia") conventions of Soviets on the basis of one deputy for 125,000 inhabitants.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; I remember your reading that statement a little while ago.

Mr. HUMES. Now, is it not a fact that the 9 per cent of the people in the cities absolutely dominate the present Bolshevik government, and by force of arms and by use of the Red Guard and terrorism in the rural districts force the peasants to submit to a continuance of that government?

Mr. ROBINS. What made the condition at the time I do not know, but up to the time I left Russia I do not consider that to be true.

Mr. HUMES. You have no knowledge of that condition since last June?

Mr. ROBINS. None that is secure.

Mr. HUMES. In your work in Russia, is it or is it not a fact that you used an interpreter?

Mr. ROBINS. It is so.

Mr. HUMES. Do you speak Russian?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; only a very limited vocabulary.

Mr. HUMES. Then the information you got and the conversation which you had at various times with Russians and those who could not speak English was through an interpreter?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. Who was that interpreter?

Mr. ROBINS. Alexander Gumberg.

Mr. HUMES. Is it not a fact that this interpreter was connected with the Bolshevik government?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; he was never at any time connected with the Bolshevik government.

Mr. HUMES. Did he have a brother who was one of the commissars?

Mr. ROBINS. He had a brother, Zoren, who was a commissar of the northern commune of the Bolshevik government. He had a brother who was a Menshevik, one of the provisional Kerensky government, who was arrested when the Bolsheviki took power, and we had to exercise our influence to protect him, because he, in the Ukraine, led in a counter-revolutionary movement, so-called.

He had one brother who was a Bolshevik, and he had another brother who was a Menshevik, and he was himself a Menshevik in politics.

Mr. HUMES. Yesterday, Col. Robins, you referred to the Root mission and to the unfortunate publicity that had been given to a certain statement made in the American press as to the character of Mr.

Root and his affiliations and his purposes. What was the nature of those publications in this country that were cited in Russia and used as the basis of that propaganda?

Mr. ROBINS. It is desired by the committee that I should answer that question?

Senator OVERMAN. If you do not desire to answer it, you need not do so.

Mr. ROBINS. I will do just as the committee wishes. It brings in an extra-local situation that, personally, I should think really would not serve the purposes of the committee, but if the committee rules the other way, I shall, of course, answer the question.

Senator OVERMAN. If you do not want to answer it I shall not force you to do it.

Mr. ROBINS. Thank you, Senator. Before we leave the question of my interpreter, I wish to submit and have filed in the record the following letters. [Reading:]

SPECIAL DIPLOMATIC MISSION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Petrograd, June 26, July 9, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. STEVENS: I have asked Mr. Alex. Gumberg, whose card I inclose, to be sure to see you before you leave Petrograd.

Mr. Gumberg has been of greatest possible assistance to us in our part of the work here, and has been so intelligent, kindly, and helpful that I feel I ought to put you in a position to avail yourself of his interest in case an occasion should arise.

Mr. Gumberg is a patriotic Russian, has been fourteen years in America, and has a most thorough understanding of the situation in both countries.

I beg for him your kindly attention.

Yours, very truly,

CHARLES EDWARD RUSSELL.

HON. JOHN F. STEVENS,

Chairman Advisory Commission of Railway Experts, Petrograd.

Mr. Russell was a member of the United States Mission to Russia. Mr. Gumberg served him as interpreter, and served the mission, and secured through the Petrograd Soviet an agreement to accept help from the United States which might not otherwise have been given to the Kerensky government. It is a matter of history. The original letters can be produced before the committee at any time. I present a copy at this time, which I have read into the record.

I present another letter. [Reading:]

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS, MOSCOW OFFICE,
Moscow, May 14, 1918.

Mr. MELVILLE STONE,

The Associated Press, 51 Chambers Street, New York City.

MY DEAR MR. STONE: This letter will introduce Mr. Alexander Gumberg, who is to take charge of the Petrograd Telegraph Agency's interests in the United States, and whom I am sure you will enjoy knowing. Mr. Gumberg is the personal friend of Mr. Lenine, Mr. Trotzky, and scores of the other leaders in the Russian Government, and has rendered great services to the United States, through bringing Americans in touch with the heads of the Soviet Government at a time when official relations were badly strained. Mr. Gumberg has been in Russia for the last year. He was of great assistance to the Root mission, and after the collapse of the Kerensky government became the medium through which the American Embassy kept in touch with the new government. He was identified with the American Red Cross, which was the organization here under the direction of Col. Robins that unofficially dealt with the Soviet Government on behalf of the embassy.

I am under deep obligation to Mr. Gumberg for the assistance he rendered our bureau here and in Petrograd and wish to commend him to you as a man with fuller knowledge than anyone I know concerning Russia's history for the last year and worthy of your complete confidence.

Very sincerely, yours,

CHARLES STEPHENSON SMITH.

Introducing Mr. Alexander Gumberg.

Mr. Smith was the head of the Associated Press in Petrograd, who had been head of the Associated Press in the Far East, in Peking, for a number of years; a man of middle years, Senators, and a man of very real discrimination, as you may imagine, to have held that long service in the Associated Press. I submit this copy of that letter.

I submit here another letter. [Reading:]

THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION,
THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
RUSSIAN PRESS DIVISION,
Petrograd, Russia, January 10, 1918.

GRAHAM R. TAYLOR, Manager.

Gorokhovaia 4, Apt. 14, Tel. 43-18:

This is to certify that Alexander Gumberg is an authorized representative of the Russian Press Division of the Committee on Public Information of the United States of America. Courtesies extended to him in the matter of news gathering will be appreciated.

RUSSIAN PRESS DIVISION,
COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION,
ARTHUR BULLARD, Director.

I state that I have seen and can produce the originals of each of these letters, and I declare them to be true and genuine originals. Senator OVERMAN. They will be put in the record.

Mr. ROBINS. I offer another letter. [Reading:]

"Memo. of agreement between

Edgar G. Sisson, Committee on Public Information, and Alexander Gumberg

Edgar G. Sisson offers and Alexander Gumberg accepts for his services in the matter of organization of the distribution of the motion pictures and the bulletin publications of the Committee on Public Information in Russia for such period as may be required by Edgar G. Sisson, provided it is not longer than the stay of Lieut. Col. Raymond Robins in Russia, the sum of $5,000, to be placed to his (Alexander Gumberg's) credit in New York City.

ALEX. GUMBERG.

EDGAR G. SISSON.

PETROGRAD, January 21, 1918.

May I make the statement that the services of this Russian, Alexander Gumberg, and the character of those services, under stress and under fire, were such as to make that man, in my judgment, the most serviceable single Russian person in the most difficult days of the Russian situation? I brought him out to the United States with me. I am behind him with full support and credit at all times, and ready to appear before this body or any proper body of the United States, or its courts, in defense of his patriotism, in defense of his genuine, manly service; and when, sirs, he was attacked, after I came out here, as a German agent, by lying statements that did not dare to see the light, I challenged those persons who sought to discredit him that I be called upon, or in the courts to be called upon, to test the matter; and those lying, cowardly slanders ran back into the dark. It was said to me, "Robins, you are safe. You are strong, in spite of the propaganda to discredit you; that is, in spite of all said against you, you can survive; but ditch this little Jew. There is some question about him." I said, "Not in seven thousand years. I am not built on that principle." And I think, Mr. Chairman, that you are not built on it, nor are any of you three in this committee.

That little Jew went through fire with me. That little Jew lay on his belly when machine-gun bullets went into the wall above us and all around us. That little Jew stood up on the fender of my automobile when we were surrounded by the pro-German anarchists, armed with bayoneted guns and magazine pistols, who came from that headquarters where when it was raided were found the German machine guns not found elsewhere in Russia; that little Jew looked down on cocked rifles and, with a gun pushed against his belly, grinned, and said to the anarchist thieves: "You are not afraid, are you?" and I am with him to the end of the road. [Applause.]

Senator OVERMAN. Let us have order in here, ladies and gentlemen.

Mr. HUMES. I did not know that anyone was making an attack.

Mr. ROBINS. I do not lay anything against you, Mr. Humes, but there were three specific charges——

Senator OVERMAN. There is no attack that has been made in this committee that I have heard.

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; but there was a suggestion of an attack in Mr. Humes's statement that an alleged pro-Bolshevik was my interpreter, and the inference was perfectly apparent, Mr. Chairman, that I had apparently got misinformation and was acting on misinformation. I have been pretty careful in the day's work. My own life and the lives of men worth a great deal more than mine, who were engaged in this work, were involved, and large supplies, and so far as known, not a single dollar's worth of supplies ever reached Germany, that we had in Russia. They were all distributed there to the Russian people. The American Red Cross distributed 400,000 cans of milk to starving babies in Russia, and it was done at a time when it was believed that the Germans would get there and take it before it could be distributed.

Senator OVERMAN. There is nothing in the record against Mr. Gumberg, that I have heard of.

Mr. HUMES. It is a fact, however, that the information you got from Russian sources you were compelled to get through an interpreter, and that you did not have the advantage and the facility of being able to converse directly with the Russians with whom you came in contact?

Mr. ROBINS. Quite true.

Mr. HUMES. And to that extent you labored under a handicap that those who were familiar with the Russian language did not labor under in conversing with the Russians with whom they came in contact, is not that correct?

Mr. ROBINS. Certainly.

Mr. HUMES. That is the only point I had in mind.

Mr. ROBINS. Will Mr. Humes also refer to the fact that Madame Lebedeff, the daughter of Prince Kropotkin, was my interpreter, and my aid and most confidential adviser through a long period of my stay in Russia, and probably her interpretation would not be adverse to some of the positions that have been taken contrary to my position here.

Senator STERLING. Was she related to Col. Lebedeff?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; she is in no way related to Col. Lebedeff.

Mr. HUMES. Is it my understanding that the committee does not care to go into any of the propaganda in connection with the Root mission?

Senator OVERMAN. No. He has a reason—I suppose a good reason—for not wanting to answer any questions of that kind. You can ask any question you want to, and if he declines to answer it, I will rule upon it.

Mr. HUMES. The witness yesterday made a statement that the work of the Root mission was very much handicapped because of the misimpression that got into Russia as to the standing and character of the head of that mission, and as to the purpose which had led him to undertake the work of a mission in Russia, and it was my purpose to find out what the influences were that had worked so prejudicially, and I do not suppose that we can very well go into that matter unless we undertake to uncover these activities.

Senator OVERMAN. You might ask him the question, and if he does not want to answer, I would not want to go into it.

Mr. HUMES. There is nothing, unless an answer to that question would develop it. I do not know what the answer would be, what the influences were, the American influences, the German influences, or some foreign influence. Consequently I am not able to determine whether there is any proper line of inquiry beyond that or not.

Senator STERLING. It is my understanding, Mr. Chairman, that the inquiry of Mr. Humes just related to the publication, if I remember it.

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; he asked what the publications—my statement was simple, and I think rather clear, that in a certain controversy in America that had preceded the Root mission, Mr. Root had taken a position that had brought upon him the condemnation of a powerful public personage in America, and there had followed certain publications, as the result of that situation, that criticized Mr. Root in a very unattractive fashion and were particularly hurtful, in the Russian revolutionary movement, to cooperation between America and Russia.

Senator NELSON. To bring you point-blank to it, was not that in the New York American? We need not hedge. Were not those cartoons that vilified Mr. Root in that publication?

Mr. ROBINS. No, Senator; I think they were not.

Senator STERLING. Would you be at liberty to say in what paper, or what papers?

Mr. ROBINS. I would rather not. I will do so if the committee desires.

Senator OVERMAN. I do not think that is necessary. The truth about it is that there were such statements.

Mr. ROBINS. And they were distributed in Russia. That is the real, vital thing.

Mr. HUMES. Col. Robins, let us pass over the American source of this material. How and by whom were these articles distributed in Russia?

Mr. ROBINS. That I do not know, sir, further than that they were distributed; and my own judgment was that it was pro-German stuff and was distributed ahead of the mission and behind the mission, in order to discredit those that came with the American mission, so that relationship between America and Russia would be less possible.

Mr. HUMES. Then these publications in this country were utilized as pro-German propaganda in Russia for the purpose of defeating the purpose of these men and the work undertaken by the Root mission?

Mr. ROBINS. I should say that would be so.

Mr. HUMES. It took that form.

Senator STERLING. Do you not think, with that view of that, that we are entitled to know the name of the paper that published those cartoons?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir. It will be within the purview of the committee to get all the facts. I do not know why Mr. Humes wants me to make a statement. I have at all points of this situation sought to avoid personalities. I have been in the position of trying to avoid condemning anybody. I have tried to tell the truth. Naturally, in such an investigation as this blame does fall somewhere or other. The moment the committee wants me to bring in individuals and personalities, where I have spoken of things as they exist in Russia, we are extremely apt to do something else than to inquire into the matters that we are engaged on.

Senator OVERMAN. That is the reason I ruled it out. I do not think it ought to be put in if the witness objects.

Mr. HUMES. That is all.

Senator STERLING. Col. Robins, let me ask you this question. It is somewhat hypothetical, I grant, but I would like to ask it and have your view. If resistance to the Czecho-Slovaks was inspired by Germany; if released German prisoners participated therein; if Bolshevik troops were officered by Germans; if following the collapse of the Russian Army at the front, Germany began the exploitation of Russia and had the power to draw on Russian resources for supplies for her army with which she was fighting the allies, do you think allied armed intervention would have been justifiable?

Mr. ROBINS. During war, if the suppositions that have been stated are facts, then armed intervention as a war measure would unquestionably have been justified.

Senator STERLING. Let me just quote again from our favorite author, Lord Milner.

Mr. ROBINS. We can not get agreement there.

Senator STERLING. He says [reading]:

And this intervention was successful. The riot was stopped. The Czecho-Slovaks were saved from destruction. The resources of Siberia and south-eastern Russia were denied to the enemy. The northern ports of European Russia were prevented from becoming bases for German submarines from which our North Sea barrage could have been turned. These were important achievements and contributed materially to the defeat of Germany. I say nothing of the fact that a vast portion of the earth's surface and millions of people friendly to the allies have been spared the unspeakable horrors of Bolshevik rule.

Do you not agree with Lord Milner in that statement?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir. I am sorry. I would like for the moment to rely on my favorite newspaper, the Manchester Guardian.

Senator STERLING. Do you place the Manchester Guardian over and above everything else as authority?

Mr. ROBINS. No; not over and above everything; but in that situation I prefer to take its judgment. I think that it is better than Lord Milner.

Senator STERLING. Lord Milner, by reason of his position, was in reasonably close touch with the situation.

Mr. ROBINS. Is it not a rather interesting thing that after we intervened and after a certain policy had been established of dealing with the Bolsheviki, the premier of Britain came out and asked for a change of attitude toward the Bolshevik government, and Lord Northcliffe came out and said that that request was right, and that it would be a good thing to send me back there? He did that because he thought I was pro-German and pro-Bolshevik? We can not think that. There has been a confusion in the play in England, a confusion in the play in France and with us, in this Russian story.

Senator STERLING. Then you do not agree with the official statement as to the attitude of the French Republic in regard to intervention in Russia?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir.

Senator STERLING. Let me call your attention to that official attitude. [Reading:]

The French Government is of the opinion that Bolshevism is a permanent danger to peace and civilization, and that the government of the Soviets is actually at war with the allies. It is therefore impossible to renew diplomatic relations with that government, even taking it as a government de facto. The French Government feels justified in its attitude, because in fighting against Bolshevism, France is not in the least interfering with the home politics of a foreign country but merely endeavoring to eradicate a system which is based on nothing but disorder and crime.

I am not going to read all of the statement, but I want to call your attention to one further paragraph. [Reading:]

Bolshevist troops are already invading the countries which all the allies are desirous of bringing into existence, such as Poland, and thus to prevent the organization of nations that have long been kept under the yoke of Germany, which is determined to accept the help of Bolshevism to prevent their emancipation.

Mr. ROBINS. Now, Senator, over against that I would put the statement of the French patriot, Capt. Sadaul, who has suffered in the war, who loves his country, in my judgment, and was selected by the French ambassador and the general of the French military mission to be a sort of liaison officer with the Bolsheviki. Capt. Sadaul was in Russia at the time I was there and left Russia sometime after I left Russia, with the cooperation of his government. Capt. Sadaul has made his statement in France, and he has agreed with the position that I hold, absolutely. He is opposed to the program of the Bolsheviki, but believed that the actual facts of the situation justified the efforts that were made for cooperation with the soviet power, the program that was worked out in Russia between us.

Senator STERLING. I think you will fall within the class mentioned in the next paragraph.

Mr. ROBINS. I will do my best not to do so. Let us see.

Senator STERLING. I think you have already by your statements done so.

Mr. ROBINS. Let us see.

Senator STERLING. I think you will agree with this statement.
[Reading:]

Bolshevism can not be reasonably called a system of government, but the tyranny of a very small clique over the bulk of the nation.

You are not in that class.

Mr. ROBINS. Thank you, sir.

Senator STERLING (reading):

Fighting Bolshevism means, first and foremost, protecting Russia against a régime which all those who have escaped from Russia are unanimous in condemning.

Mr. ROBINS. I will be one person——

Senator STERLING. I heard you condemn——

Mr. ROBINS. You mean the system? Absolutely, but I do not agree to the fact, Senator, that it is a small group at the top with tyranny running the show.

Senator STERLING (reading):

It also means protecting civilization in Europe, as the activity of Bolshevik propagandists is a menace, not only to the immediate neighbors of Russia, but also to the allied and neutral countries, one of the conditions of the very existence of Bolshevism being its expansion abroad.

I think you brought out that idea yourself.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, and you will probably find in the days to come that I am bitterly opposed by my socialist friends in America and Bolshevik agitators as a most poisonous and dangerous man to the truth of Bolshevism. I know the beast. I know it, and I know my country and have confidence enough in its institutions to be able to tell the truth about it. And, Senator, I believe that when we know the beast, with the united intelligence of the free men and women of America, I have faith enough in our institutions to believe that we will throw that foreign culture, born out of a foreign despotism, back out of our land, not by treating it with the method of tyranny, not by a witch hunt, nor by hysteria, but by strong, intelligent action, the intelligent action of Senators of the United States making a report that gets before the people the truth of the situation and mobilizes the consciences and the intelligence of the men and women of our land.

Senator OVERMAN. What do you mean by "witch hunt"?

Mr. ROBINS. I mean this, Senator. You are familiar with the old witch-hunt attitude, that when people get frightened at things and see bogies, then they get out witch proclamations, and mob action and all kinds of hysteria takes place.

Senator OVERMAN. This committee has been called a witch hunt.

Mr. ROBINS. I wish to make no possible sort of criticism of the committee. I wish to say that I have never been treated more fairly than I have been here.

Senators, may I make clear to you what I mean? I think I mentioned the difference between the wrong view and the right. You may remember when the President of the United States, President McKinley, was assassinated by an anarchist in Buffalo. There was a little group of anarchists in my town of Chicago. They did not happen to be terrorist anarchists at all. They were philosophical anarchists. They were even vegetarians—would not kill even a fly.

They believed that the wonderful truth of their program would spread over the world. They had a little paper called Free Society. I did not believe in the things it stood for, but I believed in the freedom by which all kinds of dark and noisome things and gases if carried out into the open would be better dealt with and purified. I used to talk with them. We had a free floor meeting in the old Chicago commons, where they came to talk. Then came the killing of the President, and the whole country was roused against that terrible crime. The police decided upon an investigation of this group of anarchists. The police were then under investigation themselves, and they hoped to turn attention from themselves by working up an anarchist scare. So they sent down and arrested this old anarchist peasant, his wife, a boy and girl, and put them in different police stations. They put each one through the third degree, sweating them and telling one that the other had confessed. I went down to try to see them, but was not permitted. I went to see the mayor, and I said, "The policy you are following is wrong. You have been mayor for four years. If this is a real terrorist group, your administration will be under condemnation for permitting it to exist and grow until they conspire and assassinate our President. Instead of being interested in this curious witch hunt that is going on, you ought to be more interested in trying to prove that the city of Chicago is free from any complicity with the assassination of the President." He saw the point, and the mayor gave me the right to go down and see these people, and we had a writ of habeas corpus taken out. There was no evidence found against them and they were all discharged. But a nine-days' terror crept over the city. I was assaulted. Why? Because I had something to do with helping some poor Russian folks, whose ideas were different from mine, but who were entitled to be treated with justice in my own free land, and I suggest that that is the way to deal with this situation rather than the way that the police department in Chicago started to deal with the anarchists there.

SENATOR STERLING. Col. Robins, if as you say, the Bolshevik form of government, requiring, as it does, the rule of a class—the proletariat—is founded on wrong principles—that is what I understand.

MR. ROBINS. Absolutely.

SENATOR STERLING. It follows, does it not, that such form of government can not very long endure?

MR. ROBINS. I should believe that that was true, and if they follow the stark metallic formulas that are false, in my judgment, they will reveal their failure and be finally overwhelmed, unless in the operation of the government they are moved from their formulas to a more reasonable program.

SENATOR STERLING. As to how long it may endure, that depends somewhat on the intelligence or capacity of the people, does it not, and on the means resorted to to compel submission to the government?

MR. ROBINS. Yes.

SENATOR STERLING. Since such a government must cease to exist, would you not expect that its collapse would be attended with increased violence and bloodshed?

MR. ROBINS. Of course; that is, assuming—if you make the assumption of the premise, yes. Of course, I do not make that assumption.

Senator STERLING. Well, I understood you to say that as to how long it will endure, that depends upon the intelligence and capacity of the people and upon the means adopted to enforce submission?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; but here was the thought, Senator, that I think it may easily be modified considerably. Then your conclusion is not sound.

Senator STERLING. But if this is so, and if armed intervention would prevent the conditions I have named, would not such intervention be justifiable in the interests of humanity and civilization?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; accepting your premise, the conclusion is sound.

Senator STERLING. Take the particular case of Germany, the once common enemy, beaten in the field, but still, as we all must admit, I think, very resourceful if not unscrupulous. She is next door to Russia. Suppose Russia to be without orderly government, her industries paralyzed, and millions of her people in direct want, and general demoralization throughout the country. Would not Russia under such condition be an easy victim for German domination and exploitation?

Mr. ROBINS. On the assumption that you make, yes.

Senator STERLING. Would such facts and conditions justify intervention?

Mr. ROBINS. I think so.

Senator STERLING. Would not intervention under such circumstances be for the present and future well-being of Russia, and would it not be in the interest of the permanent peace of the world?

Mr. ROBINS. Assuming all the previous statements as facts, the conclusion, it seems to me, is sound. Of course, it is agreed that I do not agree with the assumption of the facts.

Senator OVERMAN. Are there any other questions?

Mr. ROBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, may I make this statement? I have, of course, a large number of documents that are in nature semi-confidential, growing out of my relationship. I have not produced them because the evidence in this committee did not seem to warrant it, and I wish to protect at every point where I can protect from needless attack of one sort and another, many individuals. But I ask the privilege of the committee that if, as the testimony progresses, there be any substantial challenge of the statements that I have made, in substance, by any persons entitled to consideration—I mean special consideration, I am not frightened by a good deal of clamor, but any official person—I may ask the privilege of returning to the committee and presenting a further line of documentary statements.

Senator OVERMAN. We want to do you justice; and if any attack is made on you, you will have the right to respond.

Mr. ROBINS. Thank you, Senator; and may I express to you my appreciation for the consideration that the committee has shown me during what must have been a very tiresome hearing.

Senator OVERMAN. Colonel, where, if any more testimony is to be presented by you, could we find you?

Mr. ROBINS. Always at 43 Fifth Avenue. That address will always reach me, and I will come as expeditiously as I can.

Senator OVERMAN. If you see anything that you want to reply to, will you inform me if you want to be heard?

Mr. ROBINS. I will, Senator Overman. I thank you.

(Thereupon, at 12.50 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee took a recess until 2.30 p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

At 2.30 o'clock p. m. the subcommittee met, pursuant to the taking of the recess.

TESTIMONY OF MR. GREGOR A. MARTIUSZINE.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman and testified through an interpreter, Prof. Alexander Petrunkevitch.)

Mr. HUMES. Where do you live?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. At present I am domiciled in Moscow.

Mr. HUMES. What is your business?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I am the representative of the central union of the flax growers and other cooperative organizations of Russia.

Mr. HUMES. When did you leave Russia?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I wish to add also that I was the vice president of the All-Russian Soviet of the peasant deputies, which was dispersed by the Bolsheviki.

Mr. HUMES. At what place?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Petrograd. The president was Avksentieff, who was lately in this country.

Senator OVERMAN. Was that during the Kerensky régime that you were vice president of this soviet?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. I was elected as a deputy by the peasants of the government of Kasan to the constituent assembly. I am the son of a peasant, and my grandfather was a Russian peasant serf. I spent the first 21 years of my life in a village in Russia. Under the Czar I was twice arrested, and banished for five years. After the first banishment had ended, in 1911, I took part in the cooperative movement in Russia. At present I am a member of the executive board of the Russian Flax Growing Association and also of various other cooperative associations in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. When did you leave Russia?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. The 2d of November, 1918. I took part in the overthrow of the Bolsheviki government in Yaroslav and in Archangel. At this moment I am the special representative of the northern government of Russia, sent to this country for economic purposes, and also an official representative of the Association of Russian Cooperatives. I desire to make it plain to this committee that I intend to speak not as a political member of some party, but as a peasant. Neither do I intend to draw any conclusions from any matter of discussion or argument, but I desire to present the facts and to leave to you the pleasure of drawing your own conclusions.

Senator NELSON. May I ask the question right there. As I understand it, you belong to the government of northern Russia?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Is that a Bolshevik government or not?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. The northern government was called to life after the overthrow of the Bolsheviki on the 2d of August. Its head is Tchaikowski, and that government has been recognized by the Allies and it is not a Bolshevik government. I would like, first of all, to touch upon the question of cooperation in Russia as an especially interesting chapter in the history of Russian peasantry and as having a special bearing upon the economic situation in Russia. If it is the pleasure of the committee, I shall read to you a statement which I have drawn up, adding such additional remarks as I desire as I proceed.

Senator OVERMAN. Very well; proceed.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. There are nearly 45 cooperative societies in Russia, representing almost 20,000,000 members, mostly of the rural population. Cooperation in Russia is therefore overwhelmingly rural, 85 per cent belonging to the peasant class. I might add that I do not think it necessary to explain what Russian cooperation means, because it is practically the same as that in this country where there are cooperative societies, as in California and in Minnesota.

Senator NELSON. I just want to ask one question. These cooperative societies relate both to the buying and the selling of products, do they not?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; both to buying and selling.

Senator NELSON. They are cooperative societies for the sale of the products of the peasants?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Cooperative societies for the purchase of supplies for them?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; and also for the furnishing of credit. In some localities the cooperative movement reached such dimensions that from 75 to 80 per cent of the total number of peasant households were members of such societies. The greatest cooperative societies are as follows: The Moscow Peoples Bank, the Central Union of Consumers' Societies, and the All-Russian Society of Flax Growers, of which I am the representative here. In the autumn 1918, this society sent to the allied countries flax worth eleven and a half million dollars, the consignment having been delivered to Archangel under great difficulties. This fact shows the feeling of the cooperative associations to the Allies, with whom they were always friendly, and to whom they were able to send the goods the moment the way was established through Archangel. I do not know whether the Allies ever received any goods whatsoever from the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. Did they succeed in shipping anything up to the Murman coast on the new railroad?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. At what time?

Senator NELSON. Lately; within the last year.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. The cooperative association was able to ship the goods only through Archangel, because the goods were brought there to Archangel and not to Murmansk, and there are still some goods there ready for shipment to the Allies.

Senator STERLING. How long have these cooperative societies been in existence?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. The cooperative societies in Russia were first founded in 1870, but were persecuted under the Czar's government. The cooperative organizations of Russia are purely economic institutions, which do not pursue any political ends. Being democratic institutions the cooperative societies were persecuted under the Czar's government, and their activity was greatly impeded. After the overthrow of autocracy under the provisional government, the cooperative movement got a chance to develop freely. The All-Russian Congress of Cooperatives which took place in April, 1917, sent its most distinguished representatives, Selheim, Korobov, and Kulyshny, to lend economic assistance to the government of Kerensky, as assistant secretaries of the secretary of food supply. During the entire existence of the provisional government, the cooperative association lent it its full support. In all congresses their representatives expressed themselves in favor of the constituent assembly. The last assembly of the cooperative associations took place in May, 1918, and during that meeting the association adopted a resolution in favor of the constituent assembly. Previously to the convocation of the assembly they supported the soviets of peasant deputies, which had as their object the creation of the rule of the people in Russia, that is, the election of a constituent assembly of zemstvos and municipal institutions upon the basis of universal suffrage and direct secret and equal ballots. To this end they appropriated about 1,000,000 rubles. The local soviets of peasant deputies also supported the cooperative movement. The cooperatives supported them because they considered the soviets only temporary institutions, pending the election to the constituent assembly. I desire to emphasize that the cooperative societies of Russia, as well as the Central Association of Cooperatives, are not political institutions, that they exist entirely for economic purposes, and that for this reason they supported the government of Kerensky and the soviets at that time, and the cooperative societies maintained at that time that the convocation of the constituent assembly was imperative for the welfare of the Russian people.

Senator NELSON. This carries you down to the Kerensky government. I want to know what has been the experience of the cooperative societies under the Bolsheviki government of Lenine and Trotzky, which came into power in November, 1917. The provisional government got into power, if I recollect aright, in March, 1917?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And in November what we call the Bolshevik government came into power under Lenine and Trotzky. You carried this under the Kerensky government. I want to know what the experience of the cooperatives has been under the Bolshevik government.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I will touch upon that subject now. There seems to be an opinion that the soviets are an organization characteristic of Russia; but in the same manner some people previously to this time thought that autocracy was also a characteristic of the people in Russia. The cooperatives do not uphold that opinion. No one of the Bolshevik leaders had any part in the cooperative movement of Russia. They consider all peasants bourgeoisie except the peasant farm hands. That is the theory of Marx. Under the provisional government they took a stand in opposition to the conference of the cooperative associations. After accession to power Lenine decided immediately to nationalize all cooperative societies, just as all bourgeois enterprises were nationalized at that time. The fear that all peasants will rise against the Bolsheviki prevented the enactment of that measure. For the same reason—of fear—the nationalization has not been accomplished, even to this time.

Senator NELSON. As I understand it, they planned to nationalize the cooperative societies, but have not dared to carry it out?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. That is correct.

Senator NELSON. For fear of antagonizing the peasants?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That is the drift of your statement?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Therefore the counselors of Lenine decided to fight cooperation gradually. This is the reason why Lenine's plan has not yet been accomplished. Cooperation is encountering great difficulties. Executive officers of its central organizations have been arrested, and some of them shot. Thus, in June, 1918, Krylov, executive officer of the People's Bank, was arrested in Moscow, and in October, 1918, Korobov and Berkenheim, of the Central Association of Consumers Societies, were also arrested in the same city. Some members were forced to emigrate. In Perm, in May, 1918, Neusychin, an executive officer of the cooperative union, was traitorously shot and his assassin was not apprehended. The violence done to provincial members of the association was beyond words. In Vologda, in August, 1918, Delarov and Kostian, two respected members, were arrested. December 6, 1918, the People's Bank was nationalized, regardless of the protests of its members, 1,500 of whom arrived from all cities to save their pet institution and to defend their rights.

I beg to call attention to this fact that as the Czar's régime was unable to destroy cooperation in Russia, so the Bolshevik régime will also be unable to do it.

Senator STERLING. Where was the People's Bank?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. In Moscow.

Senator NELSON. Was the People's Bank the agency of the cooperative societies? Was it through that bank that they operated?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; that was the bank of the cooperative societies quite exclusively, and that is the reason why it had not been nationalized during a whole year.

Senator NELSON. They attempted to nationalize it, did they not?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. They made that attempt, but they were afraid that the peasants would not forgive such an act of nationalization of their bank. Many were arrested on the mere suspicion that they were engaged in counter-revolutionary activities. I myself was witness of such cases in May and June in the government of Yaroslav.

The property of the cooperative societies is often requisitioned or even plundered. Thus, in Moscow the office of the Central Association of Consumers' Societies was twice broken into. The second time, about 7 o'clock p. m. in August, 1918, a band of armed men entered the office, forced the safe, took the money—about 5,000,000 rubles, and disappeared. No one was apprehended.

Senator NELSON. Were these armed men what they commonly call the Red Guard?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. They were armed men who came in automobiles, but no one knows who they were; but the allowance to use automobiles is given only to the Red Guards and to the Bolsheviks.

Senator STERLING. Was it during the daytime that this robbery occurred?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. At 7 o'clock p. m.

Senator STERLING. Was it yet daylight?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes, it was still daylight; but the office was closed. Such cases of burglary happen so often within governmental institutions themselves under the Bolshevist régime that they cause no surprise any more. In April, 1918, I heard public statements of common people concerning the burglary of several hundred thousand rubles from the treasury of the Soviet of Yaroslav. The reasoning of the citizens was simple. Either the members of the soviets themselves were the thieves, or they staged the whole affair to cover up embezzlement.

Senator NELSON. Which way is Yaroslav from Moscow—in what direction?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Southeast from Moscow.

Senator NELSON. Is it on the Don River?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. On the Volga.

It is natural that under these circumstances the cooperative movement is anti-Bolshevist.

The main reason for this lies in the fact that Bolshevism tries to kill cooperation. If the latter becomes nationalized in accordance with Lenine's scheme, then its influence as a democratic and free organization in the service of the laboring population will be nullified. I wish to add that, in my opinion, the same would result in this country if the Government should decide to nationalize cooperation in America.

The second reason lies in the disorganization of all economic life. In consequence of this the cooperatives are unable to act independently.

Owing to the nationalization of production the cooperatives can not get the necessary goods. Owing to the nationalization of exports the cooperatives are prevented from exporting their products. Owing to the civil war all over Russia and to the disorganization of transportation the cooperatives are unable to furnish their members even with a minimum of goods. In order to renew the exchange of goods with the allies, to renew trade, the nationalization of the cooperative societies in Russia would have to be first abolished. It was impossible to maintain trade with the allies because the goods on arrival in Archangel at that time were being requisitioned by the Bolsheviki.

Senator NELSON. That was before the allies got possession of Archangel?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Equally the cooperatives situated in the regions under Bolshevist rule can not import goods, because all freight is requisitioned by the Soviet government. The economic disorganization is so evident that it is scarcely necessary to dwell longer upon it. I am going merely to give examples which I personally have witnessed. I have dwelt on the cooperative movement in Russia to show what it meant for Russia, and now I am going to show to you the economic disorganization which resulted from the Bolshevist rule over Russia.

Senator NELSON. Before you proceed there is one question that occurs to me. Are these cooperative societies mere buying and selling organizations; that is, on the one hand selling and on the other hand buying, or are they producing organizations? For instance, do they manufacture the goods they sell? Are they producers in any sense or not?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. The majority of the flour mills in Russia belong to the cooperation, but the production of goods is mostly in the hands of the consumers' league of Russia. In the case of flax the cooperatives buy up and sell it as it comes into their hands.

Senator NELSON. As I understand you then, aside from the milling industry these cooperative societies are mainly what you would call buying and selling organizations? They buy goods and sell goods?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; that is so. In the government of Archangel, after the collapse of the Bolshevik power, the total quantity of dark bread with substitutes amounted only to a quarter of a pound per head per day for the duration of two weeks. If flour had not been shipped by the allies the population of more distant regions of the northern district would have been condemned to death through starvation. I wish to express my sincere thanks to the allies who have supplied the northern Russian population with bread and saved them from death by starvation. I refuse to believe all those statements which are to the effect that the people in Russia starved because of the attitude of the allies.

Senator NELSON. What is the distance from Vologda on the Siberian Railway to Archangel?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Approximately 1,000 versts.

Senator NELSON. That is about how many miles?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. About 750 miles.

Senator NELSON. On the Siberian Railroad?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. No; that is the railroad between Moscow and Archangel.

Senator NELSON. It is from that railroad station to Vologda?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. It is 1,000 versts?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. And that is how many miles?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. About 750 miles.

Senator NELSON. That country there in northern Russia north of the Siberian Railway up to Archangel is not an agricultural country in the sense that southern Russia is. It is mainly a country inhabited by lumbermen and fishermen, is it not, and there is not much farming in that section of country, is there?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Mostly lumbering and fishing, and they always need grain.

Senator NELSON. And practically now the only food they get there is what the allies furnish?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. They have received some food besides from Siberia and are receiving it regularly at present, by way of the sea.

Meanwhile in Siberia enormous quantities of grain were stored, left over from the last year's harvest, because of the impossibility of transporting it by rail.

The assertion of some people that the grain could not reach the north because of an allied blockade is not founded in truth.

Besides, during the whole time of the Bolshevik régime the peasants refused to furnish the grain, and lack of bread was felt in Siberia itself in such cities as Omsk and Novo Nikolaevsk in June, 1918. At the time of my departure from Moscow, toward the end of June, a pud, or 36 pounds of flour, cost 300 rubles. In August it rose to 400 rubles, and one was able to get it only through the so-called bagmen; that is, men who at the risk of being shot smuggled through from one to one and a half poods of flour.

Senator NELSON. State for the record how much a ruble amounts to in our money.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. In normal times a ruble costs 51 cents.

Senator NELSON. In our money?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. In normal times. These bagmen whom I speak of fill the trains. They travel hundreds of miles for the treasure which the black bread with substitutes represents in the soviet republic. I saw many old men and women in the villages of the government of Yaroslav and Kostroma returning home empty handed, because the Red Guard had robbed them on their way or because they were forced by the civil war to leave the purchased flour behind. I have seen 10 and 12 year old children of intellectuals who traveled 600 versts (400 miles) for half a bushel of potatoes and who were happy if they were able to bring the potatoes home. This was in June, 1918.

I consider the reports true which are brought by men who left Moscow and Petrograd in November and December, 1918, to the effect that death from starvation is already of common occurrence in soviet Russia. Thus the distinguished professor Lappo-Danilewski and the great painter Repin have succumbed to starvation.

But if we speak of a shortage in bread, other articles of food can not be purchased for any price. Thus, the rural population of the government of Yaroslav used molasses instead of sugar in June of last year to the amount of only one-quarter of a pound per person per month, and that very irregularly. In the central government the price for milk and butter was exorbitant and their quantity exceedingly small.

The nationalization of industry has paralyzed the majority of factories and plants. Thus, the prosperous flax industry of Russia had to cut its business in half in June, 1918. In the autumn of 1918 in Ivanov-Vosnesensk, which is called the Russian Manchester, the Soviet government, according to official data, has ordered 54 factories to be closed for lack of raw materials, while in the western district of Moscow only 3 per cent of factories were in operation. I wish to point out that I am particularly well acquainted with the flax industry in Russia, and that the peasants are not going to sow any flax this year because there is no buyer left any more for it. Yet the Russian flax industry is about five times as great as that of this country.

The most important branches of industry have to reduce their operations to a minimum or to close temporarily because of complete chaos which resulted from the control of industries by workmen, from lack of raw materials, lack of credit, and lack of organization in the distribution of raw material. Here is one example of what this control of industries by workmen means. In Yaroslav the cooperative association purchased a large plant of agricultural machines which was supposed to be able to turn out 300,000 plows annually. The director appointed to run this plant was arrested on suspicion of counterrevolutionary activity. Productivity fell to such an extent that in March, 1918, the plant had to close. The workmen refused to work, and the managers were helpless. But to close the plant they had to obtain the permission of the workers themselves. After many interviews with Lenine and a bribe to the Bolshevik commissioner, the permission to close the plant was granted on condition of an advance payment of two months' wages to all workers. But at the time of this settlement the workers threatened to return in two months and to demand their reinstallation in the plant.

This is only one of the examples of what the cooperative associations had to undergo because the Bolsheviks attempted, but did not dare quite to destroy them.

Senator NELSON. This was a case where the cooperative association had taken over this factory and were manufacturing plows, was it?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; that was the case. They paid 1,100,000 rubles for the plant.

Senator NELSON. What was the capacity of it in normal times? How many plows could they turn out a year?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. The factory was really for the building of small machines, and when it was bought it was to be rebuilt so as to be able to produce 300,000 plows a year.

Trade is in a still worse condition. Respected firms were forced to suspend their business. Extraordinary speculation developed in consequence. Transportation has reached the limit of disorganization. Shipping of freight on the Volga, Oka, and other rivers had practically gone out of existence in 1918. Railway transportation showed a complete collapse.

The Bolsheviks have usurped the power against the will of the majority represented in the All-Russian Soviet of Workers, Soldiers, and Peasant Deputies. Soviets and local organs of self-government not subservient to the Bolsheviks were suspended.

I wish now to speak of the relation between the Bolsheviks and the Russian democracy. I wish to show whether it is true that the Bolsheviks have a following of 93 per cent of the Russian population.

The majority in the All-Russian Congress of Peasant Deputies expressed themselves in favor of turning over all power to the Constituent Assembly at the end of December, 1918. Their executive committee was then dismissed by a decree of the people's commissioners after the disbursal of the Constituent Assembly. In the same manner, whenever local soviets had an anti-Bolshevist majority, they were dismissed, as in the case of Tambor, Nishni-Novgorod, Zlatouts, and other cities. All this shows that the soviet régime is antidemocratic. I myself was present at the meeting at which the majority of those present in that congress expressed themselves in favor of the convocation of a constituent assembly. After that these things happened.

Senator NELSON. Have the Bolsheviks ever called together a really constituent assembly in Russia—a representative body of the whole country?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. The Bolsheviki called a Constituent Assembly on the 5th of January. When they saw that the Bolsheviki themselves had only a quarter of the total vote in that assembly they then dispersed it.

Senator NELSON. They dispersed it?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. The council of the commissaries, without any consent or without even asking the permission of the All-Russian Soviet, made that decree closing the Constituent Assembly.

Senator NELSON. And that was the end of it?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. That was the end of it.

Senator NELSON. They have never had any since, have they?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. No; none. That was the last.

Senator NELSON. And the last one they had was closed by this commissary organization?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. By the council of the people's commissary.

Senator NELSON. At Petrograd?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. After having closed the Constituent Assembly they reported the action taken to the All-Russian Soviet, asking that body to confirm their action. Previous to that they dispersed all the soviets of the peasants where the majority was in favor of the Constituent Assembly.

Senator NELSON. They have closed them all?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. Some statements have been made that the Bolshevik government is subject to the control of a decision of the soviets, but these examples show that the opposite is the case, and that after the action of the government that they want, they ask the consent of the soviet. All this shows that the soviet régime is antidemocratic.

The soviet government, after October, 1918, promised the immediate convocation of the constituent assembly. The provisional government was particularly accused of being slow in doing it. But since the Bolsheviki receives only one-quarter of the votes in the elections to the constituent assembly the latter was declared prorogued by decree of the people's commissioners, January 5, 1918. This order was not only illegal in its essence, but absolutely undemocratic and antidemocratic. I ask the members of this committee to judge for themselves whether under these circumstances the Bolshevik government may be considered to be a democratic government.

The election to the constituent assembly took place in accordance with just laws, which in my opinion are perhaps the best laws in the world, and these elections took place at the time when the Bolsheviki had been already in power. Of the 36,000,000 votes cast in these elections 20,000,000 belong to peasants and social revolutionists, while only 9,000,000 supported the Bolsheviki.

Senator NELSON. The revolutionary socialists?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. I emphasize the fact that in my opinion no election which took place after the dispersal of the constituent assembly can as clearly show the real proportion of strength of the political parties and the sentiment in Russia. I will only believe that the Bolsheviki have the majority of the Russian people behind them if new elections take place on the basis of the same laws under which the elections to the first constituent assembly took place. With the exception of two or three cities, in the rest of Russia before the Bolshevik overthrow of the Kerensky government, all local and municipal elections showed that the Bolsheviks were in the minority.

Senator OVERMAN. Is it possible to hold a fair election now under the Bolshevik government?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Such elections would not be possible, because the Bolsheviks arrest and shoot a number of men who take part in such elections, even to local committees or in municipal elections.

Senator NELSON. They shoot those who are opposed to them?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. In the absence of any guaranty of free elections no fair elections can take place in Russia.

Having destroyed the very principle of the elective right, the soviet government announced the dictatorship of the proletariat. As a matter of fact, in Russia, where the proletariat forms a small fraction of the entire population, an insignificant minority enjoys the right of voting. In elections to the soviets in cities, workers in factories and plants are alone casting their votes, and the election is indirect and often open. Measures of terror are being used against elements opposed to Bolshevism.

Thus in May, 1918, during the elections in Moscow, orators opposed to Bolshevism were arrested at meetings, threatened with violence, and violence was committed on the voters at the elections. Elections in villages often took place without any lists, a small fraction of the last educated portion of the population taking part in them. In consequence the peasants are not able to exert any influence over the soviet government. Already in the spring of 1918 continual civil war raged in the provinces, often combined with mass execution. Here are some facts: In the city of Soligalich, of the government of Rostov, the soviet was overthrown in February, 1918. A punitive expedition was sent and some ten men of the local intellectuals were shot. In the city of Biely, of the government of Smolensk, the soviet was also overthrown. Near Moscow in a small city members of the local soviet were burned in the house by the infuriated mob. In Sychenky, in the government of Smolensk, after the murder of respectable citizens by the Red Army, the soviet fled. In May, 1918, the civil war assumed an elemental character. All lands along the Volga, in Siberia and North Russia, were in the throes of the civil war. In the west and the Caucasus, Germans were in control, the Germans with whom Bolsheviks made the dishonorable peace of Brest-Litovsk.

Statements have been made to the effect that elections to the soviets in Russia supposedly are better and fairer than elections in any other country, but according to my judgment, and I want to emphasize this, from the point of view of a Russian peasant, if elections in Russia were conducted in the same way that they are in this country, I would consider Russia a happy country.

All the guarantees of freedom have been abrogated in Bolshevik Russia. All non-Bolshevik papers have been suppressed without trial or investigation. This refers to the last part of June, 1918, when the terror of the Bolsheviks was particularly on the increase. Only such meetings and unions are permitted as are acceptable to the Bolsheviks. Other meetings are forbidden and the participants arrested. Thus in the beginning of January, 1918, in Moscow, members of the congress of the social revolutionary party were arrested. Representatives of the factory and plant conference of the Moscow and Petrograd region were also arrested, the Soviet of Soldier's and Peasants' Deputies of Murmansk—

Senator NELSON. That is on the Kola Peninsula?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. Having decided that it would once more like to join the allies, a decree of Bolsheviki and an order was promulgated to shoot the president of that soviet.

Endless cases could be adduced as evidence. Of men known to me personally the following were shot in July on suspicion of counter revolution: Mr. Turba, Dr. Suchetia, member of the Archangel board of aldermen; Pagilove, member of the central committee of the party of the social revolutionists; the worker Peterkin, and others.

There are no definite data for the number of victims shot by the Bolshevik authorities. Such data are not being published. Yet here are examples: According to official communication of the Petrograd extraordinary commission under date of October 28, 6,220 men were arrested, 800 of whom were shot.

Senator NELSON. That is last October?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Last October. After the assassination of Commissar Uritzky, in Petrograd, 1,500 men were arrested, 512 of whom were shot, including 10 social revolutionists. In Moscow were arrested about 800 men, but the number of those shot is not known. This is the deposition made by the member of the court assembly, Mr. E. A. Trupp.

In Yaroslav, in July, after the suppression of the rebellion, more than 300 men were shot. This is my own information. In Borisoglebsk nine men were shot for the organization of an opposition to the soviet. This was reported on the 16th of September in the northern commune. In Astrakhan 18 men were shot for an attempt at rebellion.

Senator NELSON. Astrakhan is on the Volga River?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. In Perm 50 men were shot, members of the bourgeoisie and officers, suspected in connection with the assassination of Uritsky in Petrograd.

According to witnesses, prisoners are subjected to torture, as was the case with Dora Kaplan. As she was, in consequence of this torture, incapable of appearing before the high tribunal, she was shot in the extraordinary commission.

Senator OVERMAN. Who was she?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. She was the girl who tried to assassinate Lenine. The torture was committed in the following way: They were not allowing her to go to sleep. She was kept awake. I would be able to produce more evidence from facts showing the terror of the Bolsheviki, but I think that those already mentioned are sufficient to prove my contention that the Bolsheviki rule by terror.

The fact that the Bolshevik government has existed now for more than a year causes some to consider it as indicative of its having the support of the majority. To this we may answer that aristocracy in Russia existed more than 300 years, while for a long time past it found support only in a very small following of nobility and bourgeoisie.

According to my opinion the following are the reasons for the Bolsheviks having held out:

First, because they use a system of terror on a greater scale even than did the Czar's government.

Secondly, they lead a small portion of the population by false promises of earthly bliss.

As an example, I should like to speak of how the Bolsheviks deceived the peasants with promises of land. The moment the Bolsheviks gained power they passed a law, promulgated a law, which they took directly from the decision of the All-Russian Soviet of the Peasants' Deputies. This was done by the Soviet of Peasants for the purpose of submitting it to the constituent assembly when the assembly would meet. Members of the Soviet of Peasants' Deputies hoped to submit that to the assembly, so that it would be promulgated as a law and not as an order, as was done in this case. Those who maintain that the Bolsheviks gave the land to the peasants do not say the truth. Under the provisional government, before the Bolshevik government, all land was turned over to special agricultural committees. The committees had to establish control over all the land and see to it that this control was maintained.

Senator NELSON. That was under the Kerensky government?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; that was still under Kerensky. I want to make this further statement that you will understand that the mere publication of a decree without its being accepted by any constituent assembly or other legislative body does not mean really that the nationalization has been accomplished.

Senator OVERMAN. It is simply promises without ever carrying them out?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Merely promises, and the agrarian problem in Russia promises at this time to remain just as much unsolved as it ever was before.

Senator NELSON. Mr. Martiuszine, you have stated that you are the son of a peasant, and your grandfather was a serf?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Have you lived in what they call the mir? Have you and your family lived in the Russian mir?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Will you please describe what a mir is?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I have lived in the mir, and I am at present still a member of it. I am the owner of approximately 1 acre of land. Every 12 years the land is being redivided and reapportioned.

Senator NELSON. Before you go into that, the land belongs to the mir, to the community, and not to the individual?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; it belongs to the community and not to the individual.

Senator NELSON. And the officials of the community assign it to the peasants, to each his piece that he can work?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; that is so; but the rules under which the land is divided are different, depending upon the district in which the land is situated.

Senator NELSON. Different mirs.

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. For example, in the community to which I belong the land is being apportioned only among men; women do not get any land.

SENATOR NELSON. In some communities, some mirs, women get land, too, do they not?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. In other communities women do get land apportioned to them.

SENATOR NELSON. And the land, after it has been used by a man or a woman for so many years, is reassigned to somebody else, and they get another assignment?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; that is the case. There is a reapportionment, and it may come into other hands.

SENATOR NELSON. Then, under the Russian mir land system, the peasant does not get what we call a full title to the land as we do here in America, for example, but gets only the privilege of using it for a limited number of years under the authority of the mir?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

SENATOR NELSON. And that system has prevailed ever since Alexander the Second released the serfs?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Some peasants, so-called State peasants, have had that right for many years past. But those who were serfs of noblemen have had that right only since the liberation.

SENATOR NELSON. Through the mir?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. I want to point out that in Russia not all the land belongs to the communities. By law, before the revolution, the land that was owned by communities was reduced to about 30 per cent. The rest of the land became private property in the same way as people have private property in this country.

SENATOR NELSON. The peasants were permitted to acquire that as private property in small quantities?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. That was a law passed before the revolution, but under the new régime all this has again been repealed.

SENATOR NELSON. It is all now property of the State?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

SENATOR NELSON. And the Bolshevik government?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

SENATOR NELSON. Now, the Cossacks had a different land system, did they not? The Cossacks owned their own land?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. They owned their own land.

SENATOR NELSON. Each Cossack individually?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

SENATOR NELSON. And he owned that because of the military service he was supposed to render?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

SENATOR NELSON. The Cossacks are settled mainly on the lower Don and Volga Rivers?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. On the Don and the Kuban and also in the south of Little Russia.

SENATOR NELSON. The Ukraine?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

SENATOR NELSON. Are there any on the Kama?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. None. On the Kama the mir system mostly prevails.

Senator NELSON. That is one of the main tributaries of the Volga?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. Well, now, does the mir system or community system prevail in Siberia, too?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Both systems in Siberia. In some places the mir exists, in other places private property.

Senator NELSON. Now, I ask you this: If this system of the Bolsheviks is carried out—nationalization of land and making it the property of the state—if that is carried out according to the technical decree, would it not divest the mirs of their present property, would it not take everything away from them as well as the private proprietors and from the church and from the government and what used to be the private domain, and would it not make it all one class of lands, the lands of the government and the state?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; that is the case; and the lands owned by the mir will also become then nationalized.

Senator NELSON. They will be taken away from the mirs like other lands and become the property of the state?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. It may be that that land will be all taken and reapportioned again.

Senator NELSON. Under that system?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Under that system; and it may be then that some land will be added in some cases and in other cases the land will be taken away from the mir.

Senator NELSON. I want to go a step further. The Bolshevik land system in its application is not based upon the idea of giving the farmers or peasants who till the land any title to it; I mean any ownership in it.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. No; no title whatever.

Senator NELSON. It simply gives him the use of what they can till for a limited time, is that it?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes, that is the case, only title to till the land for a given time.

Senator NELSON. And that must be assigned to them under this new system by the local soviet, must it not? I mean under the Bolshevik plan it must be assigned under the local peasant soviet?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; that will be the local soviet.

Senator NELSON. In other words, that will take the place of the old community mir that we have been talking about, will it not?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; not only in that one case of the redistribution of land, but also in all other cases which are under the jurisdiction of the mir.

Senator OVERMAN. What percentage of the people of Russia favor Bolshevism?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. The only indication of the relative strength of the parties in Russia is in the election to the constituent assembly, and any judgment as to the support that the Bolsheviks find in Russia has to be based on the proportion of the votes cast in the elections to that assembly. Since that time no elections have taken place in any fair way, so that one could base a judgment.

Neither Lenin nor Trotsky nor any of the other members of the local government have ever taken any interest or part in the peasants' cooperative societies or other peasant organizations.

Senator STERLING. Could a fair distribution of the land be expected under Bolshevik government?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. No; it is not possible.

Senator STERLING. Why not?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Because the Bolshevik government introduces disorganization into the village itself, maintaining that only the poorest among the peasants have a right to the land; whereas those who have, let us say as an example, a cow, are already bourgeois.

Senator STERLING. Would not their disposition be to distribute only to the Bolsheviks?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. There are very few Bolsheviks in the villages, and if the Bolsheviks turn over all the land only to Bolsheviks, the only result will be that they would create a new sort or kind of noblemen.

Senator STERLING. Do you mean to say by that that most of the peasants are anti-Bolshevik?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I mean that the majority of peasants are anti-Bolshevik. The peasants are not quite clear as to the various parties in Russia, but they hate the Bolsheviks because they have the practical evidence of their rule.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there terror among the peasants?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. As an example, may I repeat what I said about the peasant cooperative societies, which are being persecuted by the Bolsheviks. The peasant soviets which are not subservient to the Bolsheviks are being closed. When peasants go to the Bolsheviks asking for bread, for that reason alone they are sometimes shot, because the Bolsheviks can not supply the bread. That happened for example in Yaroslav, where the peasants do not grow grain but produce flax and various other products. On March 15, the peasants belonging to the village from which I myself hail, came to me and made this statement, that the Bolsheviks threatened to deprive them of their own bread so as to appropriate it for general purposes.

Senator OVERMAN. What do the soldiers or the peasants that return from the army do with their munitions and guns?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. A small proportion of the weapons have been brought with them to the villages. For example, in the village in which I belong, they have possession of 20 rifles.

Senator OVERMAN. Was there any effort to take the guns and munitions away from them, away from the peasants by the Bolsheviks?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I do not know that in this particular case at all, but in some cases it has happened that the Bolsheviks have taken the arms from the peasants.

Senator STERLING. Were they supplied with ammunition?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. A very small quantity, only in those cases of which I have just been speaking. The peasants are greatly opposed to the requisitioning of grain, and I think they are not going to sow grain a great deal the coming spring.

Senator NELSON. Have the Bolshevik authorities been engaged in commandeering or requisitioning grain from the peasants?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Has that been going on to a considerable extent?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. In the spring of this past year this was not taking place in any great proportion for the simple reason that the peasants opposed it violently in every case. The Bolsheviks have equipped a special regiment or army of workmen, and armed them with rifles and proclamations. That army was especially for the purpose of requisitioning grain from the peasants.

Senator NELSON. They formed an army of proletariat workmen and armed them to go among the peasants and requisition and take the wheat?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes, sir. At that time there were no noblemen, no large estate owners of the nobility left any more in Russia, and all the grain that there was was belonging to the peasants. When ever the proclamation had no effect on the peasants, the rifles were put into use.

Senator NELSON. And they took it with rifles. They did not pay for it then, did they?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. They were paying a very small sum of money, which was far below the actual cost, and wherever they found resistance they took the grain without paying for it.

Senator OVERMAN. Is there any such thing as starvation over there, and if so what is the extent of it?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I think there is a great deal of shortage of food in central Russia. For example, my wife has sent me a letter recently from central Russia where she is at present, stating that she had to pay 400 rubles for 36 pounds of grain, or rye flour, whereas the salary which I receive in Russia amounted to 1,000 rubles per month.

Senator OVERMAN. How is it in the cities of Moscow and Petrograd as to starvation?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I have no personal knowledge of Moscow or Petrograd, but I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that a gentleman, a member of the cooperative society of Moscow, has just arrived in this country who left Russia in December, and if it is the pleasure of the committee I shall be glad to get the information from him.

Senator OVERMAN. How do the people in your section, where you live and where you have been, feel toward intervention by the allies?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I beg first permission to finish my statement here, and then I will speak about the question of intervention in another document, which I have prepared especially for that purpose.

Senator OVERMAN. All right.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. According to my information, the third cause of the power of the Bolsheviks is this: That the ranks of their opponents are being increased by reactionary elements who desire the reestablishment of the monarchy in Russia. As an example, the overthrow of the Siberian government by Admiral Kolchak may be mentioned. According to my opinion, the great danger of Bolshevism itself is in the fact that it prepares again the soil for a new reactionary movement in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. A restoration of the old régime?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

The fourth cause or reason for the Bolsheviks holding out is because they use to their own advantage the policy of the allies in regard to Russia. I can not go into great detail as to the policy of the allies in Russia. I merely want to dwell upon the question as it developed in the northern part of Russia from August 2 to November 2, 1918. Other gentlemen and myself were responsible for the overthrow, prepared the overthrow of the Bolsheviks in northern Russia, and when the overthrow was accomplished we asked the allies to send us troops to Archangel. The regiments were asked for the purpose of recruiting the eastern front to fight once more both the Germans and the Bolsheviks. At that time the Bolsheviks had already formed the peace of Brest-Litovsk and the German ambassador was in Moscow, and for this reason the allied ambassadors were at that time in the city of Vologda, and before Archangel was cleared of the Bolsheviks, the allied ambassadors were obliged to leave Vologda and to go to Murmansk.

Senator NELSON. Where?

Mr. MARTUSZINE. Murmansk. Two or three weeks later the allied ambassadors were asked by the government of Archangel to come to Archangel where they are at the present moment.

Senator NELSON. So I understand, then, that the allied forces are at Archangel at the invitation of the people and the authorities of northern Russia. Is that correct?

Mr. MARTUSZINE. Yes; that is a correct statement, sir. The understanding was that the army of the northern government and of the Allies should join and take possession of Vologda and Kotlas. There were great supplies which were left in Archangel that were sent there by the Allies, and these supplies fell into the hands of the Bolsheviks, who had taken them out of Archangel to Dvina, and unfortunately the expectations of the Russians had not come true.

I want to state that the reasons I give why that is so are my own personal opinions, but I am able to give support to my opinions by official documents which are in my possession. The chief trouble was that the Allies were able to send only a small number of soldiers at first, only 1,000 men. Later, American soldiers arrived there. Their number is probably known to the gentlemen of this committee. In August the Bolsheviks had only a very small number of soldiers, and it would have been quite simple to take possession of that region and to establish connection with Vologda. But there have been not enough soldiers sent by the Allies, and the local population is very sparse in that region, and so it was impossible to accomplish it.

Senator NELSON. Now are there not a few Italian soldiers and some British soldiers there, too, and some Serbian soldiers?

Mr. MARTUSZINE. There were only Britishers and a few French soldiers, but neither Italians nor Serbians.

Senator NELSON. Have any of the Russians up there joined this army, any of the Russians formed an army to assist the Allies?

Mr. MARTUSZINE. Yes; there have been Russians. In the city of Archangel and all the villages Russian regiments have been formed. They were responsible for the overthrow of the Bolshevik government.

Senator NELSON. And they are cooperating with the Allies?

Mr. MARTUSZINE. Yes; they were all under the command of an allied general.

Another trouble existed in the fact that the allied military command began to interfere with the internal affairs in northern

Russia. Instead of doing nothing but attending to their own military side of affairs, they began to interfere with civil affairs, and then appointed a military governor without asking the consent of the civil government at that time. They have introduced a military censorship, which at the same time became a political censorship.

Finally several members of the allied military command took part in the overthrow of the northern government, which happened the 2d of September. Capt. Chaplin, who was under the immediate command of Gen. Poole, the British general, was the one responsible for this overthrow of the government. After the overthrow of the government, the allied ambassadors, and especially Ambassador Francis, took a hand in the matter. Mr. Francis refused to acknowledge the new government, which was a reactionary government, and Mr. Francis demanded a reinstatement of the Tchaikowski government.

Senator NELSON. The old civil anti-Bolshevik government?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. The old anti-Bolshevik government.

Senator STERLING. And has the old anti-Bolshevik government been reestablished?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Because of the demand made by Ambassador Francis, who was supported in his demand by the allied ambassadors, and because of the protests of the local population which arranged various strikes against the new government, the government of Tchaikowski was reinstated in power.

Senator STERLING. And it was this interference upon the part of the military authorities with the old government that made the dissatisfaction, and not the coming of the army itself?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. The arrival of the soldiers themselves of the allied and American soldiers in Archangel was welcomed by the entire Russian population, and I am not aware of a single fact that would show that they did not want their arrival. Especially the arrival of the soldiers was appreciated after food was sent there to save the Russian population from starvation.

Senator STERLING. I would like to know how the Bolshevik army in northern Russia is made up, of what elements, of what nationalities?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. At the time I left Russia the Bolshevik army in central Russia consisted mostly of Letts, and of sailors of various nationalities, including Russians.

Senator STERLING. Were there any Chinamen in the army?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Those who took part in various encounters maintained that there were a few Chinamen among them. At the time I left Russia the relations between the Russian government and the Allies became again more friendly, because Gen. Poole and Capt. Kamp went away on leave of absence. With the other commanders very friendly relations were at once established.

Senator STERLING. I would like to know what you may know about the Czecho-Slovak movement, or the movement of the Czecho-Slovak army in Russia?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I have no personal knowledge of the Czecho-Slovak movement and the only thing I know about that, is from other sources.

Senator STERLING. Was it your understanding that they were stopped under orders from Lenine and Trotsky after they had been given permission to pass through Russia on to Vladivostok?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. My opinion is to the effect that the Czechoslovaks have been spread and stopped in various localities for the express purpose of enabling the soviet governments to disarm them whenever it would be possible. I would like to have permission now to finish my statement.

Senator OVERMAN. Very well.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I think that the question of Bolshevism is not merely a local, Russian question, but that it affects the whole world. In Russia they have through violence destroyed democracy, and it is their intention to do the same in all other countries. I myself was working together with Lenine and Trotsky in the soviet at the time when both Lenine and Trotsky had only a small following in the soviet, and only later when they got more power did they get rid of that majority. And now that they use nothing but violence, by means of arms against the Russian people, I can not see any possibility for the Russian people, for the mass of them, to have any understanding whatsoever with the Bolsheviki. If the allies, and especially the American people, want to give help to the Russian people, they must give help against the Bolsheviki.

Senator NELSON. You say give help. Do you mean by that armed forces?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Both economic and military help; and I make the statement that only such help will be effective as is given with the direct statement that no interference with the internal affairs of Russia will take place. The Russian democracy is especially anxious to support the American democracy, which has shown so much regard for the Russian people. I was personally a witness at meetings at which the representatives of American missions stated that they are in favor of a democratic order of things, such as could be established through the constituent assembly, and if the Russian people can not get any help from the American people in this cause, then they do not need the help of any other people. The Russian people are going to fight Bolshevism with the same determination as they have been fighting czarism, and they are sure that the American people will support them in their demands to gain such freedom as the American people themselves have attained.

Senator STERLING. And they desire this help in order that order may be established and this violence stopped, so that under the constituent assembly they may form a true democratic government?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. The Russian democracy does not want civil war. It wants the cessation of hostilities between Russians and the convocation of the constituent assembly.

Senator NELSON. And they do not want the Bolshevik system of government there, do they?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. There is no more use for the Bolshevik order of things in Russia than there was for the Czar's régime, and you gentlemen surely are aware of the fact of the kind of love the Russian people had for the Czar's government.

Senator NELSON. You have no more love for this government of two czars, Lenine and Trotsky, than you had for the one Czar, Nicholas?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. That is true, and I express the belief that such people as Madam Breshkovsky and Tchaikowski represent the real desire and spirit of the Russian people. I am quite sure that both Madam Breshkovsky and Tchaikowski know the Russian people much better than Lenine, who to the last moment was speaking of the peasants as of bourgeoisie.

Senator NELSON. You think, then, that Madam Breshkovsky and Tchaikowski represent the sentiment of the Russian people—the great mass of them?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; that is the case. They represent the real desires and hopes of the mass of the Russian people. I beg to state that I shall be very glad to answer any questions that you desire to put, but owing to the lack of knowledge of the English language I am unable to give a more detailed statement than I have; but I am quite sure that being a Russian myself and knowing the Russian language and coming from the Russian people I know more about Russia than do those who go to Russia for only a short time, without true knowledge of the language, think they can quickly understand the spirit of the people.

Senator NELSON. What do you think are the purposes of Trotsky and Lenine? What is their object?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. I think both Lenine and Trotsky are fanatics, just as there have been fanatics in religion in older times, and that they believe they have to destroy everything that is of a different opinion from theirs. One of their objects is that they want to overthrow all governments everywhere and to introduce a dictatorship of the proletariat throughout the world. You can see the kind of dictatorship they want from what is happening in Russia. And just as Russia ought to get rid of this régime just as soon as it can, so the other countries should not allow the establishment of a similar régime in their respective countries.

Senator NELSON. Are you of the Slav race?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. I am a Slav.

Senator NELSON. A Russian Slav?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. A Russian Slav, but in the region from which I come in former times there was a great deal of a mixture of blood, and that is expressed in my face.

Senator NELSON. You are a Russian Slav and not a Hebrew?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. I am a Russian Slav and not a Hebrew.

Senator STERLING. Did you know some of the leaders in the Duma at the time of the March revolution in 1917?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Personally I was not acquainted with them.

Senator STERLING. From what you know of them or have heard of them, do you believe that they were sincere in trying to form a constituent assembly?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. Yes, I believe they were perfectly sincere.

Senator NELSON. Have you ever heard of Col. Robins over there in Russia?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. I had no personal interview with him, but I heard of him.

Senator NELSON. What did you hear about him and his activities?

MR. MARTIUSZINE. I heard that Col. Robins entered into certain agreements with the Bolsheviki at the time when the American ambassador, Mr. Francis was leading a distinctly anti-Bolshevist policy there.

Senator NELSON. Please repeat that.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I understood Col. Robins entered into some kind of relationship—that he entered into a parley with the Bolsheviks.

Senator NELSON. Entered into negotiations?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Negotiations with the Bolsheviks at the time when the American ambassador, Mr. Francis, was leading an anti-Bolshevist policy there.

Senator NELSON. At the time when Mr. Francis was anti-Bolshevist?

Senator STERLING. And leading a policy of anti-Bolshevism?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That is, Col. Robins had a different policy from Ambassador Francis over there. Is that your understanding?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. It looks as if that were so, but I do not know whether Col. Robins was under the ambassador or whether he was receiving special instructions from the Government here.

Senator OVERMAN. You said you served as a representative in this great congress in which Lenine and Trotsky were members. Were Lenine and Trotsky elected to that assembly as you were?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; they were elected to the congress.

Senator OVERMAN. What soviet elected them?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I was a member of the soviet of peasant deputies. Lenine and Trotsky were members of the soviet of workers' deputies, but the two soviets had joint sessions for the consideration of questions which affected both bodies.

Senator OVERMAN. Was Trotsky known as a working man?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. He was elected by working men, but since he went to Russia from this country the people of this country ought to know better than I do what he was doing here.

Senator OVERMAN. You do not know what he was doing over there when he went back before he was elected?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. No; I am aware of the fact that a number of the commissaries at present in Russia came from this country.

Senator NELSON. Are there not a number of the officials of this Bolshevik government who came from this country, who were here some years and went back there and became commissaries and held other positions there?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I know of several of that kind of men who came from this country to Russia and then became commissaries and members of the government.

Senator NELSON. Do you think those men who came from here in that way are a valuable acquisition to the Russian people, and that they are doing them any good in this emergency?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. There is a Russian proverb that some friends are more dangerous than enemies.

Senator NELSON. Some friends are more dangerous than enemies?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Do you think that applies to this class of men who have gone from here over there?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; that is what I think.

Senator OVERMAN. What kind of work did Trotsky do over there? He was elected as a workingman.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Before coming to Russia Mr. Trotsky was contributing articles to certain newspapers, but when he became a commissary he suppressed such newspapers.

Senator NELSON. Have the Bolsheviks suppressed all anti-Bolshevik newspapers?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. At the time when I left Russia there were still a few anti-Bolshevist newspaper publishers, but after July the newspapers were suppressed.

Senator NELSON. All anti-Bolshevist papers were suppressed?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. All anti-Bolshevist newspapers were suppressed.

Senator NELSON. And that is the condition now?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. So far as I know, that is so. The private printing establishments have all been requisitioned and turned over to the soviet.

Senator NELSON. That is, they have commandeered and requisitioned all private printing shops?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Only the chief ones, not all, but the most important ones. For example, in Moscow, the printing shop of the newspaper Russkoe-Slovo is requisitioned. It is a large paper like the New York Times, and this printing shop together with all the paper supply was turned over to the soviet without any reimbursement whatever.

Senator NELSON. In other words it would be as though our Government would take possession of the New York Times and of its printing establishment and all its supplies, would it?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes, sir; and without paying for it either.

Senator NELSON. Without paying for it?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That is the Bolshevik method, is it not?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That is what they mean by free press is it?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. That is Trotsky's idea and the idea of the Bolsheviks of free press.

Senator NELSON. Have you ever come across what they call the Red Guard? Have you ever seen any of them in operation?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I would like to know what you desire to know about them.

Senator NELSON. I want to know if you have ever seen them, and if you can tell us what kind of men they are and how they operate, and what they have been doing where you have seen them.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I can tell you about the Red Guard in Moscow. In Moscow in May the anarchists took possession of the richest private dwellings. Thus they were putting into effect the program of the Bolsheviks. But the Bolsheviks themselves preferred to put into operation their own program, so on one day they surrounded these dwellings with their Red Guards with quick-firing guns and began bombarding the dwellings. I was witness of one case in a street where one of these dwellings was taken by the Red Guard. Fifteen of the anarchists were arrested. After that all the furniture in that dwelling was removed, and taken no one knows where.

Senator NELSON. By the Bolsheviks?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. By the Red Guards who were engaged in taking possession.

Senator NELSON. Did the officials of the Red Guard take possession of the building and use it?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. No, they did not take possession of the building itself. Nothing was left there.

Senator NELSON. They took everything out of it?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes, they took everything out of it. Workers who supported the Bolsheviks made statements to the effect that anarchists act more fairly than the Bolsheviks themselves, because they leave at least some of the things to the workers.

Senator NELSON. But the Bolsheviks strip everything?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. The Red Guards take everything, and no one knows what happens to the things.

Senator NELSON. When the Red Guard arrest people and take them to jail, nobody knows what becomes of them, do they?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Some information leaks out; but in many cases the people arrested are liberated only after bribery has been paid to the authorities. That system was already in existence under the government of the Czar and therefore nobody is amazed at it.

Senator NELSON. They made the old system of bribery that was in operation under the Czar?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. That is the connecting link between the Bolshevik government and the old government of the Czar—bribery?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes; I think so.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you see much killing or know of any killing over there?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I have made some statements about that, but there are no statistics available.

Senator OVERMAN. Have you any statements about that here?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I have already stated some of those cases.

Senator NELSON. Do you think that an American who has been over there 8 or 10 months and flitted about between Moscow and Petrograd, and whose main duties have been to distribute milk and other rations among the people, a man who came along the Siberian Railroad without taking any stop-over ticket at any point, finally emerging either in Korea or Vladivostok, would be apt to know the feeling and sentiment of the Russian peasants?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I think such a gentleman might have a somewhat better idea than the old Czar's bureaucrats had, but only a very little better.

Senator NELSON. That is such a man would be looking at the Russian people through the eyes of the Czar? Is that what you mean to say?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. He would form an idea of the Russian people only as a bureaucrat forms an idea and not through actual acquaintance with the Russian people.

Senator STERLING. He would have no better understanding of the real Russian people than a bureaucrat would?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes. In other words, if he had a preconceived idea, he would have exactly the chance to find support for that preconceived idea, without finding any evidence to the contrary.

Senator NELSON. I wish to ask you one rather personal question. You have stated that your grandfather was a serf, and that your father was a peasant. Do you consider yourself as belonging to the class of Russian peasants?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Naturally, I consider myself a peasant, inasmuch as I still am a member of one of the communes or mirs.

Senator NELSON. You have an acre of land that you cultivate. I believe you must not hire anybody to help you to cultivate that, under the Bolshevik government.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I can not do that.

Senator NELSON. You have to roll up your shirt sleeves and do it yourself?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. My father and brothers are now engaged in tilling the soil.

Senator OVERMAN. You are elected by your own soviet to the general meeting, are you not?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I was elected to the All-Russian Assembly of Peasants which took place on the 17th of May, 1917. These soviets had as their object the convocation of the constituent assembly, and the participation by the peasantry in the establishment of a democratic régime in Russia, and I would be willing to acknowledge the sovereign of the soviet only if the constituent assembly should decide in favor of the soviet, if it should decide that all power should be given to them.

Senator NELSON. That is, you mean the local soviet?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I would acknowledge the soviet system, the soviet sovereignty if the constituent assembly should acknowledge it. Then I would bow before it.

Senator NELSON. Did they have a fair election to the constituent assembly?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I think on the whole the elections were very fair, and perhaps there were only a very few cases where they were not.

Senator NELSON. I refer to the constituent assembly for the entire country. You have said that election was very fair, for that assembly that the Bolsheviks dissolved.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. How did the Bolsheviks dissolve that assembly?

Senator NELSON. By force, he says.

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I should like to elaborate my statement by comparing it with what would take place in this country if there should be formed a soviet here, and the Senate and House of Representatives should be willing to turn over their power to the soviet, then of course the people would be submitting themselves to that power but not otherwise. That is exactly the case with Russia. If this constituent assembly would acknowledge the power of the soviet, then I would bow before it.

Senator OVERMAN. How was the constituent assembly dissolved?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. I was taking part in the session of that constituent assembly, and if you desire I will tell you how it happened.

Senator NELSON. How was it dissolved?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. First I want to tell what was happening on that day in Petrograd. All the organizations in Petrograd including the soviet of the peasant assembly wanted to make a demonstration in favor of the assembly and to go to express their pleasure to the assembly itself, to make a demonstration in its favor. All such demonstrations, however, had been forbidden and the people were dispersed by the Red Guard. During this dispersal several people were killed, including a personal acquaintance of mine, the soldier Ludvinov.

Senator NELSON. Was the constituent assembly itself dispersed by the Red Guards, or how was it dispersed or dissolved?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. The first session of the constituent assembly closed at 3 o'clock in the morning, because the soldiers on duty there made the statement that the Red Guard were tired and wanted to go to sleep, and that if they would not close their session they would be dispersed. The Bolsheviks who were present then left and the whole building was surrounded by soldiers.

Senator NELSON. What became of the members who attended, after the building was surrounded by soldiers?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. This took place late in the night, and the members of the assembly, not being armed, did not want to make any resistance. There was such a noise in the gallery that it was impossible to make out what people were saying. The Bolsheviks had their own supporters in the galleries who were making the noise, whistling and yelling so that they did not allow others to be heard. When the president of the assembly told them that they should not do that, and that if they persisted in making a noise they would be removed from the hall, they yelled back, "Just try it and you will see that we are going to disperse you." As it was impossible to continue the session under those circumstances the president announced a recess at 3 o'clock in the morning with the intention of reconvening again in the morning. Before morning the Bolsheviks passed a decree that the constituent assembly was closed.

Senator NELSON. Dissolved?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Dissolved, and since then they have allowed no one to enter the building. After that some 30 members of the constituent assembly were arrested.

Senator NELSON. Was it the Bolshevik soldiers or the Red Guards that surrounded that building during the night?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. There had been Red Guards, but mostly Letts and sailors.

Senator NELSON. From the Kronstadt fleet?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. From the Kronstadt fleet.

Senator NELSON. And Letts?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Those were the soldiers they had that surrounded the constituent assembly?

Mr. MARTIUSZINE. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. We are very much obliged to you, sir.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Chairman, just at this point I would like to call the committee's attention to the fact that Col. Hurban, the military attaché of the Czecho-Slovak legation, has presented a statement which he requests to be incorporated into the record with regard to two or three of the statements made by Col. Robins this morning as to the official act of the Czecho-Slovak army. In this statement Col. Hurban points out that he was a member of the Czecho-Slovak national council which entered into the agreement with the Bolsheviki government relative to the withdrawal of the Czecho-Slovak army. It is merely a statement of fact replying to two or three of those statements and I do not want to take the time to read it but request that it be put into the record in justice to Col. Hurban.

Senator Overman. We agreed to allow him to make a statement and it may go in.

(The statement referred to is here printed in the record as follows:)

In the interest of the truth, I wish to correct parts of the statement made by Colonel Robins before the Overman Senate Committee.

Colonel Robins stated: "The Soviet government granted free passage to the Czechoslovaks through Archangel and Murmansk, not through Siberia."

This is incorrect. The Czechoslovak National Council, of which I was a member at that time, made an agreement with the Soviet government on the 26th of March, 1918, guaranteeing the passage of our army through Siberia. We desired to prove our neutrality in the civil war, and our loyalty to the Soviet as the de facto government by disarming and we disarmed. This circumstance is the best proof of our loyalty.

Archangel could not be considered, because the port was frozen and the northern regions could not feed an army of 60,000 men. Murmansk could not be taken into consideration, because the Germans were 80 versts from Petrograd. Finland was under control of the Germans, and it was a strategic impossibility to fight our way through on the Murman railway. More than this, the Murman railway was in such condition that it would have required about half a year to transport 60,000 men over it. Besides, the Murman railway ran through a famine region.

Only at the end of May, as the head of our army had reached Vladivostok and the rear was in the region of Penza, a distance of more than 6000 miles apart, the Soviet government proposed that part of our army, namely, that which was west of Omsk, should be directed toward Archangel. At this time we had many documentary proofs of the treachery of the Soviet government, and it has been unanimously rejected by the whole army. This is the truth.

Colonel Robins stated: "Trotzky's order to disarm completely the Czechoslovaks was issued as a consequence of the fact that the 15,000 Czechoslovaks which reached Vladivostok did not sail but started to go back to fight the Soviet government."

This is incorrect. At the time of the above-mentioned agreement with the Soviet government, of the 26th of March, 1918, we received the first proof of the prepared Bolsheviki treachery, provoked by the pressure of the Germans. The commander of the Bolsheviki army which was sent to Penza to disarm 'us (His name was Cohan. He was afterwards killed by order of the Penza Soviet) communicated with us to the effect that there was a plan to disarm us and deliver us to the Austrian and Germans. He stated that he knew we were not the enemies of the Soviet, that we only wanted to get out from Russia. He explained that the Soviet government was forced to act in this way because it was at the mercy of the Germans.

In the beginning of May Commissioner Tchicherin gave an order to the Siberian Soviets to stop our trains, and to let pass only German and Austrian prisoners. On the 27th of May our trains were attacked in different places—Penza, Celjabinsk, and Irkutsk—by order of Trotzky. The 15,000 men in Vladivostok were still neutral; and three members of the Czechoslovak National Council, of whom I was one, continued to deal with the Soviet government in Siberia in an effort to stop the quarreling. Only as Trotzky arrested our delegates sent to Moscow to deal with him, and the rear trains of our army were attacked, mainly by Germans and Magyars, released prisoners armed by Soviets, the 15,000 Czechoslovaks in Vladivostok started to move westward to help their betrayed brothers. This was at the end of June. This is the truth.

Colonel Robins, in his statement about Czechoslovaks, paid words of tribute to their heroism and right to fight against Germany and Austria. I appreciate his words; but he stated also that "everyone is stating how Bolshevis are terrorizing and shooting people, but nobody says anything about the terror caused by the Czechoslovaks in shooting Bolsheviki." With all firmness, I reject this general accusation, and I reject the comparison with the Bolsheviki tactics. The Bolsheviki admit terror officially as a weapon against their adversaries. We disclaim any terror.

Colonel Robins must know that thousands and thousands of Russian Bolshevik Red Guards had been captured and disarmed by us, but were not punished nor interned in camps, but released to go home to make their peace work.

Colonel Robins must know that after disarming the Vladivostok Soviet troops we not only let them go home, but allowed them to make big funeral demonstrations for the Bolsheviki killed in action, and we released from prison where he was held as a hostage the Soviet head, Suchanow, to make speeches at these funerals.

Germans and Magyars in the Red Army were not considered by us as fighters for Russian Soviets, but as our old enemies.

Everybody who has been in this war, not at a desk but in places where human life is at very low price, knows and considers it natural that there occur different atrocities and irregularities made mainly by small groups of irresponsible people. It would be naive and academic if I would absolutely deny that some of our soldiers in different places did unlawful things. No army chief can deny this of his army. But everything was done by our command and our volunteer soldiers themselves to avoid, diminish, and punish such cases.

I think it is unjust to generalize from single cases, and not to see our general attitude toward the misled Russian people.

The above-mentioned cases illustrate truthfully the attitude of the whole Czechoslovak army, toward the Bolsheviks.

COLONEL VLADIMIR S. HUBBAN,
Military Attaché of the Czechoslovak Legation.

MARCH 7, 1919.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Hatzel.

TESTIMONY OF MR. FREDERICK H. HATZEL.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Hatzel, where do you reside?

Mr. HATZEL. Long Island.

Mr. HUMES. Were you in Russia recently?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMES. During what period of time?

Mr. HATZEL. From September, 1916, to the 16th of May, 1918.

Mr. HUMES. In what capacity were you serving in Russia during that time?

Mr. HATZEL. I served in a machine shop and ammunition shop and also in the service of the Red Cross under Col. Robins.

Mr. HUMES. In the service of the Red Cross, what was your capacity?

Mr. HATZEL. In charge of the warehouse.

Mr. HUMES. The warehouse of the Red Cross?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMES. Were you during that part of the time working under the direction of Col. Robins?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMES. And secondly under the direction of Maj. Wardwell?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMES. Now to digress just a moment. You heard the statement a moment ago of the last witness with regard to seizing furniture and the looting of houses.

Mr. HATZEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMES. Supplementing that, will you state what disposition was made by the government of the furniture that was taken from those houses from time to time, as you saw it and knew it?

Mr. HATZEL. During the time mentioned, in Petrograd the Bolsheviks opened commission houses, that is, stores where all stolen goods which were stolen by the Red Army were sold back to the public from whom they were stolen, and that was the way the furniture and all sorts of articles were disposed of.

Mr. HUMES. Did they have just one store for this, or many?

Mr. HATZEL. Many.

Mr. HUMES. To go back to the beginning of the Bolshevik revolution, will you just state briefly and in your own way what the situation was in Petrograd, and what you saw there in reference to the operation of the government?

Mr. HATZEL. At the time of the Kerensky overthrow of the government, there was considerable firing and carousing in the streets of Petrograd. In the first place, wine cellars were raided. In these instances Bolshevik troops, if they saw persons with bottles under their arms, would shoot them. I have seen in front of the Marensky Palace, one of the large theaters in Russia, three men shot for carrying bottles.

Mr. HUMES. What was the food situation?

Mr. HATZEL. The food situation was bad. Of course cards were issued for everything—sugar, meat, bread, butter, and the like. Meat and butter you could hardly receive, and potatoes were just as scarce. For bread you probably would have to stand in line for three or four hours, sometimes longer, and then get an eighth of a pound.

Senator NELSON. An eighth of a pound?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes. Sometimes it was so soggy that it would probably be a mouthful—black bread.

Mr. HUMES. Go on and describe the operations there.

Mr. HATZEL. Also kerosene. The poorer classes in Petrograd have no electric light or gas in their houses. They use kerosene lamps. They also had to stand in line for kerosene. You were allowed only a certain amount, and if you did not get there in time it was gone, and you were without light. As to electricity, the Bolsheviks allowed it for certain hours, from 8 at night until 12, but during the rest of the day there was no power and no factories could run.

Mr. HUMES. You say you worked in a factory. What factory?

Mr. HATZEL. The Pneumatic Machine Tool Co., the one operated by Mr. Leuche, an American citizen.

Mr. HUMES. What was manufactured?

Mr. HATZEL. Pneumatic tools, the same as the Chicago Pneumatic Tool Co. manufactures.

Mr. HUMES. Was that plant in operation when you left?

Mr. HATZEL. It was closed when I left.

Mr. HUMES. About when did they close?

Mr. HATZEL. Two months after the overthrow of the old régime—that is, May—and I have a paper to the effect that if the factory should open in two months all the old workers would be received back again. However, the factory did not open. The motors were taken out of the shop by the Bolsheviks.

Mr. HUMES. For what purpose?

Mr. HATZEL. That I do not not know. They were taken out by the Red Guards.

Senator STERLING. How many men were employed in that institution?

Mr. HATZEL. We had about 400 men, one factory. We also were turning out parts of ammunition for the French military mission—that is, firing heads for 3-inch shrapnel shells. Also electrical apparatus, wiring, small motors. Lots and lots of that was also stolen. Money was confiscated out of the shops. The workmen, the working committee—of which every shop had a committee—had nothing to say. The chairman of each of these committees was in the local soviet. The chairman of ours happened to be a social revolutionist. He later on was shot. I did not see it done, but he was shot.

Senator STERLING. For what reason, do you know?

Mr. HATZEL. No reason whatever. Probably because he was a social revolutionist.

Senator STERLING. Did he have any trial?

Mr. HATZEL. No trial. One day I was walking past the canal called the Fontanka, going down to the Red Cross warehouse, and I saw a crowd of men and women yelling like fiends, you might say, and they had a long pole and were pushing it up and down in the water, and I asked one of the men what they were doing and he said they were just killing a thief. The man probably wanted some bread or something like that, and had stolen something. The answer to that was that he was thrown into the canal and poked down into the canal with this long pole.

Then again it went on that no person could carry any packages. If a person was seen with a package the Bolsheviks or the Red guards took it away from him.

Then came the order for the people to open their apartments to the search of the Red Guards for arms and ammunition, and in this search they were not content to take merely arms and ammunition, but they took supplies that the people had stored away against a little harder times.

Senator STERLING. Were you associated with Mr. Robins over there?

Mr. HATZEL. Well, I was not directly under the command of Mr. Robins. I was under Capt. Magnuson and Maj. Wardwell.

Senator STERLING. You saw many of these things that he did not see, evidently?

Mr. HATZEL. I was out among the people all the time. In fact I had 20 workers in the warehouse on this condensed milk all the time until it was completed.

Senator STERLING. You had better opportunity to know what was going on that he did?

Mr. HATZEL. I believe so. He was inside and I had it from the outside.

Also this private car that was transferred to the tracks near this warehouse. I personally was asked to stay in that car to see that the Bolsheviks did not try to get our supplies. I stayed there in that car, and I had these five rifles with me. This was the car that went to Jassy, and I had those same five rifles. I have no doubt they were the same rifles that he mentioned on the train going to Siberia.

Nothing happened the first few weeks, but toward the end when the milk supply was nearly finished, the Bolsheviks came around to the warehouse and a young gentleman by the name of Orris, speaking fluent English—he had also been to Jassy on this supply train—came into the warehouse to take over charge of the milk and things. My duty in supplying milk was finished, getting the milk ready for distribution. New labels had to be put on instead of the original Borden labels, a special label that stated it was from the Red Cross, free, and not to be sold. Anyone caught selling it was to be liable to arrest. It was to prevent speculation, I suppose.

We had a few cans more than he estimated. There were, I think, 500,000 cans. The Bolsheviks came around. We had the Roumanian supplies; warm clothing, coats, blankets, and stockings, which were held up, I believe, pending some kind of authority from Roumania to ship them; and also about 3,000 barrels of salted beef and meat. I heard later, from what I learned from Orris, that this all fell into the hands of the Bolsheviks. The warm clothing the same way; it was taken by force—that is, the warehouse was broken into and it was taken.

Senator STERLING. Col. Robins gave us no account of that.

Mr. HATZEL. I was here at the time, but I do not know whether he forgot it or what it was; but it was done. That is the fact. If Orris were in this country he could tell more about it than I can.

Senator NELSON. They broke in and took the salted beef and the warm clothing?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes; the salted beef. Out of 3,000 barrels, six barrels were given to the Salvation Army. Eventually that meat fell into the hands of the Bolsheviks. Would it not have been better right at the start, when conditions were bad in Petrograd, to give that meat to the Russian public through the cooperation of the American Red Cross and open it for that purpose than to let it fall into the hands of the Bolsheviks?

Senator NELSON. That would not have helped the Bolsheviks.

Mr. HATZEL. No; it would not, of course. But evidently it did.

Senator OVERMAN. It has been stated here that some supplies were asked for by the American colony and denied. Do you know whether it was so or not?

Mr. HATZEL. I happened to visit Dr. George Simons one night after work. He has testified before the committee. He said to me, "Mr. Hatzel, do you know of any supplies—Red Cross supplies—in Petrograd?" I said, "Yes." "Where are they?" "They are in the warehouse, and I am in charge of the warehouse." He said, "What! Col. Robins told me to-day that all the supplies had been transferred to Moscow." I said, "That is funny. You had better come down to look at the stock yourself." And he came down the next day, and he took an account of just what was there, so many boxes of this and so many of that.

Senator NELSON. Were you with him?

Mr. HATZEL. I was with him.

Senator NELSON. And the goods were there?

Mr. HATZEL. And the goods were there.

Senator STERLING. How many and what kind of goods were there?

Mr. HATZEL. Why we had cases of sardines, cases of canned meat, barrels of sugar, barrels of ham, that is small kegs of ham, and of bacon.

Senator NELSON. Flour?

Mr. HATZEL. Flour. I think we had 60 of these 200-pound bags of flour. Of course all this was in the name of Col. Thompson, who commanded previous to Col. Robins.

Senator NELSON. He had left before that?

Mr. HATZEL. He had left.

Senator NELSON. So that practically the supreme command was in the hands of Col. Robins?

Mr. HATZEL. Practically so. Well, when Dr. Simons had seen these supplies he went to Col. Robins and asked him in plain everyday language why he had lied to him. Robins said that they were not there. Dr. Simons replied, "I have just seen them." He said, "Well, I did not know about them." So Dr. Simons asked for some supplies there in the warehouse saying, "Now I want supplies. Can I have them or not, not only myself, but here is a list of the American colony in Petrograd. These people are all asking for food." He mentioned one in particular, Bodrie. Bodrie is in jail now for trying to get condensed milk into Russia. That was against the Bolshevik plans. He was married and had a small child and that child had to have something to eat, but he could not get it and Dr. Simons says, "Now that man needs it. Can he have it?" He was told emphatically, "No."

Senator NELSON. By whom was he told "No"?

Mr. HATZEL. According to Dr. Simons it was Col. Robins.

Senator NELSON. And did Mr. Simons get any of those supplies?

Mr. HATZEL. Not at that time. Then Col. Robins I believe left for Vologda and the supplies that were remaining were turned over to the National City Bank, in charge of Mr. Stephens. Then Dr. Simons applied to him. He said, "Simons, I know no more about these provisions than you do. I do not know who is to get them yet. I have telegraphed Robins to let me know, and I have not heard." Dr. Simons said, "All right, I will wait until you get an answer." However, no answer was received. Four or five days after that Col. Robins came back. But the next day he left again and left Maj. Wardwell in charge. Maj. Wardwell afterwards distributed all the supplies in certain proportions to people of the American colony.

Senator NELSON. After Robins had left?

Mr. HATZEL. After Robins had left.

Senator NELSON. Did he leave for good?

Mr. HATZEL. For good.

Senator NELSON. Did not come back after that?

Mr. HATZEL. That was before May 1.

Senator NELSON. Which way did he go?

Mr. HATZEL. I believe he went toward Moscow.

Senator NELSON. After he had gone, then the goods were all distributed by Maj. Wardwell, you say?

Mr. HATZEL. That is it.

Senator NELSON. Among the Americans?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes. We also had an Englishman in the office by the name of Henley. This Englishman and quite a few other Englishmen have been seen by Americans in Petrograd when they had visited their houses to always have a certain large amount of American Red Cross supplies. So there were Englishmen who were getting supplies, but here were American citizens who could not get them.

Senator NELSON. Did you have any orders from Col. Robins about what you should do with the goods there?

Mr. HATZEL. No, sir. I was in charge of the warehouse and I was to store up the cars when they left and I was to get milk out. That was as far as the position carried me. I will admit Capt. Magneson had delivered some supplies to me, which I distributed among a few American friends of mine. But I understood, and I doubt if there was any person receiving any supplies outside the Red Cross. And it is certain that Mr. Henley in the office said that Col. Robins had left and had turned the distribution over to Maj. Wardwell.

Senator STERLING. You say American friends of yours resident in Petrograd?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes.

Senator STERLING. In business there?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes, sir; but I do not know in what capacity, as I never questioned them.

Senator NELSON. Can you account for Col. Robins failing to distribute the supplies among the Americans or concealing that he had them?

Mr. HATZEL. I do not know.

Senator NELSON. Did he ever give any explanation?

Mr. HATZEL. When a man sees provisions with his own eyes and then is told to his face that they were not there, there must be some reason for doing it.

Senator NELSON. Maybe the Bolsheviki needed them.

Mr. HATZEL. Probably so.

Senator STERLING. Did you know of his visits to Lenine and Trotsky?

Mr. HATZEL. I knew every time I asked where Col. Robins was I was told that he was with Lenine and Trotsky or some one else. I never saw him in the hotel once from December to May. He was talked about over there as being a Bolshevik sympathizer, though I myself knew nothing about it.

Senator NELSON. Was that the talk among the American colony?

Mr. HATZEL. Among the Russian people.

Senator NELSON. They regarded him as a friend of the Bolshevik government?

Mr. HATZEL. Absolutely.

Senator NELSON. Can you talk Russian?

Mr. HATZEL. Not excellently. But I talk Russian enough to get along in conversation.

Senator NELSON. Are you understood?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. You could understand what they said?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. And the impression among the Russians over there was that he was a friend of the Bolshevik government?

Mr. HATZEL. Positively.

Mr. HUMES. What evidence did you see in Petrograd, during the time you were there, of violence or terrorism?

Mr. HATZEL. Why, of violence—there was a party who was an policeman who at the time of the revolution was not killed, but was put in prison. He managed to escape somehow or other and came back. This gentleman was killed on the spot, and found feet uppermost in an ash can on the street without any word whatever. He was shot by a Red Guard from the window. A man living in the same house where I was passed the scene and told me about it half an hour after it occurred.

Also in the night time many were executed on the streets. You would be walking along on one side and somebody would call to you, "Who are you? What are you?" If you said Bolshevik, or socialist, he might be just the opposite to what you said and shoot you. That occurred in a great many cases. In fact I myself crawled into a doorway on my knees three times, and right on the Nevski Prospect. That is their Broadway.

Mr. HUMES. Why?

Mr. HATZEL. Probably party hatred.

Mr. HUMES. Because of an attack made upon you?

Mr. HATZEL. Not an attack. But the question was thrown at me from across the street. You know there are no neutral people to the Bolsheviks. You are an enemy to the government if you are not a Bolshevik, no matter who and what you are.

Mr. HUMES. What about the newspapers over there?

Mr. HATZEL. As far as I know in Petrograd there were quite a few papers suppressed at the time I was there, but afterwards were allowed to reopen and publish their newspapers.

Mr. HUMES. Under what control? Under the original control or under the control of the Bolsheviks?

Mr. HATZEL. That I do not know.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know how many papers were suppressed in Petrograd while you were there?

Mr. HATZEL. There were three.

Mr. HUMES. Were you in any other part of Russia?

Mr. HATZEL. Outside of Finland, no.

Mr. HUMES. I believe you said that you had a number of peasants who were working with you, employed at the Red Cross storehouse?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. From your talk with them what was their attitude? Were they Bolsheviks?

Mr. HATZEL. No; emphatically no. These young girls had come up to Petrograd to get work and try to make some money and also earn a living for themselves. Of course they had heard probably all over Russia that in Petrograd they had much money and were paying large wages. We paid these girls 10 rubles a day, which was big money for the time. They came to Petrograd thinking they could get something to eat, not knowing the circumstances. Petrograd at that time was practically starving. No doubt Dr. Simons mentioned the American dying in Petrograd of starvation.

Mr. HUMES. Did you ever see anyone dying of starvation?

Mr. HATZEL. No; but this gentleman had died. An old gentleman, I believe in control of the Danish Telegraph Co. in Russia, came to me in my home—I lived on the same street that he did—and asked me for supplies. He asked the Red Cross for a few things and was refused. Finally, when all the supplies were distributed he received his portion. But he could not be expected to live on that forever.

as he was an old man. Of course under the present conditions he probably weakened and died. That was all there was to it.

Mr. HUMES. What about the cattle and horses about Petrograd?

Mr. HATZEL. Why, these drosky drivers had a union, and they had agents in different parts of the country where they could get their straw and hay and oats, and they complained at the prices of things and the scarce quantity.

Mr. HUMES. You left there in June, did you?

Mr. HATZEL. In May, 1916, and left Russia in June.

Mr. HUMES. Up to that time had the conditions got so that horses were dying on the streets?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes. In fact, the poor people when they would see horses drop in the streets, would go out and cut them up for meat. That was done right in sight of the Red Cross warehouse, and seen by Capt. Magneson and myself. They were left there, not carted away to the incinerating plant and burned. They were left there.

Mr. HUMES. And the horse flesh was used by the people for food, was it?

Mr. HATZEL. Oh, yes. They have stores right there where they sell horse meat. Down at the slaughterhouse it was about all they were killing. It was the only kind of business they had, slaughtering horses for the consumption of the people.

Mr. HUMES. What knowledge have you as to the character of the forces that make up the Red Army. Do you know whether or not—did you see any Chinese in the Red Army?

Mr. HATZEL. No, I never saw any Chinese in the Red Army. I know in Petrograd there are quite a few of them in the Red Army. Also that the Red Army is an army of workingmen and criminals. They pay them workingmen's wages. They raised the workingman's wages to 250 rubles a week, and he is getting the same salary in the Red Army. They were paying the workers so much that the factories had to shut down and the workers joined the Bolsheviks.

Mr. HUMES. During the time you were in contact with the workmen, while you were working in this factory, during your association with them, and after you went to work for the Red Cross, did you hear any discussion among them as to their attitude toward the Bolsheviks?

Mr. HATZEL. All were against them; that is, all of the shop delegates I came in contact with were against Bolshevism. They were of this Left party of the social revolutionists.

Mr. HUMES. What was their attitude? Did they openly oppose the Bolsheviks or did they quietly submit?

Mr. HATZEL. It was practically murder and death to yourself if you opened your mouth against the Bolsheviks. There is no such thing as a trial there. They shoot first and ask questions later. If you open your mouth against the Bolsheviks and tell something about them you are liable to be shot or arrested right away. It has caused such a fear among the people that the people are practically suppressed. They can not say anything.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know whether or not any of these workmen that you have referred to as being opposed to the Bolsheviks joined the Red Army for the purpose of a livelihood?

Mr. HATZEL. I know of two.

Mr. HUMES. You know of two that actually joined the Red Army?

Mr. HATZEL. Both of them had fathers or brothers killed in the war. They were practically alone in the world and they had to get something. There was no work and they had to live, so they joined the Red Army.

Mr. HUMES. What factories were in actual operation in Petrograd when you left there?

Mr. HATZEL. There was the Russian Baltic Works.

Mr. HUMES. What did they make?

Mr. HATZEL. That was one of the gun factories, I believe, and also it made these cruisers for the navy. The Putiloff worked only about half the time.

Mr. HUMES. What did that factory make?

Mr. HATZEL. Ammunition. All the arsenals were closed.

Mr. HUMES. Were there any factories other than the munitions factories and the ordnance factories that were in operation?

Mr. HATZEL. No.

Mr. HUMES. Were the textile mills still in operation when you left, or closed up?

Mr. HATZEL. Coates's mill was the only mill that was running.

Mr. HUMES. That is a textile mill?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes; manufacturing thread. That is the only mill that was running. I believe later on that had to shut down, too, because the workers demanded so much money it was impossible to operate.

Mr. HUMES. But that was still in operation when you left?

Mr. HATZEL. Yes.

Mr. HUMES. What do you know about the looting of houses in Petrograd? You told us of the disposition that was made of the loot. What do you know about the looting itself?

Mr. HATZEL. In the first place, I would like to state a fact that was seen by my own wife and myself. Coming home from a visit one night, we saw a young woman walking over the bridge and she was stopped by three Red Guards, and her coat—a fur coat—and shoes and hat were taken away from her, and she had to walk three-quarters of a mile in her stocking feet to her home. They not only went to the homes to steal, they did it on the street. As one American said, "They will steal the shirt off your back if you are not looking."

Mr. HUMES. Did you ever see any houses looted?

Mr. HATZEL. I know of several that were looted. A man by the name of Ellman came home one night and found the owner of the apartment crying. He asked, "What is the trouble?" He replied, "A dozen Bolsheviks under probably an ignorant officer, a man who could not read and write, came in here and stole all my silverware." Mr. Ellman said, "Can you give me a paper showing just about what you lost and the value?" It came to something like 1,300 rubles, a small amount. Right next door to it was the place where the Soldiers and Workers' Deputies were sitting, and he took this paper there and he said, "Here is a house right next door to the council, and here are Red Army men coming around and stealing silver. Here is a list of what they took. I want it all back." They said, "We are not responsible for what the Red Guards do. They were probably off duty." The goods were never recovered, so far as I know.

Mr. HUMES. The owner did not get them back?

Mr. HATZEL. Never. But later on they probably were sold in these commission shops. One gentleman in Petrograd came home one night and his place had been robbed. He knew what was in the apartment. Among the things they took was a beautiful pair of opera glasses. About two weeks later he got back those opera glasses from one of these Bolshevik stores for about three times as much as he paid for them originally.

Mr. HUMES. How were those stores run, by the government itself?

Mr. HATZEL. Under the Red Guard or by Red Guards men in the stores.

Mr. HUMES. You do not know the disposition of the funds—how they were handled?

Mr. HATZEL. No, I do not know.

Mr. HUMES. Are you aware of an organized system of vice that was established in Petrograd. I do not know whether you told me or some one else.

Mr. HATZEL. An organized system of vice?

Mr. HUMES. In connection with restaurants that were opened up.

Mr. HATZEL. Yes, coffee houses, where they sell coffee and tea and the likes of that. These coffee houses were frequented by women of the disorderly class.

Mr. HUMES. Were those coffee houses private enterprises or government institutions?

Mr. HATZEL. Private, but a majority of them were closed and opened up again and believed to be under the Bolshevik government. I myself, for a fact, could not say.

Senator STERLING. Do you know the character of the houses after they were opened up?

Mr. HATZEL. Bad. They practically were bad before, too, but still more so under the Bolshevik régime.

Mr. HUMES. But you of your own knowledge do not know whether they were a government institution or simply a private enterprise?

Mr. HATZEL. No.

Mr. HUMES. I misunderstood the statement that you made before, but I do not care to go into it if you do not know that it is under official sanction.

Now, Mr. Hatzel, can you tell us any other instance of Bolshevik control as you saw it in Russia than you have related?

Mr. HATZEL. No; only, the thing is that the Bolshevik government instead of building up is always destroying. That is the kind of control they use; such as on a railroad where they previously had operated 20 trains for commuters in a day now they operate only five.

Mr. HUMES. Is not that because they have not the motive power and the transportation?

Mr. HATZEL. They have the motive power.

Mr. HUMES. It is out of commission, is it not?

Mr. HATZEL. No, as you go along the road you see plenty of locomotives standing on the tracks doing nothing, practically, except burning wood for the fun of it. That was on the Nikolai Railroad. As to other railroads I do not know.

Mr. HUMES. Do you know whether or not they had cars enough to make up trains to use those engines?

Mr. HATZEL. Passenger cars? No, I do not think they had.

Mr. HUMES. They had freight cars?

Mr. HATZEL. It was a common scene to see a passenger of the first class riding in the baggage car. That was first class. If anybody could get a private car or a day coach, even, they were considered lucky.

Mr. HUMES. I think that is all.

Senator NELSON. That is all. We are very much obliged to you.

(Thereupon, at 6 o'clock p. m. the subcommittee adjourned until tomorrow, Saturday, March 8, 1919, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.)

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met at 10.30 o'clock a. m., in room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), King, Nelson, and Sterling.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee will come to order. I do not think Ambassador Francis has arrived, has he?

Mr. HUMES. I have not seen him. Senator.

Senator OVERMAN. I do not think he has; I have not seen him. If you can go on with some other witness until he gets here, do so.

Mr. HUMES. Mr. Saylor.

TESTIMONY OF MR. OLIVER M. SAYLER.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Mr. HUMES. Where do you live?

Mr. SAYLER. My home is Indianapolis.

Mr. HUMES. What is your business?

Mr. SAYLER. My profession is that of a newspaper man. For six or seven years I have been dramatic editor of the Indianapolis News.

Mr. HUMES. Have you recently been in Russia, and if so, during what period of time?

Mr. SAYLER. I left for Russia on the 27th of September, 1917, from Vancouver; for Siberia, Russia. I arrived in Vladivostok the last week in October. I crossed Siberia by the Trans-Siberian Railroad; arrived in Moscow during the Bolshevik revolution; was in Moscow until the 21st of February, 1918. On that day I went to Petrograd, remained a few days, found the embassy packing to fly for safety because the Germans were coming; decided that the place would be interesting for a newspaper man and comparatively safe with the mobility of one who simply carries what he has in his hand, and decided to stay, and did stay about 10 days after the embassy had gone to Vologda. I happened to know 8 or 10 other Americans who stayed, and there may have been more.

On the 6th of March I took the train for Vologda to confer with Ambassador Francis, spent the day in that town, and returned to Moscow in time for the meeting of the Soviet congress, which met to ratify the treaty of Brest-Litovsk.

I stayed in Moscow until the 24th of March, Sunday. On that day I started homeward by way of Siberia. For three or four days we were en route to Samara. At Samara I turned south into the central part of Asia.

I got off, stayed in Samara 10 days, waited for some civilized means of travel to turn up, to proceed eastward, and finally boarded an international sleeping car, under orders from the French Government, in which several places had been reserved for Americans. On that car, hitched to train after train and to engine after engine for a space of three or four weeks I traveled eastward through Siberia, seeing a great deal of the country because of the numerous and long stops at the large stations and the small stations.

One day I spent in Irkutsk, the old capital of Siberia, and parts of other days in nearly all of the other cities and towns along the way.

When we reached the territory east of Lake Baikal we found that Col. Simoens had cut the main line of the Trans-Siberian Railroad. As you know, that runs through Chinese territory.

Senator NELSON. That is Manchuria?

Mr. SAYLER. Yes; Chinese territory. Manchuria, literally; but it is under the jurisdiction of the Chinese Republic.

Since the war, however, with the aid of hundreds of thousands of Austrian prisoners, a new strategic line of railroad has been constructed in Russian territory all the way to Vladivostok, following the course of the Amur River, about 50 miles to the north thereof. We took this railroad. You would not call it a railroad. A little bit later when I go into the details of the demoralization of everything in the Russian scene, I want to tell you a little bit more of that railroad and its conditions. It required eight days instead of one to get around to the point whereby we could go down into Manchuria and out either through Korea or China. I myself chose China, and left Russian soil at Harbin, because Harbin was on the railroad and under Russian jurisdiction, although in Manchuria. This was on the 1st of May, 1918.

Mr. HUMES. Will you tell us what the conditions were that you found when you reached Moscow?

Mr. SAYLER. May I explain in just a few words the conditions under which I went to Russia and the purpose for which I went to Russia? I think it will make plainer exactly what my testimony is worth, and possibly will avoid questions at a later point, when I am trying to develop some other issue.

Senator OVERMAN. We have not much time. We want to know exactly what you saw, and the conditions over there.

Mr. SAYLER. Very good. Let me make just this one statement, that I went independently of any organization, any corporation, or any individual. I went to Russia because I was interested in Russia and wanted to see what was going on. Therefore I took leave of absence, although maintaining my connection with my newspaper.

Senator NELSON. You did not go, then, as the real representative of that newspaper?

Mr. SAYLER. I did not.

Senator NELSON. You went on your own hook?

Mr. SAYLER. I went on my own hook to see what was going on.

Senator NELSON. What is the name of your newspaper?

Mr. SAYLER. The Indianapolis News.

Senator OVERMAN. Just go on and state the conditions. That is what we want to know.

Mr. HUMES. Proceed and state in your own way the conditions as you saw them and the things that you saw at the different points in Russia.

Mr. SAYLER. I want to insist in advance, Senators, that I am no Bolshevik. I am dead against everything they are doing and the way they are doing it.

Senator NELSON. You need not mind that. We will judge of that by what you say. We will judge whether you are a Bolshevik by what you tell us.

Mr. SAYLER. Very good. I do feel, however, that the truth should be told about Russia.

Senator NELSON. We will determine that. You tell us what you know.

Mr. SAYLER. I should like to paint a picture with two sides, for you gentlemen.

Senator NELSON. No; I object to that. Let this witness give us facts—what he knows.

Senator OVERMAN. Tell us what you saw.

Mr. SAYLER. I want to include those facts in these two categories.

Senator OVERMAN. We are not taking pictures. We want facts.

Senator NELSON. This is not a movie show.

Mr. SAYLER. I understand that, gentlemen. I simply want to group these facts under two heads; that is all, if I may state it in that way.

Senator OVERMAN. Ambassador Francis wants to be heard now.

Mr. SAYLER. I am perfectly willing.

Senator OVERMAN. So please stand aside.

TESTIMONY OF MR. DAVID R. FRANCIS.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Senator OVERMAN. I understand you want to be heard now, so that you can get away?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes. Shall I go ahead and make my statement?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes. You are the Ambassador from this country to Russia?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; I am the ambassador from this country to Russia and have been since March, 1916. My commission bears date March 9, 1916. I was not an applicant for the ambassadorship, and consequently was greatly surprised when I was tendered it. I came to Washington and, after conference with the State Department, learned that they wished me to go to Russia in order to negotiate a commercial treaty, our previous commercial treaty having been revoked or abrogated, or, as they call it over there, denounced, by Mr. Taft, to take effect the 31st of December, 1912.

I accepted the tender of the ambassadorship and arrived in Petrograd on the 28th of April.

Senator OVERMAN. 1916?

Mr. FRANCIS. 1916. The man who had been acting as chargé, Mr. Frederick Morris Dearing, immediately presented me to the minister of foreign affairs, Mr. Sazonoff. I told Mr. Sazonoff that I wished to negotiate a commercial treaty, and had come for that purpose. He threw up his hands and said, "No more treaties until our relations with our allies are defined and determined." I remarked that if I had known that that was their policy I would not have come. He said he regretted it.

About a week after that I was presented to the Emperor, and to the Empress immediately after I was presented to the Emperor, at the Tsarskoe-Selo Palace, which is about 20 miles out of Petrograd. I did not make any more acquaintances with the royal family and never met any of the royal family except the Emperor and Empress, except the Grand Duke Boris, whom I met at an entertainment at the house of an American lady.

Three or four weeks after that the papers published a treaty between Russia and Japan, which had been negotiated by Sazonoff and Motono, the Japanese ambassador at Petrograd, who was the dean of the diplomatic corps. I saw Sazonoff immediately after the publication of that treaty and I said, "I thought you were not negotiating any more treaties." He said, "Oh, I meant commercial treaties." I said, "You did not say that to me."

About three weeks after that time I went to the foreign office again—having gone frequently in the meantime, but about three weeks after that I went to the foreign office again—to bid Sazonoff good-bye, because he was going away on a two weeks' leave up into Finland. He said he was not well.

On the morning of the 10th of July, our calendar, I opened a newspaper and saw that the Emperor had accepted Sazonoff's resignation. In other words, that was just the imperial way of removing him. I saw his resignation in the paper. Motono was afterwards recalled to Japan and made minister of foreign affairs. He was made a viscount; but there was no joy, no demonstration in Petrograd or in Russia over this treaty.

Germany had a commercial treaty with Russia which she demanded during the Russo-Japanese War, and which expired by limitation in 1916. It gave Germany great advantages, great commercial advantages, and there was decided opposition to its renewal. I have always thought that renewing that treaty was one of the causes that induced Germany to declare war against Russia.

I found that Germany already had such a foothold in Russia that I believe if the war had been postponed five years it would have been impossible to dislodge her. German spies permeated every department of the Imperial Government and did not relieve the military officers from espionage. The Grand Duke Nicholas, whom I never met, after he left office said that the German spies were so thick in his headquarters that he had to take extraordinary precautions to prevent his orders from being communicated to the Germans.

Senator OVERMAN. It has been stated that all the Russian plants, all the great industries in Russia, were superintended by Germans.

Mr. FRANCIS. The Germans controlled two or three banks in Petrograd. The Deutsche Bank owned a majority of the stock of the Russian Bank of Foreign Trade, and a majority of the stock of the International Bank was reported to be owned by them. I was told that by people who I thought knew. The Germans controlled all the commercial industries in Russia, and were not dispossessed of that control at the beginning of the war. The war, as you know, had been progressing over 18 months when I arrived there, having begun the 1st of August, 1914.

Under the Empire, and until we severed diplomatic relations with Germany, I, as American ambassador, represented German interests in Russia, and I also represented Austrian interests, and as such representative I had supervisory care of a million and a half of war prisoners in prison camps throughout Russia. The Russian Government fed those men and clothed them and housed them; but there were great complaints, and I sent inspectors around to those prison camps and had reports made to me. Of those million and a half of prisoners there were at no time over 250,000 of them Germans. The remainder, a million and a quarter, were Austrians.

I had direct charge of 350,000 aliens who were interned. By "interned" I mean that they were sent from their homes and confined to provinces and told to make their living the best way they could. Of those 350,000, 300,000 were Germans and not over 50,000 were Austrians.

The Germans had control of the sugar interests. They had control of the electric power plants at Moscow and at Petrograd and at Baku. They had absolute control of all the glass manufacturing throughout Russia, and most of the sales of manufactured products that America made to Russia had been made through Germany. American agents had located themselves in Berlin and in German towns; and, as I say, if this war had been postponed five years I think Germany would have had such a foothold in Russia that it would have been impossible to dislodge her. I found that state of affairs existing when I arrived there. I not only found that state of affairs existing, but I found suspicion existing as to the loyalty of the empress. I found a very deplorable state of affairs. Consequently, I was delighted, or I might say, pleased, when the first revolution took place. It was on our 12th of March. There had been some desultory firing before, but on the 12th of March a regiment, whose barracks were within two blocks of the American Embassy, mutinied and killed their colonel. The second division of the American Embassy, or the relief division, was quartered in the Austrian Embassy, and the man in charge of that division was the same man who is in charge of the Russian bureau in the State Department, Mr. Basil Miles. He phoned me that they had overrun the embassy; that some officers who were in the adjoining building, which was used for an arsenal, I think, had come into the building, and he said that he wanted a guard there. That was the beginning of the revolution. I phoned to the foreign office to send a guard down to the Austrian Embassy to protect the second division of the American Embassy, and the reply was that it would be sent immediately, but it never was sent. There was desultory firing through the streets. There was a barricade put up at Serguisky and Litaity, and regiments that were called upon to suppress these revolutionists immediately took the side of the revolutionaries. That was Monday, the 12th of March. The regiments came in from the front, but they were met by regiments of the revolutionary party at the station, and turned revolutionists. I was very much pleased with that. I was tired of the empire, and I thought the Russian people were tired of it.

On Thursday, the 15th of March, the Emperor abdicated, and the Duma, which the Emperor had attempted to prorogue, remained in its building, and appointed a committee that named a provisional government of seven or nine men. The provisional government was composed of Prince Lvoff, there was Prof. Miliukov, who was the minister of foreign affairs, Gutchkov, who was minister of war, Terestchenko, who was minister of finance, and Kerensky, minister of justice. I do not recall at the moment the names of the other ministers.

Senator STERLING. Rodzianko was one?

Mr. FRANCIS. No; he was not. He was chairman of the committee that appointed the ministers. I heard of the Emperor's abdication soon after it occurred, namely, on the 15th of March, which was Thursday. I called on Rodzianko on the following Sunday, and after talking with him some minutes, or half an hour, he referred me to Miliukov. I went out to ascertain the principles of that government and its prospective stability. Rodzianko told me it had come to stay. I saw Miliukov, and Miliukov said it had come to stay. I thereupon returned to my embassy. This was on the 18th of March. I sent in cipher a 200-word cable to the Government here recommending that I be permitted to recognize the provisional government, because it was founded on correct principles, it was just such a government as ours was, and it only was appointed to administer affairs during the period that might elapse between its installation and a meeting of the constituent assembly to be elected by the entire people. I further recommended to my Government that I thought it would be politic for me to be the first to recognize the provisional government.

We had not entered into the war then, you know. We had severed diplomatic relations with Germany, but not with Austria. This cable was received by the State Department on the 20th of March. I received a reply on the 22d of March saying that I could recognize the government. I immediately assembled my staff, including those who were entitled to wear uniforms—and those were only the military and naval attachés and their staffs—and I went up to the Marensky palace, where the ministry was assembled, at 4 o'clock that afternoon. I recognized it with all the formality that I could command, and received a reply through Miliukov, minister of foreign affairs, which reply indicated appreciation.

I knew Miliukov personally and I knew Rodzianko personally, and I was introduced there to Kerensky and the other ministers. That was the 22d of March. It was only 15 days after that that we entered the war, on the 6th of April, 1917, whereupon I received cables from the State Department to cease to represent Austrian interests. I had received instructions from the State Department to cease to represent German interests when we severed diplomatic relations with Germany, which I think was on the 4th of February, 1917. I immediately established close official and personal relations with the provisional government and maintained them during the following eight months, but I did not establish any relations whatever with the Bolshevik government, which came into power on the 7th of November, 1917. In fact, I recommended against it during the whole time. I continued to remain in Petrograd from the 7th of November until the 27th of the following February, 1918. I had no direct relations whatever with the Bolshevik or soviet government during that time, and, as I said, recommended to my Government to await the assembling or convening of the constituent assembly, which was fixed for the 27th of November. It had been fixed, I think, by the provisional government.

Senator NELSON. Of Kerensky?

Mr. FRANCIS. Of Kerensky. It was postponed until some day in December. When the date rolled around the Bolsheviki were in power and the ministry all imprisoned in the fortress of Peter and Paul except Kerensky, who had escaped from Petrograd in the meantime. Kerensky had become the president of the council of ministers. He first differed with Miliukov and put Miliukov out of the ministry of foreign affairs, whereupon Terestchenko was made minister of foreign affairs.

The first act of demoralization under the provisional government was the issuing of the General Army Order No. 1. Gutchkov as minister of war was held responsible for that order, but he maintains up to this time that it was issued without his knowledge. It was issued by the soviet. That order demoted all of the officers to the rank of soldiers and permitted the soldiers to elect their officers by a vote.

Senator NELSON. Was that of the Kerensky government?

Mr. FRANCIS. That was of the Kerensky government; and it was issued under Gutchkov. Some days after, Miliukov resigned. Miliukov was forced out of the cabinet because Kerensky differed with him. Kerensky had become very popular. He is a great orator. He had rescued a man from a mob, and said that as long as he was minister of justice no man should be punished without a fair trial. That made him exceedingly popular, and deservedly so, because such a state of affairs had not prevailed in Russia for 100 years or for centuries.

I found when I went there that the revolutionists who were nominally opposed to the government were in the pay of the Imperial Government as spies, a number of them. They were playing a two-faced game. Miliukov and Kerensky differed, and Miliukov resigned.

I went to Miliukov when the demonstrations began against him, and I said, "These demonstrations should not be permitted." He said his friends had waited upon him and had suggested a counter demonstration. I said, "Did you permit it? You should have done so." He said, "No; I did not permit it; I did not sanction it." He said further, "I am to speak at Marensky Palace to-night," and notwithstanding that he withheld his consent from a demonstration of his friends, his friends were in a majority there. He went back to the foreign office at 12 or 1 o'clock at night, and he had an ovation there and made a speech there. So I concluded that Miliukov was very well established in his office—was secure.

Senator STERLING. Could you say just what were the points of difference between Miliukov and Kerensky in matters of policy?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes. I did not dwell upon that because I did not want to take the time of the committee. Miliukov was the leader of the cadets. We would have called them conservative Democrats. Kerensky was a leading socialist. Miliukov made public a secret treaty that Russia had made with France and Italy and England whereby those three countries had agreed to turn over Constantinople and the Dardanelles to Russia, for which she had been fighting for centuries. Miliukov announced that such a treaty was in existence. Kerensky immediately took issue with that and said that Russia did not want to observe such treaties as that; that the Dardanelles should be free to the commerce of all nations, and Miliukov took the opposite stand. You know, they had differed very radically. They had both been leading members of the Duma, and they had differed very radically. Miliukov resigned. Terestchenko was made minister of foreign affairs, and some other man, whose name I do not recall, was made minister of finance. I heard about two weeks after that—I think it was two weeks—that Gutchkov had resigned also. I looked for him all day. I sent for him, telephoned for him, but could not find him. My object in seeking an interview was to tell him that it was cowardly to resign; that he could not afford to desert his colleagues in the hour when they needed him. I saw from the papers the next morning, being unable to find Gutchkov, that he had resigned; that his resignation had been accepted; and that Kerensky had been appointed minister of war.

Now, Kerensky was a lawyer. He did not know anything about the department that he was called upon to preside over. One of the first orders that he issued was a decree abolishing the death penalty in the army. That completed the demoralization of the army. Notwithstanding that, an uprising of the Bolsheviki on the 3d and 4th of July, which was our 16th and 17th of July, was suppressed. I saw some of the demonstration. The American Embassy was located in the heart of the city, and there were barracks all around there. There is where Kerensky made his mistake. He did not imprison Lenine and Trotsky and try them for treason, as he should have done. That was on the 3d and 4th of July—the night of the 4th or the night of the 3d, I forget which.

Lenine is the brains of this whole movement. He has a great intellect. He is a fanatic and I think has sincere convictions.

I could not say the same about Trotsky. I think Trotsky is an adventurer. He has great ability. He has more executive ability than Lenine, but when they have differed, Lenine has always been able to dominate Trotsky.

They kept in hiding until the 7th of November. An outbreak had been prophesied for the 2d of November, but it did not take place. I was at the foreign office on the 7th of November, and when I left the minister of foreign affairs I said, "Whose soldiers are those out there?" He replied, "They are our soldiers. I would not be surprised if we had an outbreak to-night." I said, "Can you suppress it?" He said, "I think so." I said, "I hope it will occur, if you can suppress it."

Senator STERLING. Who then was minister of foreign affairs?

Mr. FRANCIS. Terestchenko was minister of foreign affairs. I said, "I hope it will take place, if you can suppress it." He said, "I hope it will take place, whether we can suppress it or not, because I am tired of this uncertainty." This provisional government had been threatened all the time.

There is as much difference between the Bolshevik revolution and the provisional government as there was between the provisional government and the Imperial Government. The provisional government administered affairs from the 12th of March, the beginning of the revolution, or the 15th of March, when the ministers were appointed, until the night of the 7th of November, when they were captured in the Winter Palace and all imprisoned in Peter and Paul fortress. The Korniloff affair had taken place in the meantime, but you are not interested in that here.

Senator KING. Would you say, generally speaking, that the Kerensky government attempted to prosecute the war as vigorously as it could under the circumstances, and to be true to the allies?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think so, because you know the orders that I have mentioned, No. 1 and Kerensky's order abolishing the death penalty, had a demoralizing effect upon the army. I remember that on one occasion the ambassadors from Great Britain, France, and Italy went to see Kerensky, and they said that he was not prosecuting the war with sufficient vigor. He called upon me later to show his approval of my not joining with them in suggesting to him that he should put more vim into the prosecution of the war, because he said they knew he was doing all in his power up to that time. I have forgotten whether that was before or after he had been down to address the troops, and ordered an advance, and inspired an advance. That was attended with more or less success too, but these Bolsheviks were always trying to undermine the Kerensky government. They were assisted by the monarchists—by the Black Hundred—the Bolsheviks were.

Senator NELSON. And the Black Hundred was who?

Mr. FRANCIS. The Black Hundred was an organization that was for the protection of the dynasty.

Senator NELSON. Of the Czar?

Mr. FRANCIS. Of the Czar. They were sympathizing with the Bolsheviks because they thought the Bolsheviks would rule temporarily, if at all, and then it would be followed by a monarchy. They were never in favor of the provisional government, all the members of which were patriots and able men. You must remember that Russia, in addition to occupying one-seventh of the dry land of the earth, has 180,000,000 people, about 90 per cent of whom are uneducated, and the other 10 per cent of whom are overeducated. There is just that wide difference between them. There is a middle class, called the intelligentsia, and the Bolsheviks have been attempting to wipe out the bourgeoisie and the intelligentsia.

Senator KING. If you will pardon me, Mr. Ambassador, generally speaking, then, you would say that the Kerensky government stood for law and order and for the establishment of a democratic form of government something like our own?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly.

Senator KING. And that it was manned by patriots who earnestly sought the freedom of the people and the establishment of law and order and a stable democratic form of government; and that that government, so long as it was in power, attempted to do all that it could in the prosecution of the war and to stand by the side of the allies in fighting the central powers?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think so.

Senator KING. That while they were engaged in that laudable and proper effort the Bolsheviks, led by Lenine and Trotsky and others, were attempting to undermine them, primarily for the purpose of getting control and establishing a proletariat dictatorship and secondarily for the purpose of betraying the cause of the allies and getting Russia out of the war?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly. I wish to say here that I think that Lenin was a German agent from the beginning. They would never have permitted him to come through Germany if they had not thought or known they could use him. He disbursed money very liberally. Lenin, however, was not so opposed to Germany as he was in favor of promoting a world-wide social revolution. I wired the department that I thought that was his object in the beginning. He would have taken British money, American money, and French money and used it to promote this objective of his. He told a man who asked what he was doing in Russia that he was trying an experiment in government on the Russian people. He is a sincere man, with sincere convictions, I think. I do not think he is right by a good deal, because later, when his power was tottering and could not be maintained in any other way, he encouraged or permitted the reign of terror that is now prevailing in Russia.

Coming now to the Brest-Litovsk peace, in the first negotiations Russia was represented by Trotsky. I think they took place some time in January or February.

Senator NELSON. February, I think.

Mr. FRANCIS. February, 1918.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. FRANCIS. Trotsky gained a great deal of credit. He had the world for an audience, and he was very able. When Gen. Hoffman notified him and his colleagues that he would not prolong those negotiations more than two or three days further and said, "You will have to say definitely whether you will accept these terms or not," Trotsky made that dramatic stand of his, in which he said: "We decline to sign those severe peace terms, but Russia will fight no more."

Well, the Germans were stunned by that. Trotsky returned to Petrograd, and four or five days afterwards the Germans announced that they were marching on Petrograd and Moscow. Trotsky replied to them that they could not move without violating the terms of the armistice. Their reply was, continuing to move their armies, "You have already terminated the armistice by refusing to sign the peace terms."

The German Army advanced so near Petrograd that I left there. I had had authority from my government for four weeks to leave Petrograd whenever my judgment so dictated, and all my colleagues had. I had become dean of the diplomatic corps there, by the departure of Sir George Buchanan about the first of January, 1918. We were meeting in the American Embassy every day—not all of the allied chiefs, but the British and the French and the Italian and the Japanese ambassadors and myself and we all decided to leave Petrograd.

I said to them: "I am not going to leave Russia." "Where are you going?" I said: "I am going to Vologda." "What do you know about Vologda?" I said: "Not a thing, except that it is the junction of the Trans-Siberian Railway and the Moscow-Archangel Railway." "Well, if it is unsafe there, what are you going to do?" I said: "I am going east to Viatka, which is 600 miles east, and if it is unsafe there I am going to Perm, and if it is unsafe there I am going to Irkutsk, and if it is unsafe there I am going to Chita, and if it is unsafe there I am going to Vladivostok, where I know I will be protected by an American man-of-war—the Brooklyn—under Admiral Knight"; and I appealed to them to go with me. I said: "You ought not to leave Russia now." But they declined to go, except the Japanese Embassy and the Chinese legation, and they only stayed at Vologda two or three days. That was on their way home. The other missions were all attempting to get back to their respective governments. The British and the French and the Italians and the Belgians and the Serbians and the Portuguese and the Greeks attempted to get out through Finland, and they got into the midst of that civil war there, and they lived on trains for six weeks, when they joined me at Vologda, except the British Embassy, which got through the lines, and it came to Vologda on the 7th of July following. It was sent back there. The Japanese and the Chinese went on east after staying at Vologda two or three days, and I remained at Vologda five months, notwithstanding I was appealed to and invited several times by the central soviet at Moscow to make my headquarters there. They said that they would give us all villas.

But I am anticipating. When the first Brest-Litovsk peace negotiations were terminated, and the German army began to move on Petrograd and Moscow, the soviet government said they wanted another meeting to negotiate peace terms. Trotsky did not go that time, but he sent Tchitcherin, and the Germans forced upon the Russians even severer peace terms at the second conference at Brest-Litovsk than they had at the first.

Senator KING. Of course, in the meantime the Russians, under Lenine and Trotsky, had ceased to be a military force?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly.

Senator KING. They had withdrawn from any military operations, and betrayed the allies to that extent?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly; they betrayed the allies. When I went there, there was an army enlisted of 12,000,000 men. It was increased to 16,000,000 before the revolution, and there was a call for 3,000,000 additional, which had not matured when the Bolshevik revolution took place. Of those 16,000,000 men, 2,000,000 had been captured, and 2,000,000 had been killed and died from disease, so it reduced the army to about 12,000,000 men, which is an immense army. No army was ever organized that approached it before. We were all talking about demobilization when the war ended; but this army demobilized itself. It melted away like snow before a summer sun. When the second Brest-Litovsk peace was signed, these soldiers left their regiments. They would get on a train, and the train would start before they would ask where it was going. They sold their arms for a pittance; they threw their arms away, some of them, and some of them took their arms home with them.

Senator KING. Was that in pursuance of the plan of Lenine and Trotsky to destroy the army?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think it was.

As late as June, when I went to Petrograd from Vologda, when I came back the roofs of the cars were filled with soldiers and the trucks under the cars and the platforms were crowded with soldiers. I went to Moscow in May, to the funeral of our consul general, who died very suddenly down there. The soviet government attempted to communicate with me there, and I had received a subordinate who called on me, but I had no official relations with them.

In the meantime I had issued a proclamation or an address to the Russian people on the 17th of March, which was the day that the Brest-Litovsk peace treaty was ratified by the all-Russian congress of soviets at Moscow. I appealed to the Russian people to organize and repel the invader from their borders. I said that we Americans and my Government still considered the Russian people our allies; that we were not going to observe that peace, and I did not think any of the other allies were. I had that put in the Russian papers, translated into Russian; and about four days after that Kuehlmann, the minister of foreign affairs at that time, demanded of the soviet government that I be sent out of Russia. They said: "He is not only violating the laws of neutrality, but he has issued an address to the Russian people that is a virtual call to arms." The soviet government said nothing to me about it. I was not in communication with them at that time, but they replied that I had not said any more than the President had said in his address to the Russian people through this all-Russian soviet congress at Moscow. I have that telegram with me if you want to enter it on your records.

Senator OVERMAN. We should like to have it put in the record, because there has been some dispute about it.

Mr. FRANCIS. I will give it to you. It was a public matter over there. I will also give you my address to the Russian people. I should like to have that put in the record.

That was on the 17th of March. I had only been at Vologda then about 18 days. I arrived at Vologda the 28th of February, I think. I had been there 18 days when I issued this address to the Russian people. I issued another address on the 4th of July, 1918. I had had interviews before that, showing the progress that America was making toward preparedness and trying to convince the Russian people that the war would end in defeat for Germany, and consequently they should not tie up with the losing cause; but on the 4th of July I issued an address to the Russian people which recounted the causes for the war, I think. I have not a copy of that. I suppose it is in the department; but that elicited another demand of Germany on the central soviet at Moscow for my deportation. The central soviet did not say anything to me at that time about it nor have they ever mentioned it since.

I remained at Vologda.

Senator STERLING. Ambassador Francis, did they reply to it in any way through the newspapers or otherwise?

Mr. FRANCIS. They replied to the first demand by saying that I had said nothing more than the President had said, and by asking a question of the German Government, which was why they had violated the terms of the treaty in advancing into the Ukraine. Germany never observed any of the terms of that treaty that it was to her interest to violate. She continued to advance, and there were some secret treaties of an economic character between Germany and Russia.

Senator NELSON. Ambassador Francis, will you allow me to interrupt you a minute? You called attention a while ago to the fact that under the Kerensky government there had been held an election for a constituent assembly.

Mr. FRANCIS. I am going to get back to that.

Senator NELSON. All right. I want to know what became of that constituent assembly.

Mr. FRANCIS. I thank you, Senator, for reminding me of that. The convening of that constituent assembly was first fixed for the 27th of November, but it was postponed to some day in December. The day before it was to meet all of the cadet members who were in Petrograd were arrested as counter-revolutionaries. Some of them, anticipating arrest, had not come. Miliukov and Rodzianko and Kerensky had not come to Petrograd to the meeting of this constituent assembly. Consequently, the Bolshevik government said that it would not permit that constituent assembly to convene until—

Senator NELSON. Did they not surround the building in which they were with the red guards?

Mr. FRANCIS. Later they did that. They postponed the meeting then from this day in December until the 19th of January, 1918, and said that they would not permit it to organize if there were not 400 members present. There were 400 members present, and there was a great demonstration in Petrograd on the part of the people to manifest their joy on the assembling of a constituent assembly. The Bolsheviks were in the minority there; notwithstanding the cadets had not come, and some of the social revolutionists of the right had not attended, there were 423 members, I think, there. I can give you the exact number of members there. They had an election for officers. The Bolsheviks withdrew. They withdrew to the extent of 140 members, and still the remainder tried to organize. They elected Tchernoff presiding officer, and his opponent was a woman, Spirodonova, who was a left social revolutionist, and, when last heard from, was imprisoned by the Bolsheviks.

They organized. Tchernoff made a speech, and there were several speeches made. They passed a decree, passed several decrees, when a drunken sailor went in and said: "I am tired of this business. We want to go to bed." This was about 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning. "We will give you 10 minutes more." I do not say they said 10 minutes, but a few minutes more. Well, Bolshevik soldiers were around the corridors and in the aisles of the convention.

Senator KING. Armed?

Mr. FRANCIS. Armed. So they adjourned about 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning until 11 o'clock the next day, I think. It was a fixed hour the next day. But the next day the Bolshevik government took charge of this duma hall, and did not admit any of the members, and consequently broke up the constituent assembly.

Senator NELSON. Right there, Mr. Francis, has the Bolshevik government, since that time, ever attempted to have a constituent assembly elected or meet?

Mr. FRANCIS. No, sir. They have never since that time had a constituent assembly, or called an election for a constituent assembly.

The soviet is the name of a form of government, and Bolshevism is the name of a party, but they are used as synonymous terms all outside of Russia. One basic principle of the soviet government is that they do not allow a man to vote or a woman to vote—they have woman suffrage over there, you know—who employs another human being.

Senator KING. They have not permitted any voting at all since the distatorship of Lenine and Trotsky, have they? They have superimposed themselves and their government upon that part of Russia where they have exercised military power?

Mr. FRANCIS. Well, they have elected soviets, you know—local soviets.

Senator KING. I was speaking of the general government.

Mr. FRANCIS. Oh, the general government? No; there has been no election whatever since.

Senator KING. That is to say, Lenine and Trotsky, and those who are in control of the Bolshevik government, are not there as the result of a general election?

Mr. FRANCIS. No; no. They are there as usurpers.

Senator KING. By force and terror?

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not think they represent more than 10 per cent of the Russians.

Senator OVERMAN. Of the whole 180,000,000?

Mr. FRANCIS. Of the whole 180,000,000.

Senator KING. The constituent assembly which they prevented from meeting was a truly representative body, elected by the people?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly; as representative as it was possible to have at that time.

Senator KING. But elected, of course, under the Kerensky government?

Mr. FRANCIS. Well, elected under regulations framed and promulgated by the Kerensky government.

Senator KING. Yes.

Mr. FRANCIS. I think they were elected before the Bolshevik revolution.

Senator NELSON. Oh, yes; you are clear about that. They were elected before that.

Mr. FRANCIS. They were elected before that; yes.

Senator NELSON. Before the Bolshevik revolution; before the 7th of November.

Mr. FRANCIS. I thought the Kerensky government postponed the calling of the constituent assembly too long. They were in power six months, or at least five months, before they called the election. Kerensky moved into the Winter Palace, you know, and slept in the bed of Alexander III.

Senator KING. Generally speaking, Mr. Ambassador, what would you say as to what was being done, during that period when the Kerensky government was a power, by the Bolsheviks—by the revolutionary class led by Lenine and Trotsky?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think they were planning all the time to overturn that government and to take the administration of affairs into their own hands. Lenine was disbursing money freely. I said that I believed Lenine was a German agent. Subsequent developments have confirmed me in that belief.

Senator KING. You believe that Germany furnished him money for debauching his own country and to aid in betraying the allied cause?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly; I think she did. The poisoned chalice is being commended to Germany's own lips now.

Senator KING. What was the first thing that Lenine and Trotsky did, after getting control, toward the demobilization of the troops, and what announcement did they make as to the withdrawal of Russia from military operations?

Mr. FRANCIS. Well, after the negotiation of the Brest-Litovsk peace, and the signing thereof, the army was permitted to go home. They were promised peace; they were promised division of property, division of lands—

Senator OVERMAN. And bread.

Senator NELSON. Bread and peace and land.

Mr. FRANCIS. Bread and peace and land. One Russian landowner was telling me that they attempted to divide his herd of blooded cattle, and they came across a very fine bull that they could not agree upon as to which one should have it, so they killed the bull and divided the carcass.

Well, I remained at Vologda, as I said, until the 25th of July, after Mirbach was killed, which was on the 6th of July. Tchitcherin, about four or five days after that—he was the minister of foreign affairs of the central soviet in Moscow—sent me a telegram, addressing me as dean of the diplomatic corps, and said, "Vologda is unsafe. We invite you to come to Moscow, where we can give every man a villa. I am sending Radek to Vologda to execute the invitation." It was in English and he used the word "execute." My colleagues all considered it an order to come to Moscow from Vologda. I was disposed to consider it an invitation, and I prepared a reply to it, "We decline to come to Moscow. We consider Vologda perfectly safe, because we do not fear the Russian people, whom we have always befriended, and we do not fear the allies, of course. If your communication is meant for an order instead of an invitation, we consider it offensive."

I hoped by that telegram to save myself from the visit of Radek, but he appeared the next day. The direct communication of the rails between Vologda and Moscow had been cut by an uprising at Yaroslav, so they had to go around via Petrograd. Radek got there the next day, and I was having a meeting, in the American Embassy, of the allied chiefs. I tried to get them to go in to see him, but they would not go. They said that that was the prerogative and duty of the dean of the corps. So I went in and had a talk with him of about an hour. He was in my reception room.

I forgot to tell you that the municipal authorities of Vologda had given me a house for the American Embassy. It was the house of a commercial club. It was the most imposing structure in the town. They were very much complimented by my stopping there—by the American Embassy stopping there—and they felt deeply complimented when all of the other missions who had tried to get out through Finland joined me. It was about five months that I had stopped there.

Senator NELSON. That town was not under the control of the Bolsheviks?

Mr. FRANCIS. Well, the Bolsheviki controlled it the last two months or three months that we were there.

Senator NELSON. But at that time?

Mr. FRANCIS. At that time I spoke to the mayor and asked him if he was a Bolshevik, and he said he was not a Bolshevik, and that he was authorized by the municipal assembly, as we called it, to invite us to remain there, and that we would be protected; and he continued to administer affairs until we left there. But the local soviet was disposed to dispute his authority some time before we left. The French ambassador, whom I met in Paris—Jusserand—said, "You discovered Vologda; you put it on the map and made it the diplomatic center of Russia for five months." It was true. The others joined me there; but when Radik came up on the 12th of July—I think it was—he argued with me about going down. He was accompanied by an interpreter who was named Arthur Ransome. He was the correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, and I think his letters have been published in the New York Times, too. I called in my stenographer, Mr. Johnston, who was also my private secretary, and he took down the conversation. I told Radek, after listening to his conversation, that we had decided to refuse the invitation. He said, "I will station guards around all of your embassies"—they called all our legations embassies—"and no one will be permitted to go in or out without a passport." I said, "We are virtually prisoners, then." "No," he said, "you are not virtually prisoners. You can go in and out, and the chiefs can all go in and out; but when you desire anybody to come in here you will have to tell the local soviet the name of the man and they will give him a pass to enter through your guards."

The guards came there the next morning, or that same evening. I have forgotten whether they came that evening or the next morning. But the guards did not disturb us, because they were hungry, and we gave them food; so they were very accommodating to us.

The morning of the 23d of July, after midnight, I received another telegram from Tchitcherin: "Again we tell you Vologda is unsafe. Another day may be too late. Again we invite you to Moscow."

After consulting my colleagues and finding them of the same mind—I had a fear that they wanted to hold us as hostages down there, or at any rate to play us against the German and Austrian representatives at Moscow—I replied to him in six words: "We have determined to take your advice and quit Vologda."

We had planned to go to Archangel. I did not state in the telegram where we proposed to go. I had had a special train on the Vologda track for five months, and my transportation man had told me that the station master, with whom we made friends, would furnish him a locomotive on an hour's notice to take that train on any road that we wished that had tracks in the Vologda station. I sent for him after telling my colleagues to send their baggage down to the train before 6 o'clock and that the train would leave at 8. I called in this transportation man and I said, "You told me sometime ago that this station man promised you a locomotive for this train." I said, "I want that locomotive attached to this train to-night at half past 7, and I want it to leave at 8."

He left me and came back in an hour and said that the station man had left on a vacation and that the man he had left in charge said that he could not get a locomotive without submitting the request to Moscow, and Tchitcherin had given orders to the director of locomotive power that he must not put a locomotive on this train. I told him to submit it to Moscow, and they submitted it, and the reply was, "Who wishes the locomotive?" I replied to this—my transportation man was speaking and I replied to them—"The American ambassador." "Where does he wish to go?" I replied, "To Archangel."

Then he sent me a telegram, "Archangel is not a fit place for ambassadors to live. Going to Archangel means leaving Russia. Again we invite you to Moscow."

Well, I replied to him that I would not leave Russia unless compelled to do so by force, and then my absence would be temporary. I ended the telegram: "Again we request the locomotive." Well, we had slept on the train in the station—all the diplomatic corps—the preceding night, and the locomotive was furnished us about 1 o'clock in the morning on the 25th of July. We had intended to leave on the 23d of July, you know, but we did not leave until the 24th, and it was past midnight when we left.

We went up to Archangel, and on arriving at Archangel we were met by a delegation from the local soviet, accompanied by a representative of the Moscow soviet who pointed to a boat on the Dvina River and said, "There is the boat. We are instructed to put you on that boat, and direct your attention to that boat and to say that you can use the boat to go where you wish." I said, "We refuse to go on that boat." "Why?" "Well," I said, "we do not want to leave Russia until we can communicate with our Government, with which cable communication has been severed for three weeks." "Well," they said, "we have no other orders." We were 140 in number, counting attachés and domestics. I said, "Moreover, that boat is not big enough for us." They said, "We will give you an additional boat;" which they did. They said, "What are we to do?" I said, "I do not know what you are to do, except to go and report what we say to the Moscow soviet, to Lenine and Trotsky and Tchitcherin." So they stationed a guard around the train. It was the 26th of July. They left and came back in about 30 hours. In the meantime they had been wiring to Moscow, and we had known what they were wiring, as the wire had to go through Petrograd. We had means of knowing what was in the wires. The central soviet, while professing to desire us to leave Russia, was commanding the local soviet to detain us there as hostages.

Senator NELSON. At Archangel?

Mr. FRANCIS. At Archangel. We knew that, when they came back on the 27th of July, about 2 or 3 o'clock, and we had determined to leave. We had determined to leave for Kandalaksha because there was an anti-Bolshevik revolution to be pulled off at Archangel, and we knew it, and we did not want to be there when it occurred, and they knew it, and had been evacuating the town. They had been killing people up there and deporting people.

Senator NELSON. At Archangel?

Mr. FRANCIS. At Archangel, for several days; and when we assumed such a firm attitude before them, they were frightened and did not want to detain us, but they threw all the obstacles they could in our way, and we did not get off until 4 o'clock in the morning of the 29th of July for Kandalaksha.

They came, for instance, and said that our baggage did not have diplomatic seals on it. I turned to my colleagues and I said, "We will go down and identify the baggage." Then they got the baggage on the boat about 8 o'clock in the evening, and they said that we must all come off the boats to show our passports when we reembarked, which we did. By that time it was 12 o'clock at night. Then they said they must go across the river. You see, the railroads do not go into Archangel. They go on the south side of the Dvina River, which is about a mile wide there. They went over to Archangel proper, and they were gone until 4 o'clock, and they came back at 4 o'clock in the morning, and we cleared for Kandalaksha. We had made up our minds to clear, regardless of whether they permitted us or not, because there was a British merchantman in the harbor, and I said to the British commissioner, "What boat is that?" He said, "It is one of ours." And I said, "Will it obey your instructions?" He said, "I think so." I said, "If they do not come by 7 o'clock, we will get on the boat and go on to Kandalaksha." They came back at 4 o'clock. This was about 2 o'clock.

At Kandalaksha we heard that Gen. Poole was at Murmansk. Murmansk is the port of the railway that is open all the year round. Kandalaksha is about 150 miles south of Murmansk. We heard, after we had arrived at Kandalaksha, that the general with about 2,000 men had cleared that morning for Archangel, where he arrived on the 2d of August, and from the bar he telephoned in, "What government is in control there?" They said, "The provisional government of northern Russia." A bloodless revolution had taken place, a coup d'état about four hours before. They said, "Can we land? Will you permit us to land?" The Bolshevik government had been prohibiting the landing of allied troops. They said, "Yes; come quick." They landed on the 2d of August.

We returned there—the allied missions—on the 9th of August from Kandalaksha, where we had held the boats upon which we were transported from Archangel to Kandalaksha. In the morning the British commissioner and the Italian ambassador and the French minister—not the French ambassador—and I had gone to Murmansk, and had been able to communicate with our governments from there. I wired my Government my plans, that I was going back to Archangel, and it approved of those plans; so I went back to Archangel, and I stayed there until the 6th of November.

Senator NELSON. Let me ask you there, Mr. Francis, did not that northern government that you speak of invite the military authorities and you to come back there?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes, sir; they did.

Senator NELSON. That northern government?

Mr. FRANCIS. That northern government.

Senator NELSON. Of that northern province.

Mr. FRANCIS. It was called the provisional government of the northern region.

Senator NELSON. I asked you that because it was stated by a witness yesterday that the allied forces were there by invitation of the northern government.

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly. Why, you had here, I see from the morning papers, a man named Martiuszine, who was minister of finance in that Archangel government. Well, that Archangel government was kidnapped while I was there. But we brought it back.

Senator STERLING. I think the witness so indicated.

Mr. FRANCIS. He did. Well, old man Tchaikowsky—he is about 70 years of age, and looked to be 80—lived in this country from 1875 to 1879, at Independence, Kans., and had lived in England 28 years and in France a year and a half. He was always a revolutionist and a socialist. But that government up there was the choice of the people. It was the choice of three-fourths of the people in the zone of Russia occupied by the allied forces.

Senator NELSON. That covered all the country, practically, between the Siberian railroad and up to the White Sea?

Mr. FRANCIS. No; it did not. It covered only about half of that.

Senator NELSON. The northern half?

Mr. FRANCIS. The northern half.

Senator NELSON. The distance is about 600 or 700 miles, is it not?

Mr. FRANCIS. The distance is about 400 miles from Vologda to Archangel, and the allied troops are only down about 150 miles, down that far on the railroad. I see they have been driven back since I left. They were up the Dvina River 150 miles toward Kotlas. These American troops landed there on the 4th of September, and this coup d'état, this kidnapping, took place on the night of the 5th of September. It was evidently timed to make the impression upon people up there that it had the sanction, if it was not at the instance, of the American ambassador, being timed after the landing of the American troops. But I soon gave them to understand that I did not sanction it at all. I was very emphatic in regard to one thing. I was dean of the diplomatic corps, and petitions and delegations and telegrams were coming in to me in reference to the kidnapping, which had occurred on the morning of the 6th of September by Russian officers, asking me to reinstall the deposed government of the ministers. They had been taken on a steamer and put in the Solovetski monastery, on Solovetski Island, which was about 30 hours from Archangel.

There were three American battalions which had been landed there; one of them was sent down the railroad toward Vologda, one was sent up the Dvina River toward Kotlas, and the other one was held in Archangel. Immediately afterwards I reviewed this battalion that was left in Archangel. Gen. Poole and I received its salute on the government steps. Gen. Poole turned to me and said, "There was a revolution here last night." I said, "The hell you say! Who pulled it off?" He said, "Chaplain." Chaplain was a Russian naval officer on Gen. Poole's staff. I said, "There is Chaplain over there now." I motioned to Chaplain to come over and join us. Gen. Poole said, "Chaplain is going to issue a proclamation at 11 o'clock." It was then a quarter past 10. I said, "Chaplain, who pulled off this revolution here last night?" He said, "I did."

Senator OVERMAN. You say Chaplain was on Poole's staff?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; a Russian officer detailed by Poole on his staff. He was a colonel. He had done very good work against the Bolsheviks, getting them out. He said, "I drove the Bolsheviks out of here. I established this government. They were in Gen. Poole's way and were hampering Col. Donop, who was the French provost marshal. I see no use for any government here anyway." I said, "I think this is the most flagrant usurpation of power I ever knew, and don't you circulate that proclamation that Gen. Poole tells me you have written, until I can see it and show it to my colleagues."

So we met that day at my apartment. I was suffering very much from this ailment, from which I afterwards got relief through a surgical operation. That is another story. If it had not been for that ailment probably I would be in Russia now.

They came up there at 12 o'clock. I had Chaplain there. This had been a coup d'état, or kidnapping, you know, by Russian officers, counter revolutionaries, monarchists, who were against this socialistic government—this government which they called socialistic—and it was having constant friction with the military authorities. When these troops landed I had sent for Col. Stewart, and I said, "Have you any communication for me?" Col. Stewart was the American commander of these 4,700 American troops. "Have you any communication for me?" He said, "No." I said, "What are your orders?" He said, "To report to Gen. Poole, who is commanding the allied forces in northern Russia." "Well," I said, "I interpret our policy here, and if I should tell you not to obey one of Gen. Poole's orders, what would you do?" He said, "I would obey you." I had arranged all that beforehand through the department, I thought. But we never had any friction over there. We never had any friction between the French and myself nor between the British and myself. The British were more impatient with this socialistic government than I was, and it was generally believed there that if I had not been there the socialistic government would not have been brought back.

These men, whose minister of finance I learn was before you yesterday, were not all socialists. There was one cadet. But they were, as I thought, administering a very good government, and it was undoubtedly the choice of three-fourths of the Russians that were in this allied zone.

SENATOR STERLING. While socialist, it was not Bolshevik?

MR. FRANCIS. No; it was just as opposed to the Bolsheviks as the allies were. More so than the monarchists were, because the monarchists all favored the Bolsheviks, thinking that was the shortest or quickest return to the monarchy.

SENATOR NELSON. To simplify matters, I will say that this gentleman yesterday stated in substance that Poole attempted to establish a government of his own, but that you restored the old government.

MR. FRANCIS. I think he was wrong there. Poole did not want to establish a government of his own. British soldiers, you know, have been colonizers for so long that they do not know how to respect the feelings of socialists. I do not mean that that is the policy of the British Government, but the British officers have had to do with so many uncivilized peoples and Great Britain has done so much colonizing that its officers do not feel as American officers feel.

For instance, I was narrating just now how this coup d'état was planned, so as to make the impression on the public mind that I was not only favorable to it but that I was executing it.

For the first time American soldiers were put on the streets to patrol them. I heard that American soldiers were manning the street cars. Thirty thousand laborers struck, up there. When they heard of this kidnaping, all of the workmen in all the factories struck. The workmen on the street cars struck, and all the workmen up there went on strike. I heard about half past 12 o'clock that the Americans were manning the street cars, and called up Col. Stewart, or attempted to call him up. I could not find him, but I called up the major who was in command of the battalion, a man named Nichols, and I said, "Maj. Nichols, is it true that American soldiers are manning these street cars?" "Yes." I said, "Do you not know that will raise commotions in America? By whose orders is this?" He said, "Well, G. H. Q."—general headquarters. I said, "Was it in writing?" "No; it was not in writing," he said. "I was called up by phone and asked if I had any men here who could act as motormen and as conductors on the street cars, and as my battalion was recruited in Detroit, about half of them are motormen and conductors, so I said, 'yes.'" He said, "I sent some of the men down to the car sheds to take the cars out." I said, "Where is Col. Stewart?" He said, "Mr. Ambassador, we are charging no fares." I said, "That is different. But," I said, "I want Col. Stewart, anyway."

For 24 hours or perhaps 30 hours Americans were conducting the street cars, or acting as motormen, and at every stopping place, which is every two or three blocks, there were two or three American soldiers to keep the crowd off the cars.

Senator OVERMAN. Because they were riding free?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes. American soldiers up there showed the same spirit that they did on the western front. They were just anxious to get into a fight with somebody. They understood the cause of the war. But I was walking along the street, the Broadway of Archangel, one day, and I saw three or four American soldiers looking at a war map. I said to them in English, "You are American soldiers." They turned around and smiled at me, and I said, "I never was so glad to see American soldiers in my life as I was when you landed here a few days ago." They did not say anything in response to that, and I said, "I am the American ambassador." Well, they opened their eyes wider, but that did not evoke a response from them. I exchanged four or five more remarks with them, and they answered respectfully "Yes" and "No" all the time, and I turned around to go away and they detained a man who was with me, and they said, "Who is that fellow?" The man replied, "That is Gov. Francis." They said, "Why in hell didn't he say so?" They were from Michigan and Minnesota and knew me by reputation.

I said, "There is one thing I want understood." I said it with an oath, but I have repeated so many oaths here that I will not repeat that. "There is one thing that I want understood." "What is that?" I said, "Civil strife in the rear of our own front. Now," I said, "I am not going to permit the lives of our soldiers to be jeopardized by Bolsheviks on one side and a civil war in the rear. I will order them back from the railroad and from up the river, and if there is a gun fired here we will participate in the fire ourselves, if we have to kill Russians." That stopped the civil strife. There was not any fear of it after that.

Senator NELSON. And the old government came back?

Mr. FRANCIS. And we brought back the old government on Sunday night, and it was reinstalled on Monday morning at 9 o'clock.

Senator NELSON. Anti-Bolshevik government?

Mr. FRANCIS. Anti-Bolshevik government. You know the coup d'état or kidnaping had been planned by Russian officers who were disgusted with this socialistic government, as they called it.

Senator OVERMAN. What do you mean by kidnaping? Taking them away from the city?

Mr. FRANCIS. They went to their apartment about half-past 12 at night, and they told them to put on their clothes. They said, "What are you going to do with us?" They replied, "We are going to put you in a monastery." They put them on a boat, and the boat cleared about 4.30, and we heard of it 10 minutes after 10. The boat had no wireless apparatus on it, and we could not reach it, could not communicate with it, so we wired to Kem, which is a station down on the Murman road, about 25 miles below Kandalaksha, to get a boat over there and get these ministers when they landed there and bring them back to Archangel.

Now, my ailment was growing on me so that I had planned to leave the 14th of October. But I heard from one of my servants and the cook of one of the military attachés that it would create a panic in town if I should leave, so I stayed three weeks longer.

Senator NELSON. How big a place is Archangel?

Mr. FRANCIS. It has about 50,000 or 60,000 people, and it has very substantial structures, more substantial than Vologda, although it is not so old. Vologda was founded in 1147, as I wired the United States, 345 years before Columbus discovered America. It has 52 cathedrals.

Senator KING. You and the allied representatives left Petrograd because you believed your lives were in danger?

Mr. FRANCIS. No, not exactly; because we believed the Germans were going to capture the city and would hold us as hostages. I did not have any personal fear the whole time I was in Russia. As I look back now I marvel that I did not. My life was threatened four times, on four separate occasions, by the anarchists. But I had heard that the soviet government of Lenine and Trotsky was planning to move from Petrograd to Moscow, and it did move four or five days after I left Petrograd. I was advised a few weeks before I left Petrograd that the Germans would come in and capture it.

Senator KING. Then you left Vologda because you thought that the Lenine and Trotsky government might hold you as well as the other representatives of the governments as hostages?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly.

Senator KING. So that your liberties if not your lives were in danger?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly.

Senator KING. And from there you proceeded to Archangel? And during that time none of the ministers or representatives of foreign governments recognized the Bolshevik government?

Mr. FRANCIS. No; none of them.

Senator KING. And the Bolsheviki did not recognize you and them as ambassadors or representatives of foreign governments to the extent of treating with them as such?

Mr. FRANCIS. They would have been very glad to do it, if we had permitted them to do so.

Senator KING. But you treated them as usurpers?

Mr. FRANCIS. We treated them as usurpers. I did not think that they represented, and I do not think now that they represented, more than 10 per cent of the Russian people. The Bolshevik following changes. There were people there who were Bolsheviki four and six months ago who are opposed to the Bolsheviki now.

Senator KING. I suppose some are Bolsheviki because of the fact that by professing adherence to Bolshevism they get some favors that they otherwise could not, and perhaps protect their lives.

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly. The Bolshevik army to-day is variously estimated at from 200,000 to 700,000 men, but they are not in a body, they are scattered over the country, and they are composed in part of Chinese and Lett soldiers, and Russian Red Guards, and Russians who are forced to serve. You see, for the past five or six months they have been arresting women and confining them as hostages for the reappearance of their husbands and sons and brothers, whom they compel to serve with the Bolshevik army.

Senator KING. They would arrest the sister or the wife or the mother for the purpose of compelling a son, husband, or father to come back and serve in the army?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes.

Senator NELSON. If it suits your convenience, we should like to have your experiences in Petrograd, and what you saw and observed of the Bolshevik government from November 7 until the time you left Petrograd. Tell us about your operations.

Mr. FRANCIS. I did not have any official connection with them. I only called once, as the head of the diplomatic corps.

Senator KING. I think the question meant to ask you to describe what you saw on the streets, among the people, the social, economic, industrial, military conditions, and the poverty.

Mr. FRANCIS. They nationalized all of the industries there, and the workmen determined their own wages and the hours of service that they should perform.

The Bolshevik government is printing now—it is variously estimated—from 50,000,000 to 100,000,000 rubles a day, and is intentionally keeping no account of it. They pay these men 300 to 500 rubles a month, but there is a state of famine in Petrograd. We have an embassy there upon which we are still paying rent. I visited it from the 6th to the 10th of June, and I left two women in charge there, accompanied by three porters. The last we heard from them they were about starved, and we have been attempting to get food to them from Christiania and from Stockholm.

Senator NELSON. Did you have representatives of the Red Cross there at Petrograd while you were there?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; we had representatives of the Red Cross there.

Senator NELSON. Can you tell about their operations?

Mr. FRANCIS. They distributed a good deal of condensed milk to the children, and they were under Dr. Billings for a while, but only six or seven weeks. Then they were under Col. W. B. Thompson from about the 8th of July until, I think, some time in December.

Senator KING. That was 1917?

Mr. FRANCIS. That was 1917. Then Col. Thompson returned to the United States and they were under Col. Robins from that time forth.

Senator NELSON. Did Col. Thompson and Col. Robins cooperate with you in any way?

Mr. FRANCIS. Well, I will not say that Col. Thompson cooperated with me. I sent for Col. Robins. Col. Robins came to see me shortly after Col. Thompson left.

Senator KING. They were not military men. Those were just paper titles?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes. They were Red Cross officers. I had instructions from the department in accordance with my recommendations that no American representative should have any official intercourse with the soviet government. Immediately after the soviet government came into power and after Col. Thompson had left, Col. Robins had gone to Smolny, the headquarters of the soviet government—and according to his statement to me he had admitted that he had been opposed to them; that he and Col. Thompson had been supporters of Kerensky; but Col. Thompson had gone—and he asked what their principles were. They told him, and he approved of it. So he had been maintaining relations up there.

Senator NELSON. Col. Robins had been maintaining relations with them?

Mr. FRANCIS. Col. Robins had been maintaining relations there.

Senator STERLING. Did he state that he approved of them after their statement of what their principles were?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; he said he approved of their principles, but he did not approve of their excesses; and when I received this cable from the Government here that no representative of the United States Government was to have any communication with the Bolshevik government at all, I wired them to know if that included Red Cross men in uniform. I received a prompt reply that it did, and that Davison was going to cable Robins, severing his relations with Smolny. I sent to Col. Robins. I said to him, "I have this order." He said, "I have a similar order." I said, "I think it unwise for you to sever your relations abruptly and absolutely; that is, I mean to cease your visits up there. Furthermore I want to know what they are doing, and I will stand between you and the fire." So I cabled the Government to that effect, and I never received any reply to that. So Col. Robins continued to hold communication with Smolny; continued to go there daily until he left Petrograd. Then he went to Moscow. After going to Vologda with me and staying from Friday until Sunday afternoon, he went to Moscow, and he remained there until the 14th of May, I think it was, when he was recalled. I know he was in Vologda on the 15th of May. I went to the station to see him. The relations between Col. Robins and myself were always pleasant. We did not agree about the Bolshevik government at all.

Senator NELSON. He was rather inclined to favor them, was he not?

Mr. FRANCIS. Well, he was importuning me, I think, all the time to recommend recognition of their government.

Senator NELSON. Oh, he did?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; so I understood, and one day he said to me, "Have you ever recommended recognition of this government?" I said, "You know I have not, but I want to say I have not." He said, "I will tell them that you have not recommended recognition, and will not." I said, "You may tell them that I have not recommended recognition, but I think it is undiplomatic to say what I will do. If my Government should order me to recognize them, I might do so, and I might decline."

Senator KING. No other government recognized them?

Mr. FRANCIS. No other government recognized them.

Senator KING. No other government has?

Mr. FRANCIS. No other government has.

Senator KING. No other government has any diplomatic representative there?

Mr. FRANCIS. Except Germany and Austria and Turkey and Bulgaria.

Senator KING. None of the allied Governments?

Mr. FRANCIS. No.

Senator KING. And no South American government?

Mr. FRANCIS. Why, they do not merit recognition. They do not merit even business relations, because of their prejudices. They have instituted a reign of terror. They are killing everybody who wears a white collar or who is educated and who is not a Bolshevik. Several of their provinces have nationalized women. I have seen that the decree has been presented to you.

Senator NELSON. You know that is true, do you, of your observation and knowledge?

Mr. FRANCIS. I only know it because I have seen it in the official publications of the soviet government, the central newspapers. The central soviet has never nationalized women by a decree, but it has issued a decree, which I saw in Izvestija, the official publication of their government, making divorce and marriage so easy as to require only a notice to some man by a married couple that they had agreed to separate; and likewise a notice that two unmarried people had decided to marry. Now, there is no limit of time as to how long the marriage shall hold.

Senator OVERMAN. Or the cause of the divorce.

Mr. FRANCIS. Or the cause of the divorce.

Senator NELSON. Did Col. Robins ever state to you the reasons why he wanted the Bolshevik government recognized?

Mr. FRANCIS. He stated it to me in this way, that he thought if we recognized them they would present an organized opposition to Germany. I said, "If you will have them make that promise to me, I do not know that I will recommend recognition, but I will recommend the establishment of business relations or a modus vivendi with them." But I always believed that Lenine and Trotsky were German agents, and consequently I would not have trusted them at any time. I would not have believed them.

Now, just a short time before the Brest-Litovsk peace was ratified they sent a cable. I think Col. Robins sent it through the military mission, but I paraphrased it and sent it also. It was an inquiry as to what America and the allies would do, especially America, toward assisting the Bolshevik government if this All-Russian Congress of Soviets failed to ratify the peace. It was simply a question. I said in my cable, "If the department does not think this is sufficiently answered in the telegram of the President to the All-Russian Soviet Congress, and will cable me replies, I will be pleased to submit them through Robins." I was not going to submit them myself. They understand my position.

Senator OVERMAN. You spoke about the conditions. What about the brutal starvation? Is there anything of that over there? Was there anything while you were there?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; you could see long bread lines in Petrograd when I left. I left there on the morning of the 27th of February, I think. I arrived at Vologda on the 1st of March, I think it was. You have well-authenticated reports now showing that hunger prevailed to a very great extent in Petrograd. Zinoviev is the head of the soviet in Petrograd. He went to Moscow, and heard this telegram read from the President. Through the All-Russian Soviet Congress the President was attempting to address the Russian people. I think I had suggested that to the President. I do not mean that I communicated with the President direct, but I had cabled the State Department that this All-Russian Soviet Congress would meet to act upon this peace, and that I thought the Russian people should have some expression of interest on the part of the American people. He sent that cable to the Russian people through the soviet congress. This occurred while Zinoviev was down there from Petrograd. He returned to Petrograd two or three days after and said in a speech, "We slapped the President of the United States in the face." The reply, you know, was not for the President of the United States but to the workingmen of the United States.

Senator KING. This is the reply, is it not? [Reading:]

The All-Russian Congress of Soviets expresses its appreciation to the American people, and first of all to the laboring and exploited classes in the United States for the message sent by the President of the United States to the congress of the soviets in this time when the Russian socialistic soviet republic is living through most difficult trials.

The Russian republic uses the occasion of the message from President Wilson to express to all peoples who are dying and suffering from the horrors of this imperialistic war its warm sympathy and firm conviction that the happy time is near when the laboring masses in all bourgeois countries will throw off the capitalistic yoke and establish a socialistic state of society, which is the only one capable of assuring a permanent and just peace as well as the culture and well-being of all who toil.

Mr. FRANCIS. That is the reply he sent, and which the soviet said was meant as a slap in the face of the President of the United States.

Senator KING. It was an invitation to revolution in this country as well as in all other countries?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes.

Senator KING. I move that we take a recess until half past 2.

(The motion was agreed to; and accordingly, at 12.50 o'clock p. m., a recess was taken until 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS.

At 2.30 o'clock p. m., the subcommittee met pursuant to the taking of the recess.

TESTIMONY OF MR. DAVID R. FRANCIS—Resumed.

Senator KING. Mr. Ambassador, was the government in the northern part of Russia, at Archangel, functioning in a true manner in the territory over which it assumed jurisdiction?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think it was.

Senator KING. As you stated this morning, it represented at least three-fourths of the people of that territory?

Mr. FRANCIS. At least three-fourths of the people of the zone occupied by the allied forces, which extended along the White Sea and in the interior about 100 miles.

Senator KING. And they were anti-Bolshevists?

Mr. FRANCIS. They were anti-Bolshevists.

Senator KING. The president or chief executive of that government is now in Paris?

Mr. FRANCIS. Is now in Paris.

Senator KING. Representing his people there, and is still anti-Bolshevist?

Mr. FRANCIS. Oh, he is still anti-Bolshevist, yes; and the Bolshevists have more hatred for the socialists that they expected to be with them than they have for the monarchists, or for the allies, even.

Senator KING. They have a hatred for the bourgeoisie and for those who want a stable, orderly, democratic form of government?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes.

Senator KING. And to carry out their purposes and to perpetuate themselves in power, they resort to murder, assassination, and every form of terrorism?

Mr. FRANCIS. They do.

Senator KING. And visit their displeasure upon inoffensive Russians, the same as they would on any other people, monarchists, or enemies who are of an alien nationality?

Mr. FRANCIS. They are not very severe with the monarchists, because the monarchists have been giving them money, according to reports.

Senator OVERMAN. The monarchists, after these people are through, expect to be able to establish the old regime?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes.

Senator KING. Maj. Humes, I desire to ask you a question here. Did one of the witnesses state that Mr. Rhys Williams aided in organizing the Black Hundred?

Mr. HUMES. Oh, no.

Mr. FRANCIS. The Black Hundred was an organization that existed long before the war.

Mr. HUMES. He was employed and spent a month, for which he received 300 rubles, in organizing the volunteer force and the volunteer Bolshevik force, and trying to get volunteers for it. He was at various localities in that effort.

Senator KING. You were denounced by the Bolshevists as a capitalistic ambassador, were you not?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; and our Government was denounced as a capitalistic government. They said we had entered the war because of the submarine warfare preventing our continuing to sell supplies to the allies, and that the wharves in New York and all other ports were crowded with war supplies, and that we had to participate in the war at the instance of the Stock Exchange of New York, and the capitalists of this country, in order to find a market for our manufactured products.

Senator KING. Did Lenine and Trotsky, or the Bolshevik régime, or any of its officials, at any time exhibit any sympathy, or its representatives exhibit any sympathy, with democratic institutions as we understand them?

Mr. FRANCIS. They treated us better than they treated the British or the French, because they were always hoping for and expecting recognition by our Government; but they declared themselves against all organized governments, and they called our Government a capitalistic government, and said that it was oppressing the working classes.

Senator OVERMAN. Trotsky and Lenine proposed to Bolshevize this Government as well as all other governments?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes.

Senator OVERMAN. That was one of their programs?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; and I think they are doing propagandizing here now.

Senator KING. Do you remember a speech that Trotsky made in Moscow, in which he denounced this Government?

Mr. FRANCIS. I remember several speeches that he made in which he denounced this Government. I did not hear the speeches, but as published in the official organs of the government he denounced this Government.

Senator KING. What did they do with respect to newspapers that opposed their views?

Mr. FRANCIS. They suppress all newspapers that oppose their views.

Senator KING. If any witness has stated here that they did not suppress newspapers opposing their view, that is not true?

Mr. FRANCIS. So far as my knowledge extends. And I know that any newspaper that had a criticism of the Bolshevik government, or the soviet government, was suppressed immediately after its publication of that criticism.

Senator KING. Do you remember Gorky's newspaper that was operated for awhile, when he was opposing the Bolshevik?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; it was suppressed.

Senator KING. And when he espoused Bolshevism, no matter what the reason was, they permitted a resuscitation of that paper, or at least permitted him to publish another paper?

Mr. FRANCIS. To publish another paper.

Senator OVERMAN. They nationalized every printing establishment, did they not?

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not know that they nationalized all of the printing establishments; but the soviet congress that adjourned at 3 a. m. on the 1st day of last February—I have been looking at the declaration of principles it made since my testimony of this morning—nationalized all natural properties and turned over to the peasants and the workmen all instrumentalities of production, such as factories, mines, etc.

Senator KING. What is the fact as to whether or not various German enterprises, banks, business houses, which were in operation before the war and during the war, have been continued under German control by the Bolsheviks?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think Germany has had more control of the industries of Russia since the beginning of the war than she had before, although they have nominally arrested a great many of the officials and interned them. That was done under the Imperial Government, and it was pursued under the provisional government. But the German influence is now in every line of human endeavor. They not only own two or three banks in Petrograd, and as many in Moscow, but, as I stated this morning, they control the manufacture of glass, the manufacture of chemicals, and the sugar interest, and various other industries.

Senator KING. Then they have not nationalized or taken from the Germans the properties, especially those used in industrial and manufacturing enterprises, which the Germans own or control?

Mr. FRANCIS. I would not say that they have not nominally taken them, but the Germans were buying up the stocks of the banks, and I understood from what I considered reliable authority that the Germans had petitioned the soviet government to postpone the denationalizing of the banks in order to enable them to buy up more shares of stock.

Senator KING. So you would say that the Germans have greater control of the part of Russia dominated by the Bolsheviks now than ever before?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think so. That is my mature judgment. I wish to say that I did not confine my inquiries to officials. At all times my embassy was open to whoever called, and I saw all classes of society. I even received the anarchists when they presented me the resolutions that they would hold me personally responsible for the release of Berkman, Emma Goldman, and Mooney. The first demonstration of anarchism made against me was under the provisional government. I was entertaining four or five or six people at supper one night after the ballet, and one of my servants said to me, "We received a telephone message here just now that a mob was forming on the Nevsky to attack the American Embassy, being incited to do it by an incendiary speech."

Senator OVERMAN. Is the Nevsky a street?

Mr. FRANCIS. That is the main street, the Broadway of Petrograd. That was about six blocks from the American Embassy. I said that that was a mistake, that the anarchists had nothing against America, but in about five minutes the telephone rang again, and I sent my secretary, who is with me here now, to see what message, if any, the ring meant. He came back and said the police had telephoned a warning that a mob was forming on the Nevski and was marching down to sack the American Embassy. I had five guests, I think—a man and his wife and daughter, and two other gentlemen. The ladies were nervous, and insisted that I go home with them, but I said no, that I would stay there to protect the American Embassy.

Turning to my colored man servant, who came to me 30 years ago, and whom I took over to Europe—to Russia—I said, "Do you know where my pistol is?" He said he did, and I told him to get it and bring it to me, loaded. I then went down to the vestibule and found seven soldiers there. I said to a man who was with me, Dr. Huntington—Dr. Huntington was with me at that time, and he was your first witness, I think—who spoke Russian, "Ask these men what they are here for?" He asked them in Russian, and, turning to me, said they did not know except that they were sent there to protect the embassy. That was under the provisional government. I said to them, "I am the American ambassador. If a man crosses that threshold without my consent and you do not shoot him, I will. I have a loaded pistol here in my pocket."

Just at that time the door opened and a man put his head in and I said, "Ask that man who he is." The man answered, himself. He understood English. He said, "I am the chief of police, come to protect you." I told him that he could enter. The ladies had about put on their wraps at that time, and I escorted them out of the door. I found 30 or 40 soldiers on the sidewalk, all with fixed bayonets, who had been sent down by the police or the militia to defend the American embassy. I made the remark that this had a serious appearance now, when a man came up and whispered to the man who was in citizen's clothes, and who had told me he was chief of police, and he turned to me and said in English, "The mob has dispersed up on the Litaïny," which was a block from the embassy. I asked him why it had been dispersed and how, and he said that a troop of Cossacks came along and asked them what they were doing and where they were going, and when they replied that they were going to sack the American embassy, the Cossacks charged them and disbanded them. I attempted to get into communication with the ministers that night, but I did not do so, and the following day I heard that this incendiary speech was made by Lénine, but I never got proof of it. The mob was aroused because it was said that the speaker, whoever he was, said that there was a man in America who was to be hanged because he was a socialist and his name was M-u-n-i. I had never heard of Muni, but I found out it was Mooney, of San Francisco, who had been condemned to death because he was an accessory before the throwing of that bomb which killed about 20 people in the preparedness parade and wounded about 100 innocent people. I was afterward, under Bolshevik rule, waited upon by a committee of anarchists, who had come from Helsingfors. They were sailors. They presented me a resolution saying that if their colleagues, Berkman and Emma Goldman and Mooney, were not released, they would hold me personally responsible. I told them that I would consider it. They went out. I cabled it to the Government next day and said, "Do not let consideration for my safety interfere with the course of the law." Later, in January, I was presented with a resolution that had been passed by about 200 anarchists, in a garage that was three and a half blocks from my embassy, which resolution stated that if Berkman and Emma Goldman and Mooney, and others, who were likewise imprisoned for some offense, which they had stated was because they had given up their lives and all of their time to the liberation of the oppressed, were not released, I would be held personally responsible for it. That was delivered at my embassy by an official of the soviet government.

SENATOR OVERMAN. That was under Trotsky and Lenine?

MR. FRANCIS. Under Trotsky and Lenine. I showed it to Col. Robins the next day, and he asked me who presented this, and I said Zalkind. Zalkind was assistant minister of foreign affairs.

SENATOR NELSON. He presented it to you?

MR. FRANCIS. He presented it to me. He did not say a word about protection, at all. Mr. Robins said, "I will take this to Lenine," and he took it to Lenine, and Lenine removed Zalkind and made him minister to Switzerland.

Then, again, I was giving a reception one night to the military attaché, Gen. Judson, who was about to leave, when I had a telephone call about noon from a woman, a Mrs. Proctor, who was a Russian by birth, but who had married the elder Proctor of the firm of Proctor & Gamble. She said that she desired to see me, but she was afraid to come to the embassy and afraid to have anybody come to her house. So I sent Dr. Huntington and my secretary here, Mr. Johnston, to meet her at the corner of the Nevsky and Litainy at 3 o'clock that afternoon. She said she had been visited by a sailor the night before, who felt under obligations to her, and that that sailor had said to her, "I know you have friends in the American Embassy. Tell them not to be in there at 12 o'clock to-night, because a bomb is to be thrown in." I had invited about 200 people to a formal reception given to Gen. Judson. I told Judson about it, and told Robins about it, and told all of my staff. I did not believe the story. Twelve o'clock passed, and we sat up until 2, and the bomb was not thrown.

But I sent for a guard that night of 8 or 10 Bolshevik soldiers. I did not send, but the military attaché sent. He said that he would send around to the barracks near by, and those soldiers came. They came very nearly creating more disturbance than the bomb would have created, because I had two or three guests who were Russian officers, being acquaintances and associates of Judson, who had failed to remove the insignia from their uniforms. They had removed such insignia from their overcoats, but when they got in the vestibule they took off their overcoats, and thereby displayed the insignia of office. It was all that my porter could do to prevent these Bolshevik soldiers from going up among all the guests and taking off these insignia of office. Dvornak was a very bright fellow, and he said, "This is not Russian territory; this is American territory, and if you go up there you will have trouble." So they did not go. I did not learn of this until afterwards. They played cards all night. I gave them 30 rubles each the next morning, and they looked at the sum contemptuously, because they had been gambling all night and betting 50 rubles at a time. I never sent for any more Bolshevik guards.

SENATOR KING. Just before the revolution which Lenine and Trotsky precipitated, was there an advent of people from New York and other places in the United States to Russia, some East Side Jews as well as others?

MR. FRANCIS. I think there was. I think that they came over in large numbers, both via Vladivostok and through Sweden, but such men never called upon me. I only knew it from hearsay.

Senator KING. Do you remember wiring the State Department here about the great number that was coming and advising against it?

Mr. FRANCIS. I do.

Senator KING. Do you remember 800 coming in one week?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think I remember that. Trotzky, you know, went over there from New York, and he was taken on the boat at Halifax and kept there two or three weeks. I never saw Trotsky. I never had any conversation with him; in fact, never saw him. I saw Lenine on one occasion. It was when I went as dean of the diplomatic corps, accompanied by all of the chiefs of the missions of the allied and neutral embassies, to demand the release of Diamandi, the Roumanian minister.

Senator KING. They arrested the Roumanian minister?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; and they put him in the fortress. This was on their New Year's evening, which is our 14th of January. I called the diplomatic corps to meet at the American embassy the following day. They were disposed to have me go up there accompanied by two neutrals and two allied chiefs, but they could not agree upon the other members—the four members beside myself—and I made the proposition that we all go up in a body. So we went in a body, after I had arranged the meeting through the telephone with Lenine, who speaks English. We were received, and Lenine said, "Let us discuss the matter." I immediately arose and said, "No discussion on the subject whatever." I said that a diplomatic representative's person was inviolable and was immune, and we demanded the release of this man. But the French ambassador began to talk, and we had a discussion there of an hour and a half.

Lenine told me that he would refer it to the council of the soviet, and let me know by 12 o'clock that night, or when they had passed upon it. I told him that I would be at my embassy all through the evening, and he phoned about 12 o'clock that the central soviet had concluded to release this man, and he was released the next day at 1 o'clock, but was ordered to leave Petrograd within 10 days after that, and was given only 24 hours' notice. I went to say good-by to him at his legation, and I found that he had gone to the Finnish station. I followed him there and caught the train before it left. He was going through Sweden. We crossed at Tornea, which was about 30 hours distant, but he was three weeks in getting there. I have heard since that a commissar, who had him in charge, had a communication to the local commissar from the central soviet government at Moscow—or Petrograd, as it was then—to shoot the Roumanian minister, but they had had a revolution there, and the Whites were in charge and had taken Tornea the day before from the Reds. So they arrested this man, the soviet commissar, when he came in, and I understood they shot him instead of shooting the minister.

Senator KING. Coming back to the question that I propounded, what did those men who went from the United States to Russia do in the revolution which Lenine and Trotsky brought about?

Mr. FRANCIS. They were constant agitators, and three of them guarded the foreign office the night that the constituent assembly was disbanded. They were not all Jews, however. I think one was a Jew named Reissman or Reinstein, from Buffalo, one was John Reed, and another was a man named Humphreys. They were expecting an attack on the foreign office that night, and these three American citizens were put there to guard it.

Senator KING. Was Reed recognized as one of the Bolshevik organizers?

Mr. FRANCIS. Oh, yes. They attempted to appoint him consul general at New York. He is the husband of Louise Bryant.

Senator KING. Did you recognize him as a representative of our country?

Mr. FRANCIS. I only saw him once. He came to me with a letter from a friend of mine in this country and I received him and his wife, but I never saw him thereafter. But I told Robins to tell the soviet government that he could not function in New York, I did not think our Government would recognize him, and they withdrew the appointment afterwards. Oh, he makes no secret of his Bolshevik principles.

Senator NELSON. Was there not a kind of movement over there to have either Col. Thompson or Col. Robins supersede you as ambassador? Was there not a movement of that kind?

Mr. FRANCIS. Col. Thompson succeeded Col. Billings as the head of the American Red Cross Mission to Russia, and he spent a million and a quarter dollars of his own money—

Senator NELSON. Thompson did?

Mr. FRANCIS. Which was disbursed through Robins to sustain Kerensky in his fight with the Bolsheviki. Consequently he was very much frightened when the Bolshevik revolution took place, and he left Petrograd within ten days or two weeks of that time. He left Robins in charge. Robins went to the Bolsheviki and said he had been fighting them and he wanted to know what their principles were.

They told him their principles, and he was ever afterwards persona grata at Smolny, and followed them to Moscow, and tried to get me to go to Moscow, and I refused because I did not want to be any closer to the Bolshevik government than I was.

Senator NELSON. Can you tell us anything further about his operations in that connection?

Mr. FRANCIS. About whose operations?

Senator NELSON. Col. Robins's.

Mr. FRANCIS. Col. Robins I had heard was being quoted down there as the mouthpiece of America. My relations with him were pleasant. I had, as I told you this morning, told him that he could continue to visit the soviet officials, because I wanted to learn what they were doing. He was recalled on the 5th of May, and on the 15th of May he went through Vologda, going to Vladivostok. I went to the station to meet him. We had a private conversation of about 20 minutes—the train was there 50 minutes—and I turned away from him, or he turned away from me; I have forgotten which—not in any unfriendly spirit, and he told an Associated Press man there and a man named Groves, who was one of my employees, that if he could get one hour with the President he would persuade the President to recognize the soviet government.

Senator NELSON. That is, the Bolshevik government of Lenine and Trotsky?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes. He said, "I have the goods on my person."

Senator NELSON. Do you know what he meant by the "goods" that he had on his person?

Mr. FRANCIS. Well, I heard afterwards. It developed afterwards that—

Senator NELSON. Did he have credentials from the Bolshevik government?

Mr. FRANCIS. He had communications from the Bolshevik government addressed to our Government; but I can not learn since arriving in Washington that he ever presented those communications.

Senator NELSON. He never was received here, then, as the ambassador from the Bolshevik government?

Mr. FRANCIS. Oh, no; he was not received as the ambassador from the Bolshevik government. I heard so much about Col. Robins making statements at Moscow, that I issued a statement myself stating that while Col. Robins and I understood each other and were friendly, all expressions of American policy that did not emanate from me were unauthorized. I have a copy of that statement and I should like to file it here.

Senator OWEN. All right, we shall be very glad to have you file it.

Mr. FRANCIS. I heard later from Radek that—

Senator NELSON. Who was Radek?

Mr. FRANCIS. Radek is the Bolshevik who is now in Berlin trying to overturn the government there.

Senator KING. He has been there for over two months, has he not, or three months?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes. He was the man whom Tchitchern sent to Vologda to execute the invitation that he had extended to us to come to Moscow. He was in uniform and had a pistol on the outside, which I did not notice at the time; but I heard afterwards, as coming from Radek, that Col. Robins was the courier for the soviet government with proposals to our Government to grant us the same concessions, privileges, and advantages that it had been forced to grant to Germany in the Brest-Litovsk treaty, which is what I have thought Col. Robins meant by "having the goods on him." I asked my representative to whom Radek had told this if the same privileges were extended to the English and the French. He said, "No; it is only to the Americans, and we do not want the English and the French to know anything about it." Well, I cabled that to the Government, because I did not think that this Government would prove treacherous to its allies by taking any such advantage as that. I can not learn although I have made inquiries since arriving here, that Col. Robins ever presented those communications; but they were doing whatever they could to obtain recognition by our Government. That is why they did not order me out of the country.

Senator NELSON. They hoped you would relent?

Mr. FRANCIS. They always hoped to have the recognition of our Government, and I thought that our Government could not recognize them and so stated to our Government. I have been consistent in that all along, and persistently. I thought that they were against our Government as well as against all organized governments; that their decrees concerning women, marriage, and divorce meant the breaking up of the family and a return to barbarism; and I think so now.

Senator NELSON. And their land decrees, confiscating all lands?

Mr. FRANCIS. Their land decrees, confiscating all lands and all industries whatever.

Senator NELSON. Banks and everything?

Senator KING. What was their attitude toward religion and toward the churches?

Mr. FRANCIS. They were not persecuting religion, but they were not respectful to it. They made fun of religion; but during the latter part of the summer the Bolsheviki Russians were inclined to turn to the church.

Senator OVERMAN. Did they not confiscate the church lands?

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not think they did. I do not think they confiscated any of the church lands. I do not remember. They issued a decree on the morning of the 1st of February, when the last soviet congress was held in Petrograd, confiscating all the lands, making all the lands the property of the state.

Senator KING. Including church lands?

Senator NELSON. That would include church lands, of course.

Mr. FRANCIS. That would include church lands, of course.

Senator NELSON. And crown lands?

Mr. FRANCIS. And crown lands.

Senator NELSON. And the lands of the big landowners?

Mr. FRANCIS. And the lands of the big landowners.

Senator NELSON. That would include also the lands of the mirs, the communal property?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes. I want to say that I was not opposed to that division of lands, because I believe that those who till the land should own it, and I was in favor of a distribution of the lands, and so expressed myself to the first provisional government. I did not mean the confiscation of the lands, but the apportionment of the lands among the peasants at a fixed price and upon easy terms.

Senator NELSON. You meant an apportionment that would give the peasants a title to it, did you not?

Mr. FRANCIS. That would give the peasants a title to the lands; yes.

Senator NELSON. Now, you know that the Bolsheviki system as outlined is not to give them title, but simply assign them the use of the lands?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly.

Senator NELSON. And no more land than they can till themselves; not land that they have to till with hired help?

Mr. FRANCIS. No.

Senator NELSON. Is not that so?

Mr. FRANCIS. That is absolutely true.

Senator NELSON. And under their system a Russian peasant could never acquire title to the land he tills?

Mr. FRANCIS. Oh, no. The title to the land was in the state.

Senator NELSON. And continued so?

Mr. FRANCIS. And continued so.

Senator NELSON. And he could shift around from one place to another from year to year; could he not?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think under that system he could.

Senator KING. Your idea was something like the plan that Gladstone devised in Ireland?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly.

Senator KING. The crown would set apart a certain amount of money to purchase the land, and they would expropriate it and give it to the peasant—that is, to the landseeker—and he would have a certain number of years to pay for it?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly.

Senator KING. At a small rate of interest, and become the owner?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly; so as to prevent it from being a hardship on him.

Senator NELSON. Under this Russian system the peasant never could become an owner?

Mr. FRANCIS. No; he never could become an owner under the soviet system. And they nationalized all the banks.

Now, the railroads were made the especial charge of the American Embassy. A railroad commission came over there at about the time the Root Commission came, headed by John F. Stevens. I took John F. Stevens to the department of ways and communications and installed him there. I say "installed him there"—he had an office provided for him there; and later he was going down to southern Russia, the Donetz coal basin country, to inspect the railroads down there.

Senator NELSON. Down in the Ukraine?

Mr. FRANCIS. Down in the Ukraine. He got back as far as Moscow, and the revolution had broken out, and he wired me for instructions. I said: "Remain where you are as long as it is safe, and then come to Petrograd. I will attempt to protect you here;" and he went, a few days after that, if not on the same day that he received my telegram, to Harbin, where he is now, and is in charge of the trans-Siberian Railroad. Now, I wired to him in May—I think it was in May—to send Emerson and 100 of the engineers that were of the Stevens party to me at Vologda. He replied that he would send them at the first opportunity, but he sent a subsequent telegram saying that he was opposed to the whole matter. Our Government here asked me what I wanted with those railroad men. Well, I said that I wished to use them to operate the trans-Siberian road under the department of ways and communications, with the subordinate officials of which department I had always maintained pleasant relations. I got my trains from them; I got the train on which I sent out my staff, the train on which I sent the nationals, and the train on which I left Petrograd myself. Emerson left Vladivostok the 19th of May, but he never has arrived at Vologda yet. The Czecho-Slovaks, whose numbers were variously estimated from forty to sixty thousand, and who were escaped or released Austrian prisoners who had taken up arms against Austria, were interfering with the operation of the trans-Siberian road, because they were attempting to get out to join the forces on the western front. This was in July of last year. No; I think it began in June of last year. I instructed our consul general at Moscow to join the other consuls general in protesting against this treatment of the Czecho-Slovaks.

Senator King. What treatment, Governor?

Mr. FRANCIS. Interfering with their leaving the country.

Senator KING. The Bolsheviks were attempting to restrain them from departing?

Mr. FRANCIS. They were attempting to restrain them from departing, at the instigation of the Germans. Trotsky issued an order that they could leave via Vladivostok if they would give up their arms; and at the same time he issued a secret order that any railroad man who transported them—any conductor or any station agent—would be punished; and they were all put to work.

Senator STERLING. Then, when Col. Robins testifies that the movement of the Szecho-Slovaks was not interfered with by the Trotsky and Lenine government, at the instigation of the Germans, he is mistaken, is he, Mr. Francis?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think he is mistaken, because I think the Germans inspired the Trotsky government to interfere with the departure of the Czecho-Slovaks. The Czecho-Slovaks have done excellent fighting up there.

Senator OVERMAN. That is corroborated by Col. Hurban, who made the treaty with them, and who testified that after starting they took all the guns away from them.

Mr. FRANCIS. They took all the guns away from them, and they promised them that if they would give up their guns they would let them go out.

Senator OVERMAN. That was the testimony of Col. Hurban, attaché for the Czecho-Slovak government, who was here; and he also made this contract, as I understand, Maj. Humes, did he not?

Mr. HUMES. He was one of the commissioners.

Senator KING. After taking their guns away from them they attacked them?

Mr. FRANCIS. They attacked them. Oh, they broke faith with the Czecho-Slovaks. The Czecho-Slovaks were first attempting to get to Vladivostok, and they afterwards attempted to get to Archangel, where I was, but they were prevented by the armed Bolsheviks from doing either. I do not know what numbers the Czecho-Slovaks now are in, but they are still there under Kolchak.

Senator NELSON. Over around Omsk?

Mr. FRANCIS. Around Omsk; yes. You know, the distances in Russia are so immense—why, it is as far from Petrograd to Vladivostok as it is from Petrograd to Washington—farther. It is over 6,000 miles.

Senator KING. More than that; about 7,000 miles.

Senator STERLING. Did you know Col. Lebedeff, Ambassador Francis?

Mr. FRANCIS. Oh, yes; I knew him.

Senator KING. Vladimir Lebedeff?

Senator STERLING. Yes; Vladimir Lebedeff.

Mr. FRANCIS. I think I knew him. Mr. Johnston, is that the name of the man who was—

Senator STERLING. He was former secretary of the navy in the Russian provisional government.

Mr. JOHNSON (private secretary to Ambassador Francis). Yes; you knew him.

Senator KING. A dark-complexioned man, with whiskers; rather small.

Mr. FRANCIS. Oh, yes; I knew him very well.

Senator STERLING. Was he considered a man of high repute?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; he stood well there.

Senator STERLING. He was characterized by Col. Robins yesterday as belonging to the old régime. Was he in any sense a Bureaucrat, or was he not in favor of the revolution?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think he was in favor of the revolution; but I do not recall exactly.

Senator KING. Let me recall the matter to your attention: Lebedeff was driven from Russia during the Czaristic régime because of his revolutionary activities. He was against the Czar. He went to France and enlisted as a private, and fought there with the French armies and rose to the rank of colonel, and after Kerensky's government was organized he returned to Russia and was made assistant secretary of the navy or of war. I have forgotten which.

Senator STERLING. Assistant secretary of the navy.

Senator KING. Yes; assistant secretary of the navy, and he was at Kazan and captured the gold and took it to the Omsk government.

Mr. FRANCIS. Oh, he was that man, was he?

Senator KING. Yes; that is Lebedeff.

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not know that I ever met him. He captured 60,000,000 rubles of gold, or 600,000,000 rubles of gold.

Senator KING. It was more than that. About a third of the gold.

Mr. FRANCIS. Well, the Germans were sending gold out of Russia for a year before the war began—to Germany.

Senator STERLING. Col. Lebedeff was sent to the Volodyga region to assist in the anti-Bolshevist struggle in that region.

Mr. FRANCIS. Has he ever appeared before this committee?

Senator STERLING. No; he has not been here.

Mr. FRANCIS. Where is he now?

Senator KING. He is in Paris. He was here and was interviewed by quite a number of Senators and public men in this city.

Mr. FRANCIS. My impression is that I met him, and I am very clear that he stood very well over there. He stood very well over there.

Senator KING. Is there anything else you would like to say about the Czecho-Slovaks and their treatment, so far as it is material to this inquiry?

Mr. FRANCIS. The Czech-Slovaks were brave soldiers, and I received from the department here a public announcement that our Government sympathized with them in their aspirations for liberty and independence; and so, then, afterwards I extended all the assistance I could to them. They were brave men. They were patriots. They were not monarchists. In fact, they were opposed to a monarchical form of government; and they were opposed to the Bolsheviks, too, because they were in favor of a democratic form of government—a government by consent of the governed. They made a great record there. I do not know what they are doing now, because I was sent out of Archangel on the 6th of November. I was taken on Board the Olympia on a stretcher, because I was unable to walk, and landed at Infragordon on the 18th of November. I had a major surgical operation in London on the 4th of January.

Senator OVERMAN. Mr. Ambassador, you said that about 10 per cent only of the 180,000,000 people favor this Bolshevik government.

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not think it is exceeding that.

Senator OVERMAN. That being so, why is it that the 90 per cent of the people do not overturn this Bolshevik government and establish order and law?

Mr. FRANCIS. It is just because of this reign of terror that the Bolsheviks have instituted. They have cowed everybody that is not for them. They do not prefer any charges against those that they arrest, except that they are counter-revolutionary. They have put to death 521 hostages in Petrograd in revenge for the assassination of Uritsky. At one time they were transferring from Kronstadt prison, I thought it was 150 officers, but I have heard since that it was 300, and one report said 500. They were transferring those officers from Kronstadt prison, professedly to another prison. The bottom of the barge fell out, not by accident, and those officers were all drowned.

Senator OVERMAN. Those were officers of the old Russian army?

Mr. FRANCIS. They were Russian officers. The Bolsheviks did it.

Senator NELSON. Was it not the sailors from the Kronstadt fleet that came up there and helped them to inaugurate the revolution in November?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think it was.

Senator NELSON. And those are largely composed of radical socialist Finns, are they not?

Mr. FRANCIS. Well, I do not know that they are Finns, but they are radical socialists. They are anarchists. It was on a vessel at Helsingfors that this anarchistic resolution was passed holding me personally responsible for Berkman and Emma Goldman, and a delegation came down from Helsingfors to present it to me.

Senator KING. Mr. Ambassador, the Lenine-Trotsky government has control—as I read the papers and understand the situation from having talked with a great number who have recently come from Russia—of a strip of territory about 500 to 800 miles northerly and southerly, and approximately 1,000 miles easterly and westerly, running diagonally through Russia. South of that is the Ukraine and the Caucasus and the Odessa district, in which they have no control, and north of it they do not have control; and, of course, they have no control in Siberia except here and there in local spots.

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly; exactly.

Senator KING. So it is only about 40,000,000 of the people in Russia over whom they exercise control. Instead of 180,000,000, it is only about 40,000,000?

Mr. FRANCIS. Only about 40,000,000. I think you are correct, because they do not get to the White Sea by 150 miles, and they do not get to the Arctic Ocean at Murmansk by 200 miles. Sukhona, which is 200 miles south of Murmansk, is occupied by the allies. They are rebuilding the Murman railroad, because it was very insecurely built in the beginning. They are rebuilding it. I think the British are doing it there.

Senator KING. Did the Lenine-Trotsky government ever state to you that they wanted to get into the war to aid the United States and her allies against the central powers?

Mr. FRANCIS. No, sir. They never stated it to me. I extended every encouragement I could to them to present an organized front in order to prevent the German divisions that had been on the eastern front from being sent over to the western front, and I told Robins to say to them that I would recommend a modus vivendi if they would organize an opposition. They put to him a number of questions, which he transmitted through the War Department code, asking what America and the allies would do; but they invariably accompanied that by a statement that the great social revolution should not be interfered with. As I stated this morning, I think their object in the beginning was a world-wide social revolution. The correctness of that opinion has been demonstrated since by their propagandizing in all countries against all government. They are attempting to break up the family, which was the first outgrowth toward society; and I think the predominance of Bolshevism throughout the world will mean a return to barbarism.

Senator KING. You noticed that they had a large number of Russian Bolsheviks in Argentine recently, and a strike was called and many people were killed, and the government, in self-defense, had to seize about 1,184 of them and put them on a vessel, and probably they have shipped them back to Russia.

Coming back again to the question I suggested, you state, then, that no proposition was ever made by that government—the Bolshevik government—to join hands with the allies in resisting the aggressions of the central powers?

Mr. FRANCIS. No proposition was ever made by the Bolsheviks to the allies that came to me. Col. Robins said that—

Senator KING. Never mind what Col. Robins said. We are interested in knowing what you know as ambassador.

Mr. FRANCIS. He said that the Bolsheviks asked the question as to what America and the allies would do if they refused to ratify that treaty. They ratified that treaty by a vote of two and a half to one at the Moscow meeting, whereupon I issued that proclamation that elicited from Kuehlmann a demand on the soviet government that I be deported from Russia.

Senator STERLING. And it was at Lenine's demand that that treaty was ratified, was it not?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly; it was at Lenine's demand that the treaty was ratified.

Senator STERLING. The first impression was not to ratify the treaty, was not, at that soviet?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think I gave an interview at Vologda appealing to the Russian people not to ratify the treaty, and there was some doubt about its ratification. The second treaty was signed on the 3d of March. The first treaty, as I said, was rejected by Trotsky in a very dramatic way when he made that stage-play.

Senator KING. That was in December or the last of November?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; that was in December, I think.

Senator NELSON. December or January?

Mr. FRANCIS. December or January. They declared an armistice, you know, without consulting any of the allies. I think that if Russia had stood up to her obligations the war would have been ended a year before it was ended, and millions of lives could have been saved. Russia lost more men in the war than any other country, although she quit the war a year before it ended. I think she lost at least 2,000,000 men, and there were 2,000,000 Russians imprisoned in German and Austrian prison camps when I arrived at Petrograd in April, 1916.

Senator KING. When Lenine and Trotsky returned to Russia did they announce as one of the purposes the immediate cessation of hostilities so far as Russia was concerned?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; they did after they got into power. Does anyone suppose that Lenine would have been permitted to come through Germany and into Russia without German consent? He had the German approval. He came through Germany to Russia from Switzerland, and he was very profuse in his distribution of money thereafter; and, as I said this morning, I think that was with a view of promoting the objective that he had in view all the time, which was a world-wide social revolution.

Senator NELSON. Was it not strange that he had so much money, being one of the convicts released from Siberia under the Czar's government?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think he had been in prison under the Czar's government.

Senator NELSON. Was not one of the mistakes of the Kerensky government that they opened the doors to all political prisoners, criminals, and everything else?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; they did that, and permitted them all to return.

Senator NELSON. And they have returned to plague them?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes.

Senator STERLING. And the demotion of the officers in the army?

Mr. FRANCIS. And the demotion of the officers, and the abolition of the death penalty. You know, when Kerensky became minister of war, or after he became president, I do not know which, he issued a decree abolishing the previous decree, or revoking the former decree, whereby he had put an end to the death penalty.

Senator STERLING. Yes.

Mr. FRANCIS. I heard him making a speech in the Marensky Theater. He is a great orator. A man from the gallery interrupted him, "What about the revocation of that decree abolishing the death penalty?" He paid no attention to that. The man repeated it three or four times. Finally he said, pointing up to the man, "Wait until I condemn a man to death." That meant that he was not going to condemn anybody to death. That destroyed discipline in the army.

Senator NELSON. As a matter of fact, did not the Trotsky-Lenine government, the Bolshevik government, after they came into power, do all they could to disintegrate the Russian army and demoralize it?

Mr. FRANCIS. They undoubtedly did.

Senator NELSON. And put it out of fighting capacity?

Mr. FRANCIS. They undoubtedly did.

Senator NELSON. Under their cry, "Peace, bread, and land?"

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes.

Senator KING. What contribution, if any, did they make in a material way toward helping Germany and Austria after the treaty of Brest-Litovsk; that is to say, by furnishing them men, money, or supplies?

Mr. FRANCIS. They did not furnish them any men, except that they had a general exchange of prisoners. Germany and the central empires demanded that the prisoners should be exchanged man for man. Now, to nations at peace that is very unjust. In other words, the central empires should have sent back all the Russians and Russia should have sent back all the Germans and Austrians; but Germany and Austria—especially Germany—had an excess of war prisoners over what Russia had, so they demanded that the prisoners be exchanged man for man, and consequently the excess of prisoners that Germany and Austria held over what Russia held of German and Austrian war prisoners were retained there to do work in Germany.

Senator KING. To add to her industrial capacity?

Mr. FRANCIS. So as to permit the industrial workers to go to the western front. I spoke to a subordinate official named Vosnosenski, and he admitted that that was true, but he said, "We haven't any power over those men"; and the Germans and the Austrians insisted upon those prisoners who were exchanged being able-bodied men, and in exchange for able-bodied men they sent back Russians who were invalids.

Senator NELSON. Exchanging disabled Russians for sound Germans?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exchanging disabled Russians for sound Germans.

Senator KING. Which enabled them to keep several hundred thousand able-bodied Russians in Germany to aid the industrial work?

Mr. FRANCIS. Exactly. There was no inconsistency in that, as such has been German practices for the last 25 years. As I remarked this morning, Germany has been exploiting Russia for 30 or 40 years, and if this Bolshevik government is left in control, if disorder prevails in Russia, peace will be impossible in Europe. I think Germany will exploit Russia if the disorder is allowed to continue there; so that Germany, instead of having been defeated in this war, will have gained a victory, and will be stronger 10 years from now than she was at the beginning of the war.

Senator NELSON. Do you not regard this Bolshevik government in Russia as a menace to the peace of Europe?

Mr. FRANCIS. I regard it as a menace to the peace of Europe and a menace to the peace of the world.

Senator NELSON. A menace to the peace of the world; and there never can be an effective peace until that Bolshevik government is eliminated?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think not. That is my judgment, derived from two years and eight months' residence in Russia. I would be there still if my health permitted.

Senator NELSON. Do you believe that our Government and the allies are justified in helping the Russian people get rid of that Bolshevik government?

Mr. FRANCIS. You are asking a question of policy now that I do not feel like answering.

Senator OVERMAN. We will not press it, but I will ask you this question: Suppose we removed the allied troops from that country, what would happen?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think the Russians in the zones occupied by allied troops would all be murdered by the Bolsheviki. Mr. Simmons testified to that here. I saw his statement when I was in Paris.

Senator OVERMAN. Yes. He told us that. I want to know what you think about it.

Mr. FRANCIS. I think so, undoubtedly. Why, when I was going to leave Archangel on the 14th of October, as I had planned when I could walk—that was before I got into the condition where I had to be carried on a stretcher—there was almost a panic in Archangel because they thought my departure meant the leaving of all the American troops, and then they said they would be at the mercy of the Bolsheviki. Therefore I stayed there three weeks longer.

The Bolsheviks now number various thousands of people that they have not numbered before. You understand that the Bolsheviks are not nearly as numerous as they were four or six months ago; but, on the other hand, their army is stronger, because, as I said this morning, they have Chinese, they have Letts, and they have conscripted Russians.

Senator STERLING. Is it not partly due to the pay the soldiers now get under Bolshevik rule?

Mr. FRANCIS. Well, the Chinese were induced to go into their army by being starved. There is no food for anybody who does not join the army.

Senator NELSON. They were the men who had been employed in building the Murman railroad, were they not?

Mr. FRANCIS. There were 400,000 Chinese laborers in Russia, it was estimated when I went there in 1916; and I do not know how many of them went back to their native country, but I know there are tens of thousands of them in the Bolshevik army now. They were driven there because they could not get food otherwise. Now the Bolshevik government, as I said this forenoon, is printing money at the rate of 50,000,000 to 100,000,000 rubles daily, and it is intentionally keeping no account of it, so I am reliably informed. Of course they can afford to pay any wages or salaries necessary.

Senator KING. That is pure fiat money, of course?

Mr. FRANCIS. That is pure fiat money.

Senator KING. And no means are provided for its redemption?

Mr. FRANCIS. No means whatever for its redemption.

Senator OVERMAN. Nearly everybody who has testified has stated that they are starving to death over there. I suppose they have a great many people who go into the army in order to get something to eat, people who are forced to go in for that reason?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes. You have seen the grades who obtain provision tickets. First the soldiers; then the men who work with their hands and work eight hours a day; then the men who do light work; then the intelligentsia—that is the professions. You and I would be called intelligentsia if we were over there.

Senator NELSON. And then the capitalists?

Mr. FRANCIS. The capitalists have none.

Senator NELSON. They get none?

Mr. FRANCIS. They get none.

Senator KING. You mentioned the troops. Are there not some Austrians and some Germans in the Bolshevik army?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think there are. I have had advices from our consul general at Irkutsk, Mr. Harris, and from our consuls throughout Siberia, stating that there were German and Austrian soldiers in the ranks of the Bolsheviks. They were undoubtedly drilled by German officers. The American troops were sent down from Archangel toward Volögda and up the Dyvina River toward Kotlas. They see a very perceptible improvement in the discipline of the Red Guard, or the Bolshevik troops, and they attribute it to Russian officers who have been forced to drill their troops, and also to German and Austrian officers.

Senator KING. Is it common knowledge there that Russian women are held as hostages to secure the services of their husbands, to force them into the army to render services to the Red Guard?

Mr. FRANCIS. It is.

Senator STERLING. Here is a statement from Col. Lebedeff in regard to the Bolshevik army, which I should like to read and see whether in the main it agrees with your idea. He says:

Finally the Bolsheviki formed a hired army of a peculiar kind; it was an army composed of war prisoners, mainly Hungarians and Chinese formerly employed by the Murmansk Railroad; of Lettish detachments, almost all of whom joined the Bolsheviki, and of the dregs of the population, lured by the high salaries paid them by the Soviets, the light work in the service, the privileges, and mainly by the prospect of being well fed, for at that time all of central Russia was starving. Only the Soviets and the Red Army lived lavishly and sumptuously on good rations.

Mr. FRANCIS. I agree entirely with that statement.

Senator KING. Did Lenine and Trotsky turn over the Black Sea fleet and any munitions they had—cannon and guns—to the Germans?

Mr. FRANCIS. They turned over the Black Sea fleet to the Germans.

Senator KING. What became of the cannon and war supplies that were on the western front at the time the treaty of Brest-Litovsk was signed?

Mr. FRANCIS. On the western front in Russia or in France?

Senator KING. On the western front in Russia, which would be the German east front.

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not know. I think the Germans captured very much of that. The allies saw that none of the supplies shipped to Vladivostok were shipped into the interior; but in spite of our endeavors they shipped 100 cars a day out of Archangel and sent them up to Kotlas, sent them down to Vologda, and to Petrograd and Moscow, notwithstanding that they had agreed not to do it. The Bolsheviki did that. They were evacuating those supplies continually.

Senator KING. Did they turn any of them over to Germany after they had gotten them from the allies?

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not know that they did; but if the war had not ended when it did, Germany would have captured a lot of the supplies.

Senator NELSON. Have you reason to think that the Bolshevik authorities in Petrograd got hold of any of the Red Cross supplies at any time?

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not think they took any of the supplies, but those supplies were distributed under Bolshevik supervision. Do you understand me?

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. FRANCIS. They were distributed under Bolshevik supervision in Petrograd and Moscow.

Senator KING. Was that because of the sympathy of Mr. Robins with Bolshevism?

Mr. FRANCIS. It was because of that; but I think they would not have permitted the distribution of those supplies if they had not had supervisory care of them. You know they could have prevented the distribution. They were in supreme control of Petrograd.

Senator NELSON. We have had testimony here, and therefore I call your attention to it, testimony from two sources, from Mr. Simons, and also from a young man who testified here yesterday, Mr. Hatzel, who was temporarily in charge of the Red Cross warehouse at Petrograd as a keeper under Robins, that they applied to Robins for supplies, that there were Americans there who were starving, or in need of supplies, and that he was told by Col. Robins that there were no supplies. Now, Simons, as well as this young man who testified yesterday, said that there were a lot of supplies there, flour and canned goods and canned milk, and 300,000 pounds of salt beef, and a lot of supplies, at that very time.

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not know about that, because that was after I left Petrograd; but I know Dr. Simons very well, and I know he did a lot of relief work. He was obtaining money from this country all the time. He is a Methodist minister, and he was doing a great deal of work there in the way of relieving suffering.

Senator NELSON. Is he a reliable and trustworthy man?

Mr. FRANCIS. Oh, I think so; absolutely. I think he is entirely so. He was over there when I got there and I left him there when I left Petrograd. I think he left Russia before I did, but I left Petrograd before he did. He had a very large congregation there, of resident Americans in Russia, and he had some Russians in the congregation. The middle-aged man, Mr. Simmons, who testified here, is a different man from Dr. Simons. Mr. Simmons was before you early in your investigation.

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Mr. FRANCIS. I think Mr. Simmons is a very reliable man also. He was condemned to death over there.

Senator STERLING. He was the forester who was sent over there from this country?

Mr. FRANCIS. He was the forester. I have known him for many years. I knew him before he was in Russia. I knew his father-in-law and I know all the Simmons's in St. Louis.

Senator OVERMAN. The other man, Dr. Simons, is the one who testified about the flu.

Senator NELSON. That was Dr. Simons, the preacher?

Mr. FRANCIS. Simons is a preacher and Simmons is the man that the Agricultural Department sent over there to look after the forests.

Senator OVERMAN. He is the one who was condemned to death without trial?

Mr. FRANCIS. Condemned to death without trial. He would have left Vologda with me, but he was sick. He was arrested three or four days after that and taken to Moscow and he was put in prison there, and a man who was a prison mate of his, whose name I have forgotten, sent his regards to me when he was taken out to be shot.

Senator KING. They killed him, did they?

Mr. FRANCIS. They killed him.

Senator OVERMAN. He says they shot them every day.

Mr. FRANCIS. They did not hesitate. They did not stand on the order of their shooting.

Senator KING. There was no trial?

Mr. FRANCIS. No trial whatever, and no charges preferred.

Senator NELSON. Was that the case in Petrograd, too?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; that was the case in Petrograd. They called No. 2 Garoki, via the morgue. When a man was sent there he bade farewell to hope. A man who had recently been in Moscow stated that he saw human blood flowing out under the gate of the inclosure there, where they had been shooting men charged with counter revolutionary sentiments. They did not hesitate about shooting people. When the cholera was prevalent in Petrograd, as it was last August and September, Zenoviev, who was then chief commissar of the soviet, made a speech in which he charged the bourgeoisie with being responsible for the cholera, and he said: "If any Red Guard thinks that a physician is not doing his duty, he will shoot him on the spot." That was giving license to the Red Guards to shoot down physicians wherever they saw fit. Oh, it is a disgrace to civilization—not only irreparable injury to Russia, but a disgrace to civilization!

Senator NELSON. Is not that system of government as it is carried on in Russia to-day really an anarchistic government?

Mr. FRANCIS. I should say it was. It is worse than an anarchistic government, because anarchists believe only in destroying property, as I understand it, while these people believe in destroying human life.

Senator OVERMAN. As well as property.

Mr. FRANCIS. As well as property. Lenine and Trotsky and Radek, and Tchitcherin, and Zenoviev realize that they have to kill people in order to maintain themselves. The bourgeoisie of that country and the intelligentsia are all cowed.

Senator KING. I suppose they have no arms; that the arms are in the hands of a few; in the hands of the Red Guards?

Mr. FRANCIS. They have no arms.

Senator OVERMAN. Was there not a decree passed to take the arms from everybody, to go through the houses and take arms besides looting the houses?

Mr. FRANCIS. That is what they did. They went through the houses and took the arms and took everything of value, and I have heard of their breaking mirrors, and sticking bayonets through works of art.

Senator KING. I wanted to ask you one question this morning when we reached that point, but we were diverted. If it had not been for the Bolsheviki would the Kerensky government have been able to continue functioning and to have maintained the western Russian front and to have aided the allies in the working out of the war?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think they would; because Kerensky was very much hurt when waited upon by the British, French, and Italian ambassadors and told that their Governments desired the war prosecuted more vigorously. He made a display of coming to see me because I did not accompany them, and he said, and Terestchenko, who was the minister of foreign affairs, told me, that he was hurt that they had urged him to do more when he was doing all he could.

Senator KING. From your observations, were he and his government doing everything in their power to aid Russia?

Mr. FRANCIS. They were doing everything in their power. But Germany had her spies around and was exerting very great influence under the provisional government, as she was under the Imperial Government. Now, Germany sent me a million and a half rubles a month to aid the civilians who were interned. I had 30 or 35 embassy delegates who were going around distributing this money, and I sent for one of them one day and said, "How do you distribute this money?" He said, "Why, I have a committee of interned civilians who know their colleagues, and I go to this committee and give them, we will say, 50,000 rubles, and I have them give me a receipt for it."

I said, "How do they distribute it, per capita?" He said, "Yes." I said, "Regardless of whether the recipients need the money or not—need relief or not?" You know there were many rich Germans who had been interned. He said, "Yes; I think they do that." I said, "You tell that committee in your jurisdiction that I think that is wrong, and that if they distribute the money by that system I will not send them any more." He came back two weeks from that time, and he said, "The chairman of my committee is a rich man from Riga. He was a German banker before the war. He was interned. He said Germany makes no discrimination between her subjects; that if 30 rubles will not relieve suffering 40 rubles a month will, and that if 40 rubles will not suffice, 50 rubles will." I said, "Until I have instructions from Germany to that effect, you will tell this committee to give this money only to the people who need it." He went down and told him. But soon after that I ceased to represent Germany, and I do not know what system they were pursuing. Germany sent me a million and a half rubles a month to distribute among these 300,000 German civilians who were interned. Austria sent about 600,000 rubles a month also.

I had a relief division, called the second division, that had charge of that relief work. But I never was so relieved in my life as when we severed diplomatic relations with Germany, because it relieved me of my responsibility.

Senator KING. When Lenine and Trotsky got the control of the Kerensky Government, what did they do with the representatives of that government? They killed them or drove them away?

Mr. FRANCIS. Imprisoned them. The morning of the 7th of November Kerensky had left Petrograd, and the ministers had met that afternoon in the Winter Palace where Kerensky had lived. It was surrounded by Bolshevik soldiers and Red guards. They surrendered about 2.15 the next morning.

Senator STERLING. Kerensky had escaped.

Mr. FRANCIS. Kerensky had escaped. He was the only minister that escaped.

Senator NELSON. Is he alive yet?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; he is alive now.

Senator NELSON. Where is he?

Mr. FRANCIS. He is in some town in England near London, writing a book, I am told. I saw Miliukov. Miliukov had resigned some time before that. You know he had been forced to resign by Kerensky. He called upon me in London. He was sent out of Russia because he had been affiliating with the Germans down in the Ukraine, when he was at Kiev. He explained that to me. I thought Miliukov was a very patriotic Russian. He said that the Germans had sent an officer to him to know if he would accept a proposition to get rid of the Bolsheviks, and he replied that he would, provided they would set aside the Brest-Litovsk treaty. He said the officer replied to him that he thought that was impossible, but that he would report it at Berlin. So he returned to him in about three weeks at Kiev, and said that the Germans would not set aside the Brest-Litovsk treaty at all. So Miliukov told me that from that time he had no more negotiations with the Germans. Miliukov was minister of foreign affairs. He was leader of the Cadet party, a very able man.

Senator NELSON. What became of the other members of the Kerensky government?

Mr. FRANCIS. I saw Prince Lvoff and Kanovalov in Paris at a luncheon that was given me on the Monday before the Friday on which I left, and Terestchenko is in Norway. I do not know what became of the others. Gutchkov is down in the Crimea, I think, or possibly with Kolchak or Denekin in the Ukraine.

Senator NELSON. What became of the Grand Duke Nicholas, who commanded the army at one time?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think he is in the Crimea or the Caucasus, I do not know which. He is strongly anti-German.

Senator NELSON. And a very able general?

Mr. FRANCIS. A very able man, and a very able general, too.

Senator KING. Mr. Ambassador, what do you say as to the methods of the Bolsheviki—and that is the principal object of this committee to ascertain—employed by the Bolsheviki to carry on propaganda?

Mr. FRANCIS. They have been distributing Bolshevik literature among all the armies of the allied nations, and they have not spared our army. They have been distributing Bolshevik literature among the Czecho-Slovaks, among Denekin's army, among Krasnov's army, and among Kolchak's army. They are preaching Bolshevik doctrines to the peasants all over Russia; but the peasants have become disgusted with them because they have taken the peasants' grain without paying for it. They offered to pay sometimes in these rubles that they have printed off, but the peasants do not take them.

Senator KING. Paper rubles?

Mr. FRANCIS. Paper rubles. I sent my man out to have my glasses repaired one day in Archangel, and I said, "I want these glasses back the next day—to-morrow." Well, he said he took them to the optical man and he said, "How long will it take you to repair these glasses?" The man replied, "Ten days." He asked him what the cost would be, and he said, "Ten rubles." They were reading glasses—spectacles. He said, "I will give you 10 rubles extra if you will have them done to-morrow. The owner wants them." "No; he can not have them done in that time." But he gave the man three cigarettes and they were done the next day.

Senator OVERMAN. Did you hear anything of the action of the Czecho-Slovaks in shooting Russians—shooting Bolsheviki or shooting anybody?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; I heard that they did not take any prisoners of the Bolsheviks because the Bolsheviks had disarmed them under false pretenses; that is, had promised them that if they would lay down their arms they would be given the right of way out of Russia. Instead of that they were shot. So they got hold of arms somewhere, and I heard it said that they did not take any Bolshevik prisoners. I do not know whether Kolchak, now their commander, permits that or not.

Senator NELSON. Now the anti-Bolshevik forces practically have control of the Siberian Railroad as far west as Omsk?

Mr. FRANCIS. As far west as Perm. Perm is about 1,200 miles east of Vologda. The distances over there are immense, you know. You talk about Murmansk and Archangel as if they were very near together, but they are 500 miles apart.

Senator NELSON. Murmansk is on the Kola Peninsula?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; it is on the Kola Peninsula, and the Gulf Stream and is never closed in winter.

Senator KING. Mr. Ambassador, I was asking about propaganda. Along that same line, what are they doing, so far as you know, about international propaganda, and do you know of their spending money for sending persons abroad to carry on a Bolshevik propaganda?

Mr. FRANCIS. I only know what I have heard. I have not met any of those people, but I believe they are sending their agents down into Germany and Austria and England and France; and they are sending money over here to propagandize for Bolshevism.

Senator NELSON. There is said to be a Finn in New York who is the head of a propaganda bureau in this country. What is his name?

Mr. HUMES. Nuorteva, the Finnish ambassador.

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not know him at all.

Senator KING. Radek, as you stated this morning, was in Germany and has been there for some time. Do you know anything about the amount of money which he used for propaganda purposes in Germany?

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not. I saw it estimated at 30,000,000 rubles.

Senator KING. Do you know of the Russian representative sent there by Lenine and Trotsky being exiled from Switzerland because of his propaganda—his attempt to spread Bolshevism?

Mr. FRANCIS. Being exiled from Germany?

Senator KING. From Switzerland?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; I saw that in the papers, but I do not know anything about it.

Senator KING. I did not know but that you learned something of it in Paris from the representatives of the Swiss Government.

Mr. FRANCIS. The Swiss Government has no representatives in the Paris conference, because Switzerland was not in the war.

Senator KING. I notice that Denmark's representative, Mr. Scaevinius, has been withdrawn—

Mr. FRANCIS. I know him, personally.

Senator KING (continuing). From Russia recently, and he told of the atrocities and cruelties that are perpetrated in Russia—at Petrograd—under Bolshevik Russia.

Mr. FRANCIS. I think he is a very reliable man. He was representative of a neutral power, Denmark, and consequently was remaining in Petrograd when I left. I understand that he and his wife did very material relief work there. He was called before the Paris Peace Conference.

Senator KING. He testified before them?

Mr. FRANCIS. And he gave a horrible account of the conduct of the Bolsheviks. In Petrograd he said they were dying by the thousands from starvation. He said when a horse would drop on the street from hunger the populace would surround that horse and cut it up for food. I have understood that for six weeks past the city of Petrograd has had little but oats to live on, and not sufficient of that cereal.

Senator KING. Do you know anything about the efforts now being made by the Bolsheviks to destroy the incipient governments of the Baltic provinces and of Poland?

Mr. FRANCIS. I only know what I have seen in the papers about it. I am satisfied that they are doing it. They were increasing their forces against this Archangel government when I left there, and have been increasing their forces ever since.

Senator STERLING. Speaking of propaganda, Ambassador Francis, do you recall the Root Mission?

Mr. FRANCIS. Oh, very well, indeed. I introduced that mission to all the officials in Petrograd. I had been there more than a year when the Root Mission came.

Senator STERLING. Do you recall any propaganda following the visit of the Root Mission, by means of cartoons, representing Mr. Root in a somewhat ridiculous light, printed in an American paper and then reproduced and circulated there?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; I saw that. I do not know that the Russians could understand that, however. They caricatured Mr. Root as a corporation lawyer; was not that it?

Senator NELSON. Yes.

Senator STERLING. Do you know from what paper it was reproduced?

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not. I think it was some Bolshevik publication in New York. [Laughter.] I do not recall the name of it.

Senator STERLING. Was it the New York Evening Journal, Mr. Ambassador?

Mr. FRANCIS. That was a lapsus linguæ. I did not mean to say a Bolshevik paper in the United States. I meant that it was a Bolshevik paper in Russia. I do not know what paper it appeared in first. I did not know why you were amused.

Senator KING. Mr. Ambassador, is there anything else that you feel that you want to state, keeping in mind the fact that we want to confine our investigation to efforts of the Bolsheviks to carry on propaganda?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think you have asked me all that I can think of on that subject.

Senator STERLING. Just one question I would like to ask of you, Mr. Francis. Col. Robins yesterday gave a very vivid account of the way in which he got out of Russia, the accommodations which were afforded him, the rapid transit through Siberia, with all conveniences afforded him and no searching of any kind, not even requiring him to show any passports anywhere on the whole route, and he described the trip as being made in extraordinarily rapid time. Can you account for that?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; it is very easily accounted for. The Bolshevik government, or the soviet government, whatever you may call it, wired ahead to give him the right of way, because he was persona grata, as I have told you.

Senator NELSON. They looked upon him as their friend?

Mr. FRANCIS. They looked upon him as their friend; and I learned afterwards that he was the bearer of communications from the soviet government to our Government here. In fact, he told me that he had an order from Trotsky—I think it was from Trotsky; if not, it was at Trotsky's instigation and signed by the minister of ways and communications—that his messages sent by wire should have the right of way.

Senator NELSON. He was getting more privileges than you were?

MR. FRANCIS. Well, I was not getting any.

That reminds me of an order that was issued by the soviet government that all of the telegrams sent by our consuls through Siberia and Russia generally should be in clear; they must not be in cipher. That was an unheard-of proceeding, and I think our consul general at Moscow protested against it. I received after that an unciphered message from our Consul Caldwell, who was in Vladivostok, saying that he had been notified secretly to bring his messages to a certain place unciphered, when they would be sent to me in cipher.

I immediately wired him that if the same privilege was not extended to the British, French, Italian, and the Japanese, who were our allies, not to take advantage of the offer, unless it was extended to all of our allies. I also wired the department that I had done so, and the department immediately replied to me that they had given him the same instructions that I had, upon receipt of the information. Now, my idea of fidelity to our allies is to take advantage of no privileges.

SENATOR STERLING. That they did not have?

MR. FRANCIS. That they did not have—that are not extended to them.

SENATOR KING. Did you know Mr. Treadwell, one of our consuls?

MR. FRANCIS. Very well.

SENATOR KING. He is still imprisoned by the Bolsheviks?

MR. FRANCIS. I think he is under surveillance in his residence, and the paper stated the other day that the British would release a commissar in exchange for Treadwell.

SENATOR KING. He has been under restraint for a good many months by the Bolsheviks?

MR. FRANCIS. Yes.

SENATOR KING. Brutally treated?

MR. FRANCIS. Brutally treated.

SENATOR KING. Did you know Mr. Childs in Petrograd?

MR. FRANCIS. I knew him very well.

SENATOR KING. A very high-class American, who was starved the other day.

MR. FRANCIS. He was starved the other day. I knew Mr. Childs from the time I first went there. He was the Western Union representative there, and he had 30,000 rubles when I left Petrograd, which I thought would keep him from starvation; but he was advanced in years, and a very delicate man anyway. They starved a Frenchman to death there—a very prominent man who had lived in Russia 18 years—named Darcy. He was put in prison and released just before he died.

SENATOR KING. Did you know the British officer who was murdered by the Bolsheviks in the British Embassy?

MR. FRANCIS. I did; knew him well. That was Capt. Cromy. He was in his embassy one evening when the Bolshevik soldiers entered and demanded to make a search. There was no one in there with him but the three Bolshevik soldiers. He killed two of them before they killed him, I understood. The British commissioner at Archangel told me that the British Government had notified Lenine and Trotsky that they would be pursued after the war; that no government could give them refuge, on account of this.

SENATOR OVERMAN. Did you know Mr. Ray, United States consul?

Mr. FRANCIS. Oh, yes; I knew him. He served under me. He is here now.

Senator STERLING. In Washington?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes; in Washington. He was in this room this morning, was he not?

Senator NELSON. Is he here now?

Mr. FRANCIS. He is here now. He was the consul at Odessa, was he not? He came to Petrograd, and I sent him to Chita.

Mr. BAILEY. That is correct.

Mr. FRANCIS. I was surprised to learn that he was here.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know when he returned? Is Mr. Ray here?

Mr. RAY. Yes, sir; I am here.

Mr. FRANCIS. Come up here, Mr. Ray.

Senator OVERMAN. When did you get back here, Mr. Ray?

Mr. RAY. I arrived in Washington just before Christmas. I have been down at my home in Texas, and came back last week.

Senator NELSON. When did you leave Russia?

Mr. RAY. I left Vladivostok the 2d of November.

Mr. FRANCIS. When did you leave Chita?

Mr. RAY. I was never in Chita; I was in Tomsk.

Mr. FRANCIS. That is right.

Mr. RAY. I have been through Chita, but I never stopped there.

Senator OVERMAN. I just wanted to identify you. Proceed, Mr. Francis.

Senator KING. Did you know a man named Rhys Williams?

Mr. FRANCIS. I have met him. I met him once. I understand that he testified before this committee the other day.

Senator KING. Did you know him in Russia?

Mr. FRANCIS. I met him once there. He came to me with, and I think he was introduced to me by, Mr. Harper—Dr. Samuel N. Harper—who testified before this committee the other day. He was the second witness, I think. I understand that Rhys Williams does not deny that he is a Bolshevik in sentiment. He was a Congregational minister at first, and he was recommended to me as a correspondent of the Evening Post, of New York, I think.

Senator KING. Do you know whether he had any contact with the Bolsheviks in Russia?

Mr. FRANCIS. Oh, yes; it was a matter of common knowledge.

Senator KING. Associated with them, spoke at their meetings, and so on?

Mr. FRANCIS. He was associated with them and advocated their principles, and he issued one Sunday morning an address through the Russian press calling for volunteers to organize an army of non-Russians to promote the Bolshevik cause.

Senator KING. I have no further questions.

Mr. HUMES. Governor, there is a provision in the soviet constitution that provides that all of the political rights of Russian citizenship shall be given to all foreigners who are resident in Russian territory. Do you know whether or not persons who were citizens of this country and of other countries, and who went to Russia and became a part of the soviet government, became Russian citizens by virtue of their connection with the government under that provision of the constitution?

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not know. I never heard of any man who was foolish enough to expatriate himself from American citizenship and become a Russian under Bolshevik rule. John Reed was appointed consul general of the Bolshevik government, to be stationed in New York; but they withdrew that appointment when I told Robins to say to them that he would never be recognized.

Mr. HUMES. Is there any requirement by virtue of which a man must become a citizen of Russia before he can become an official of the soviet government?

Mr. FRANCIS. I do not know that there is. But, if so, he can become a citizen of Russia merely by expressing a desire to do so—an intention of doing so.

Mr. HUMES. My point is, Governor, that there was a possibility under that provision of the constitution that a number of these American citizen who had participated in the soviet government may have renounced their American citizenship by becoming affiliated with that government, and I wondered if you had any information on that subject.

Mr. FRANCIS. No; I have not. If I had I should have communicated it to the State Department long since.

Senator KING. As I understood you this morning, you did communicate with the State Department, protesting against so many coming over from the United States, all of whom, or most of whom, participated in the Bolshevik government?

Mr. FRANCIS. I think I did. If I did not, it was a very great dereliction on my part.

Mr. BAILEY. You did. I recall it.

Senator KING. Were not some of those men, against whose advent you were protesting, Americans; for instance, that man from Buffalo—Reinstein?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes. He was an American citizen. But I think he was in Russia before I knew of it—before I knew he was coming. I protested against issuing passports to those agitators. I remember now very well, Mr. Bailey.

Senator OVERMAN. We are very much obliged to you.

Mr. FRANCIS. I am very much interested in the subject, gentlemen, and I apologize for not being able to stay here next week.

Senator NELSON. We are very much obliged to you.

Mr. FRANCIS. Senator Nelson and I first served together 22 years ago. He was Senator from Minnesota when I was Secretary of the Interior, in the Cleveland administration.

Senator NELSON. And I had a good deal of business with Secretary Francis.

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes, you did; and I found you a very efficient Senator, and I hear you are still.

Senator STERLING. We corroborate that, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. So do we all.

TESTIMONY OF MR. OLIVER M. SAYLER—Resumed.

Senator OVERMAN. Proceed, Mr. Sayler.

Mr. SAYLER. To resume my testimony of this morning, I arrived in Moscow during the Bolshevik revolution, probably the bloodiest epoch of hostility in the greatest revolution thus far. No one has ever been able to estimate the number of lives lost in Moscow at that time, but the most conservative estimate run from 1,500 to 2,500, including Bolsheviks, cadets, the military students serving in defence of the Kerensky forces, and civilians; because, as you know, street fighting in a city the size of Moscow, which is almost as large as Chicago, is no kindergarten affair. I myself saw 500 red coffins carried and buried in one grave, the contribution in dead of the Bolsheviks in this affair; and that was not all, because the funeral was held a full week after. The other public funerals were held even later, and the number of bodies carried in line in these funerals is no criterion of the loss of life.

Within a week after my arrival, however, things settled down to a kind of order, a kind of normal life, which existed throughout the winter, a kind of desultory disorder and warfare, but the best order, apparently, that could be maintained under the conditions, under the dictatorship of one class over all the other classes, because of course that, as you know, is the heart and soul of the situation over there to-day.

Within two weeks after I arrived in Moscow I found a home with a Russian millionaire. Living conditions in Moscow were about as difficult at that time as they have been in Washington the last year. If you could not get any place else to sleep you slept in the station.

I slept in the station the first night that I arrived. I found evidence everywhere that Russians were glad to have Americans on their premises for the sake of the safety that it would bring them. I must say, without giving credit to any Russian individual or any Russian class or any party, that Americans, as long as I was in Russia, were more highly regarded and more cordially received and had more privileges extended to them than any other class of people. That is true in respect to any class of Russians, and also true as to any other group of foreigners. Why that is so there is no use of going into now, but it is more or less gratifying.

As I say, I entered the home of this Russian millionaire and made my home there as long as I was in Moscow, also using his private room in connection with his offices in Petrograd while I was in Petrograd. He had two sons, both of them moderate socialists, as I am, all of us thoroughly believing in violent political revolution when necessary, but believing just as firmly in evolution instead of revolution along social lines, and, therefore, opposed bitterly and unalterably to the use of force by the Bolsheviks to gain their ends.

Senator STERLING. And if you can not get it by evolution, then by armed force and violence?

Mr. SAYLER. No; I have too much faith in the forward looking of humanity to think that force is ever necessary.

Senator OVERMAN. We do not want your views in the matter.

Mr. SAYLER. I simply gave you those facts to give you the atmosphere under which I lived in Russia.

Senator NELSON. As I understand it, you are an evolutionary socialist?

Mr. SAYLER. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Who financed you to go over there?

Mr. SAYLER. I paid it out of my own pocket.

Senator NELSON. What did you want to go over there for? You did not go as a representative of a newspaper.

Mr. SAYLER. I had a curiosity as to what was going on in what to me was the most interesting part of the world.

Senator NELSON. Did you not know that we had an ambassador there, as well as consuls?

Mr. SAYLER. Yes; and I was on cordial terms with them all, I believe I can say.

Senator OVERMAN. Go ahead and tell us the facts.

Mr. SAYLER. Let me group these facts, and I think it will save time. I want to group my facts as to what I saw in Russia, the conditions I left here, under two heads; one, those which seem to indicate an utter demoralization of all of the civilized forces in Russian life; and the other, those facts which indicate a persistence of a certain kind of order in Russian life, in spite of it all.

In this home where I lived there were 6 people in the family and 7 servants, and it took the 7 servants all of their time to find food enough for the 13, so that in spite of the fact that I had all the comforts of a rich and palatial home, I had to scrape around for my own food.

Senator NELSON. Do you not think they would have saved something by dismissing some of these servants instead of keeping seven?

Mr. SAYLER. Senator, I personally know that when I was there all seven of the servants were busy finding food for the 13 of them. I do not know what the result would have been otherwise.

Senator NELSON. But you being a socialist, I thought you would have an easy way of getting food.

Mr. SAYLER. I do not believe in easy ways of doing anything in human life, Senator.

Senator KING. Go ahead.

Mr. SAYLER. I mention that fact simply to show that I saw the Russian food situation as the normal Russian saw it. I had none of the advantages for getting food from the embassy, as I have been told other Americans did in Petrograd. I was in Moscow and the embassy was in Petrograd.

I had, moreover, to face the problem of money in an unfortunate way, and that gave me an even closer insight into the way the ordinary Russian had to look at life last winter, because I had sent only enough of my money ahead of me to Petrograd with the ruble descending in value all the time, to keep me until I could find out how long I was going to stay, and then I could cable my father to send me more of my money.

By the time I reached Russia it was impossible to have any kind of international exchange along those lines, so that the money that I had with me had to last me, and I found by inquiry that that money averaged for the time that I found I was going to stay to make my observations, about the income of the average Russian.

To give you just a concrete idea of what food meant to the average Russian and to me, I arose in the morning, drank five glasses of tea to persuade my stomach that I had had something to eat, and then took one-half of a quarter of a Russian pound, three and three-quarters ounces and not four, of bread—half of that with my tea—and I started out on my day's work with that, and I waited as long as I felt I could and keep at my work, until late in the afternoon—

Senator NELSON. What made food so scarce? You have described it. Now, what made food so scarce?

Mr. SAYLER. Senator, that is a long story. It goes away back into the unreadiness of a country like Russia to endure a long war. Russia was hungry the winter of 1916 and 1917, before the Czar fell, and a million men deserted from the army before the Czar fell. Those are facts which were established before I came into Russia—facts which I have never seen in our papers published at that time.

I took particular occasion, after I got back, to look back over the files and find whether or not those facts were acknowledged. It was probably felt, in order to keep up the morale and allied sentiment, that those things had better be kept from the public. I do not question that; I only state that as a fact.

Senator OVERMAN. This millionaire, he had plenty of money to divide with you?

Mr. SAYLER. Let me tell you where his money was, and how he was fixed on that. That will give you a concrete idea of what I have put a little later in my list here, of the demoralizing conditions, and that is the condition of finance. This millionaire, as I remember it, had several enterprises in which he was interested. He had a ten thousand-acre estate out near Smolnief. That was near the line of the German advance. They later advanced, and the estate was overrun by the Germans, and while I was there and before the Germans made that advance the peasants took that estate.

Senator NELSON. That was right, according to your notion, was it not?

Mr. SAYLER. No; I beg your pardon, Senator. It was——

Senator NELSON. Was not that according to the socialistic plan?

Mr. SAYLER. It was violent, my dear Senator. I object to violence.

Senator NELSON. No; but he was living with you in Petrograd, and those peasants went there and occupied his land. Was not that socialistic?

Mr. SAYLER. It was violent socialism, and I object to violence. I insist that everything shall be done by law passed by the majority will of the people.

Senator NELSON. Oh; go on, then. Go on.

Mr. SAYLER. Thank you. To go back to this host of mine, this millionaire as you call him, he had this 10,000-acre estate, which was taken by the peasants. For a time it was run in an orderly manner. They had hogs that they wanted to sell. They knew that it was time to sell them. They were in proper condition. Those hogs were sold and the money was kept in trust by one of them for the owner of the estate, so that if by any future act the estate should be turned back to him he could have it. If not—if their tenure of the land was maintained—then the money would be divided among them. That was all very well at the start; but when you start to using force and violence to accomplish any social change, then, my dear Senators, as I see it and as this incident worked out finally, you descend from the days of comparative idealism like that to the days when you are shooting and killing each other, as they were before I left. The reports came from the estate.

Senator KING. Starting with violence, the violence continues and increases in order to perpetuate their system?

MR. SAYLER. Yes; that is the way I see it. That is true, no matter who rises up against whom. If we had a socialist government acknowledged by the will of the majority and people should rise up in force against it, you would have more and more violence and more and more violence. It is simply a by-product of revolution and of violence in any case. Violence breeds violence. The violence of the old autocracy in Russia bred the violence of to-day. It is simply cause and effect. The pendulum swings.

Senator KING. The same manifestation finds expression in Germany to-day. They had the autocracy of the Kaiser, and now they have had a fair election, so far as we can learn, men and women voting; but the minority are not satisfied, being tainted with this violent Bolshevism, and Spartacides added to the Bolsheviks who are there are fighting the form of government which was erected by the people themselves.

MR. SAYLER. Yes. I think that was the result of the tyranny that existed in the past in Germany. The pendulum swings.

To go on with the catalogue, briefly, of this man's activities, in addition to this estate, he had a factory at Yaroslav on the Volga River, about half way between Yaroslav and Vologda. This factory was not in operation, but he had to keep on paying his working hands. How could he pay his working hands when the banks were closed—nationalized and closed? There has been a great deal said in the last two days, since I came to Washington, about the nationalization of the banks, but the banks, for all effective operations, were also closed, and have been so since last Christmas.

Senator KING. Nationalization meant destruction?

MR. SAYLER. It meant demoralization to such an extent that business could not be carried on.

Business was carried on to this extent in the banks: If you could prove that you were paying, or in a way where you had to pay, workmen certain sums of money—certain wages—you would go to the financial secretary of the soviet and get his signature on your check—on your pay roll—and draw that money out of the bank, if you had it to your credit, of course; and you could pay your hands under those conditions, and under those conditions only.

Senator STERLING. Otherwise, was it confiscation of the money that a man had on deposit in the banks?

MR. SAYLER. I am unable to say just when, or whether, that was carried out. It was suggested, I know, in the newspapers, while I was there, that all sums over 25,000 rubles should be confiscated, and that all deposits less than 25,000 rubles should be respected; but whether that was ever carried out in any of the Soviet directorates I do not know.

That brings me to the point where I can answer the Senator's question as to how this host of mine lived and how he made his way—how he bought food. His own money, according to our way of thinking, lay in the bank, but he could not touch it. There was any quantity of it.

Senator KING. Theoretically?

MR. SAYLER. Theoretically.

Senator KING. But I suppose, as a matter of fact, it had really been taken out by the Bolsheviks?

Mr. SAYLER. Oh, yes; but the presses were printing more daily. Money in Russia has no value, except as it will buy something and passes on. It is a medium of exchange, purely. It is not a medium of international exchange.

Senator KING. They had long ago taken out all of the metal money and put in printed money?

Mr. SAYLER. Yes; if there ever was any there. Russia, in four years of war, had probably exhausted a great deal of her metal-money supplies before they took the banks. At any rate, the scheme that this man had to use to get sufficient money in his pocket for the purchase of the food he needed to consume was to pad his pay roll to such an extent that he was able to get enough of his own money out to carry on these operations. That he did, month by month. There were other direct and indirect methods of getting your money out of the banks. There are some of the most amusing stories that are well authenticated of what happened in the banks of Moscow. I do not know whether the Senators care to hear them or not. It gives some idea of the state of demoralization.

For instance, one man—I am not able to substantiate this definitely, but it was common talk and was never denied—one man got the signature of the financial secretary of the soviet to his check for 5,000 rubles for some purpose or other. I do not know what it was. That check be presented at a bank to the Bolsheviki clerk. That 5,000 rubles was handed over the counter to him and the check was not taken up. He picked up the 5,000 rubles and picked up the check and put them both in his pocket. I do not know whether the thought occurred to him as to what he might be able to do with them at the time, but before the next week came around a bright idea occurred to him. He took the check back to the bank again and got another 5,000 rubles on that same check, and again the check was left on the counter, and he picked it up, took the 5,000 rubles, and again went out. He repeated that over and over again until he had 100,000 rubles that he had drawn out of the bank on that one check for 5,000 rubles. Of course, that is simply scrambling things to the point where you can not ever straighten them out. There are other stories and details of that kind. That is simply a sample of the way that things went on in the way of finance. Money was printed day after day for whatever the government needed for that day. No taxes could be collected, of course, under the prevailing disorder.

I want to say right here and now something that I have not heard mentioned in the last two days' testimony. We talk about the Bolshevik government, and we presume, apparently, that the central authority in Moscow is exercising a certain amount of control and carrying out its decrees over a great part of Russia, the parts which were somewhat definitely indicated by the ambassador a while ago, as you may remember; but, as a matter of fact, as I found it, in Russia, the Bolshevik power—the power of the soviet—whether the Bolsheviki control it in the given locality or not, extends only to the immediately contiguous territory; and that, I think, Senator Nelson, answers a question that you asked one of the witnesses a while ago as to the state of anarchy in Russia; the question as to whether anarchy, as we know it, in that sense reigns. It does reign, because there is no power than can enforce its decrees.

Senator KING. This central body has no control over the local soviets, and each local soviet runs itself?

Mr. SAYLER. Each local soviet is getting along the best way it knows how. It is feeding itself the best way it knows how. If it finds it has not enough grain, and the soviet across the way has some, it goes ahead with the guns that it brought back from the front and goes over and takes it. That is not done every day, but it is the sort of thing that can happen.

Senator NELSON. I want to indicate, in that respect, that I think you are right about what you state now.

Mr. SAYLER. Now, in another sense, however, the calling of what is going on in Russia to-day a state of anarchy is very wrong, because those who maintain the appearance of power in the central places of authority, who represent to us what is the head of government, so called, in Russia to-day, are not anarchists, and I want to bring out later, in an analysis which I would like to give you of the propaganda methods of the Bolsheviks, just the difference between the Bolsheviks and the anarchists. They are as different as you and I are from either one of them, I assure you.

Senator NELSON. Is not the one assisting the other—cooperating?

Mr. SAYLER. I think I can bring that out, too.

Senator NELSON. Is not one cooperating with the other—in the bosom of the other?

Mr. SAYLER. I can not answer that yes or no, Senator. I can bring that out clearly and with better effect at a later point, if you care to note it down and make sure that I do.

Mr. HUMES. We will remember it. Go on.

Mr. SAYLER. Very good.

Senator OVERMAN. What has become of this millionaire? Was that millionaire living there in style when you left?

Mr. SAYLER. There was not much style. There is no style in hunger.

Senator OVERMAN. The Bolsheviks did not get after him?

Mr. SAYLER. His place was requisitioned at least three times while I was there—twice by the Bolsheviks and once by the anarchists. He played the Bolsheviks off against the anarchists, and bought one or the other off at different times—I have forgotten the exact details of the matter—and as a result when I left Moscow on the 24th of March, on my 37-day trip out of Russia, he was still in this home. I have since had word from his brother, who is an American citizen and has been for 20 years, that he and his family were moving to Kiev.

Senator KING. For safety?

Mr. SAYLER. For safety and for food.

Senator NELSON. Were you 37 days in getting out of Russia?

Mr. SAYLER. Thirty-seven days; yes, sir.

Senator NELSON. By the Siberian Railroad?

Mr. SAYLER. By the Siberian Railroad.

Senator NELSON. You were not as fortunate, then, as Col. Robins?

Mr. SAYLER. We did not go at the same time. The man who went before me 10 days or two weeks might have gone more rapidly or more slowly. There is no order or common sense or anything else about the way things go on in Russia now, because the thing has gone into that chaos which comes inevitably with violent social revolution.

Senator KING. Mr. Witness, I suppose that Lenine and Trotsky, wherever their troops are, exercise control over the local soviet by terror—by rifles?

Mr. SAYLER. Wherever the troops are they have their way if it is possible; but I do not know that you can say that they have control over their troops, necessarily.

Senator KING. No.

Mr. SAYLER. I am not prepared to say one way or the other about it.

Mr. HUMES. The local soviets where the troops are are more likely to control them than the Lenine and Trotsky government at Moscow?

Mr. SAYLER. Certainly; far more.

Senator KING. Unless it is what might be denominated the national army, composed of Letts, Chinese, and hooligans.

Mr. SAYLER. If they are obeying their orders, and——

Senator KING. They are taking orders now from Trotsky, who rides around on a horse as a military commander?

Mr. SAYLER. He did not appear in public while I was there. I did not set eyes on him.

Senator KING. Proceed, and excuse the interruption.

Mr. SAYLER. I have touched on the demoralized condition as to food, and of course you can imagine what the condition of health must be with hunger stalking in the wake every day.

Senator KING. The statements, then, as to deaths from starvation are not overdrawn?

Mr. SAYLER. I think they are not overdrawn. Of my own personal acquaintance I never knew anyone who died from starvation while I was in Russia.

Senator KING. You left there a year ago?

Mr. SAYLER. No; I left Russian soil the 1st of May. I left Moscow the end of March.

Senator KING. So that a great change has taken place since?

Mr. SAYLER. Things have gone from bad to worse. They could not help it.

Senator KING. So that the conditions are very much worse than when you were there.

Mr. SAYLER. Those conditions, as I tried to make perfectly clear, went back into the days of the Czar, because of the inability of a country like Russia to face a long war. The seeds that are growing into weeds to-day were planted away back there, and in that sense, gentlemen, please do not for a moment mistake me as defending the Bolsheviks in this, because I think I can prove that I am, more unequivocally, by making this statement than if I did not make it. The Bolsheviks are a symptom and not altogether a cause. The fact that they have thrown Russia into violent social revolution undoubtedly puts upon them the burden of having caused a certain amount of the chaos which is going on in Russia to-day; but there is at least as much blame to be thrown back on the old régime and its methods for allowing Russia to get into the position where the Bolsheviks could come, as one of the disruptive and violent forces in Russian life. I range hunger and the Bolsheviks side by side as the causes of the old régime——

Senator KING. But the Bolsheviks stand as a dictatorship in the view of the proletariat?

Mr. SAYLER. Yes; Bolshevism is a desperate, fanatical attempt to solve a hopeless situation.

Senator KING. It is class warfare?

Mr. SAYLER. It is class warfare.

Senator KING. It is a determination of one class, the proletariat, to get power, even if by doing so it exterminates all other classes?

Mr. SAYLER. Yes; even if it by so doing exterminates. It would prefer to disrupt all other classes and make only one class in the community.

Senator KING. It would prefer to have people to agree with its theory, failing which it would exterminate them?

Mr. SAYLER. Yes.

Senator NELSON. Do you believe in the Bolshevik system of government as they have outlined it in their decrees, if it could be accomplished without violence?

Mr. SAYLER. Not in the world to-day, Senator. They are not ready for it. I do not know whether the world will be ready for it in the next two or three generations.

Senator NELSON. But you have some views that the world will some time be ready for it

Mr. SAYLER. Ultimately, possibly; but it is a matter, to me, of deciding what to do day by day in order to make our lives a little bit better and more efficient, a little bit more honest with our fellow men.

Senator NELSON. Then you believe that there is a demand for the Bolsheviki system of government, and that it remains simply for the people to grow up to it?

Mr. SAYLER. Not necessarily. If the future works that way all well and good. I do not pretend to predict for the future.

Senator KING. Do you not think that Bolshevism is founded upon what might be called religious paganism; the destruction of all religious sentiment; that it inevitably leads to it?

Mr. SAYLER. There is a materialistic phase of Bolshevism. So far as I could see of their attitude toward the church of Russia that is a point that I had intended to include on the other side of the ledger, because it is one of the more or less normal features of Russian life, the life of the church. The Bolsheviki have not actively opposed the church to my knowledge. They have more or less sneered at it, in individual utterances.

Senator KING. Recently; in the last two or three months—

Mr. SAYLER. I can not say as to that.

Senator KING (continuing). Have they not taken the churches, and have they not established schools for the teaching of atheism?

Mr. SAYLER. I can not say as to that. I know of only one violent act, which happened during my stay there, and which had any bearing on this. The Alexander church in Petrograd, the third of the churches in Petrograd, was seized by the Bolsheviki for public use, and about the middle of February, 1918, I saw 300,000 men, women, and children march in line in Moscow in protest against that act. As I have read the utterances of individuals who have come back from Russia since my return last August, it seems to me that mistakes have been made in both extremes. Those who have defended the Bolsheviki have insisted that the church has no further influence in Russia; and those who are against the Bolsheviki most bitterly, usually, it seems to me, make the mistake of overemphasizing the unanimity of the Russian church, and put upon it the burden of rejuvenating Russia. As I saw it, and I can only give my own honest testimony, the truth lies somewhere in between there. There is no doubt that the church in Russia has lost a great deal of its old hold, because a great deal of its old hold was through superstition and fear, and the fact that the church worked hand and glove with the old régime in Russia; but at the same time no one could have stood with me, watching those 300,000 men and women and children march in silent protest, with their gold ikons over their shoulders, into the great Red Square in Moscow in protest against this act of the Bolsheviki, without realizing that there was some remaining life in the Russian church.

Senator KING. Is not that borne out by the statement of Gov. Francis, that perhaps only 10 per cent, or at least only a small part, of the Russian people believe in these violent methods of the Bolsheviki rulers, and that the mass of the people are still what they were before, honest, simple-minded peasants, desiring peace and to work out their salvation as best they may?

Mr. SAYLER. Well, now, if I were to assent to anyone's figures, the figures of the Ambassador or anyone else, as to the proportion of those who are supporting the Bolsheviki and those who are against them, I would be making a false move to my own honesty, because I do not know. I have no way of knowing. Figures are quoted as to the number of votes cast at the constitutional assembly election—which, by the way, I beg to correct in the statement as to when it was held. I heard a while ago some one give the testimony that it was held before the Bolsheviki came into control. I arrived in Moscow after they had seized the power and were fighting to maintain it, and this election was held after my arrival in Moscow. I was in Moscow at the time, so that the election must have been held after they seized control. The nominations for that election, however, were made and confirmed before the Bolsheviki came into control. That I should like to refer to a little later in the matter of propaganda, because, mind you, the Bolsheviki are using propaganda in their own country just as much as they are trying to use it elsewhere.

Senator KING. In this country is well?

Mr. SAYLER. Well, I have not seen with my own eyes anything like propaganda intended for this country. I merely have seen posted in Moscow the decrees and the dodgers and posters declaring what is known as a holy war upon the whole world.

Senator KING. That would include this country?

Mr. SAYLER. Yes; we are part of the earth—a pretty big part. I get away from my point here.

Senator NELSON. Now, can you not come back to facts instead of giving us a lecture?

Mr. SAYLER. Very good, Senator.

Senator NELSON. Instead of giving us a lecture, give us facts.

Mr. SAYLER. I think I have been trying to give facts.

Senator KING. I think you are.

Senator NELSON. Tell us what the difficulty is, and then give us your remedy—your pilgarlic for it. Tell us what to do.

Senator KING. I object to the views of the witness as to what we ought to do. I do not think that is material.

Senator NELSON. I think we ought to get information as to what we ought to do.

Mr. SAYLER. Well, in any case, I will try to proceed according to the wishes of the Senator, and give facts. I thought I had been making facts the backbone of what I had said.

One of the phases of demoralization in Russia undoubtedly is the railroads. I could talk all night on my experiences on the Russian railroads; but suffice it to say that the whole system has simply gone to pot; and that goes back not to the acts of any particular party but to the fact that Russia was not, as a nation, ready to make a four years' war. The railroads had begun to fail to function long before even the first revolution; and that is the chief reason, the underlying reason, for the lack of food in the proper places. It could not be carried, even if it was grown.

Senator NELSON. Are not the Russian railroads all State railroads—owned by the government?

Mr. SAYLER. They are, yes; but they are operated in a very peculiar fashion, Senator. They are operated under district control. One district has absolute control over the railroad in its own territory and another district has absolute control in another territory; and when things began to look bad in Russia——

Senator NELSON. Is not that system of State ownership and operation of the railroads in Russia a lesson to you about the matter of running railroads in this country?

Mr. SAYLER. Oh, I do not know that you can draw conclusions that quickly and rapidly; no, I can not say so.

But to get back to the point, the fact that these railroads were operated by districts led to the practice of one district "cabbaging" all the cars that it got, and cars were congested in districts where, possibly, they were not needed, but were desired for some future use; and in other ways demoralization bred demoralization, and the thing went from bad to worse. I will not go into that. I have waited for two days and three nights for a train in a Russian railroad station because there was no way of knowing when the train would come in. I had the privilege, at the hands of the stationmaster, because I was an American, of staying during that time in his office; but next door, in the common waiting room, I have seen, gentlemen, people, human beings, dirtier than you and I are to-day but possibly just as good, lying sleeping on the floor three deep, with their heads out for air—such air as it was.

We have heard a lot about the Army during the last two days, and one of the bones of contention seems to be over this matter of what the soldiers took home from the front when they demobilized themselves—I will not say when they were demobilized, because most of it was automatic. For days upon days up the Arbat, one of the leading streets in Moscow, leading from the station going down to the southwestern front where many of Russia's Army were in the field, melting away—for days upon days there was a constant procession from daylight until dark, and long after, of soldiers in the olive drab of the Russian uniform marching up that street in procession on their way to other railroad stations; and I would not attempt to make an accurate estimate of the numbers of arms they carried, but I should say that, roughly speaking, nine men out of ten carried his gun over his back; and those guns went back to the farms, because they had no further use for them. There was no sale for them. Some rifles—extra rifles—were probably sold, as we heard, at the front to the Germans for little or nothing before they left; but usually the tovarisch, as the Russian soldier is known to-day—"comrade"—carried his rifle on his back.

Senator STERLING. Did every Russian soldier at the front have a rifle to begin with?

Mr. SAYLER. Toward the end, Senator, they were pretty well armed, through the factories of Japan and our own factories and the arms sent to Archangel from France and England; but earlier in the war, at the time when they were needed, there was in some parts of the Russian front about one rifle to 12 men, and at the bridgehead at Dvinsk the Russians beat back the Germans with the sticks and stones that they could pick up.

Senator STERLING. Was it not true in some of the later battles of the war that disaster followed because of the lack of arms and munitions?

Mr. SAYLER. Very possibly. It was not properly distributed; but I only give my word that I saw nearly every peasant go back with his gun on his back. Now, that may be used to imply several things. It may be used to imply that they are able to fight and do fight to maintain their rights, or that they ought to—or, you can interpret it in any way you like. But there is one phase of the situation that might be forgotten, gentlemen, and that is that a gun is of no use unless you have ammunition; and unless they had carried back with them more ammunition than any human being could carry that gun could not be used forever. So, manifestly, the fact that the peasant is armed has not as much to do with any given situation as at first you might think.

Senator STERLING. After they disbanded, demobilized, and the peasants returned to their farms, was there any means of getting ammunition, even if they had their guns?

Mr. SAYLER. Not that I know of, Senator.

Education is another phase of Russian life which has gone pretty completely to pieces. The universities have either been closed or practically rendered inefficient by one phase and another of the development of life under the Bolsheviki. They have, it is true, a scheme for educating the whole of the Russian people, educating the most ignorant first and letting higher education go to the winds; but it is manifest that under a condition where chaos rules, practical things, no matter how idealistic they may be, no matter how good they may be in their consequences, can not be carried out. In other words, gentlemen, whatever good the Bolsheviki have tried to do has been impossible to accomplish under the conditions which brought them to power.

Senator KING. And under the methods which they employ?

Mr. SAYLER. Under the methods which they are compelled to use to maintain their power.

Senator STERLING. I think that is well added—your last statement.

Mr. SAYLER. It is part of the story, undoubtedly.

Senator KING. Of course they resort to all sorts of violence in order to perpetuate themselves in power.

Mr. SAYLER. Well, I saw little violence while I was there.

I want to come back to a question that you asked me, Senator, a moment ago, in regard to the proportion of those who uphold the Bolsheviki and those who are against them. It was my observation in Russia, and it has been my observation as I have gone in other countries in the world, and have looked at social affairs in my own country, that the vast majority of the people do not give a hang who is in power so long as they have decent, normal conditions of living, enough to eat, enough wages, etc. There is a great hullabaloo every few years about political parties and elections, etc., and it is a pleasant pastime to talk; but, as in every other country, so in Russia to-day there are very few people, as far as I could see, who cared particularly; who had conscious theories of government, in other words.

Senator STERLING. Were you out much among the peasants? Were you at the various mirs or villages?

Mr. SAYLER. I did not go out in the villages, but I lived for several days in Vologda—a country town of about 30,000 people, as I remember it—and in Samara, and I got out into the smaller villages near Samara, but not to any great extent. Life was too difficult, and I felt that I was seeing about all that I could stuff into my eyes as it was.

Now, let me briefly sketch the remainder of a normal life in Russia as I saw it. I do not intend to go into the details of why these things persist. They do. I am simply showing you things as I saw them.

Take this matter of newspapers, which we have had up a great many times during the last two days. I do not know what the official action of the soviet government has been in regard to newspapers. I have heard it commented on. I may have read it at sometime, but I do not recall it sufficiently well to make any statements on the case. I only know, Senators, that while I was in Moscow, from November until March, 1918, there were times, at irregular intervals, when the stress of affairs reached a certain point, when the newspapers in violent opposition—not all of those in opposition, but those in violent opposition—to the Bolsheviki were suppressed. I know personally that the Russkiya Vedomosti, the New York Times of Russia, was published, I should say, the greater number of mornings of my stay in Russia, but there were times when it was prevented from publication. Likewise with the Russkoye Slovo; likewise the Ranneye Outro—"Early Morning" is the meaning of it. Likewise with the Outro Rossie or Morning Russia; and so on with the violent opponents of the Bolsheviki.

On the other hand, the papers representing the various shades and opinions of the social parties, from the most moderate to the most extreme, even including the anarchist paper Anarchia, in Moscow, appeared usually during these times of storm and stress. In other words, it seems to me that the Bolsheviki were willing to let those who approximated their theories as to ends to be achieved go ahead, even though they disagreed as to the methods to be followed.

Senator STERLING. Did you hear of any fines being imposed upon the publishers of newspapers for publishing prohibited matter?

Mr. SAYLER. No; I never heard of anything of the kind. I knew personally several individuals on the so-called bourgeoisie newspapers in Russia, and they never spoke to me of anything of the kind. Life went on more or less normally with them. When they did not appear, they did not appear; and when they did, they went to their work and did their work. They paid out vast sums of money to try to get accurate news—these papers did; but accuracy of news was impossible under the conditions. It simply could not be arrived at. I had to go all the way across Siberia to get out of my head the idea, planted there by every newspaper in Moscow, that there were 1,000,000 Japanese soldiers in Siberia. That story was printed by even the most conservative papers, because it seemed to come with some authority from somewhere.

SENATOR STERLING. That was German propaganda, was it not?

MR. SAYLER. Possibly. There was plenty of it there.

The theaters went on, too; and I speak there with something of a very keen interest, because, of course, the criticism of the theater is, as I indicated this morning, my chief profession; and one of the two things I went to Russia to do was to make a study of the Russian theater before it disappeared, if it should disappear in the revolution, knowing that it was the most important theater of the modern world. The other purpose I had in going to Russia was simply to be in an interesting situation at an intensely interesting time.

The theaters went on. I went, in the course of my time in Petrograd and Moscow, 87 times to the Russian theater. Now, there must be some remnant of order left in a country if that is possible; and the theaters that were going were usually crowded to the doors, with seats sold days in advance, and usually the most serious and the most important and often the most tragic plays in the entire repertory were presented at those theaters.

SENATOR STERLING. If you will pardon this question right here, because it seems pertinent, are not people in tragic times like that apt to seek relief in some kind of diversion, such as the theater affords?

MR. SAYLER. They are, Senator. But the strange part about the situation in Moscow and in Petrograd was that the lighter theaters, the theaters of mere amusement, did not persist. They were the ones that dropped out first of all. So there must be something else to explain that, and that goes into details which are not interesting or not pertinent to this inquiry. At the same time these theaters were going on, life, as I have indicated, was abnormal in its lack of order, in its chaos. There was not a single one of those 87 nights when I came home from the theater in Petrograd or Moscow when I did not hear shooting across the city or around the corner somewhere on my trip.

SENATOR KING. Death became so common that it attracted no attention?

MR. SAYLER. Death became common; but death to the Russian is not a matter of great import, either the death of some one else or the death of himself. There is a certain far-Eastern fatalism in the Russian which makes for cheapness of life; and that, I insist, gentlemen, is to be looked upon as one of the reasons for what bloodshed there is in Russia to-day—that fatalism and that cheapness of life. It is not necessarily a selfish cheapness of life. You do not kill any more readily than you are killed. It explains the dash and the fire of the Russian armies in going to the front and falling as they did, losing 2,000,000 men, as we know.

Free speech is a thing that has been discussed; and I can only speak from my own knowledge of what I saw while I was there. I have no doubt that since then, as life has become more bitter and more intense; there has been less of it than there was while I was there; but I only know this, that I stood in a group on the street corner often—you could hardly pass a street corner without finding such a group—and listened while some one in an impromptu oration simply "gave hell" to the Bolsheviki. There is no other word for it. They used all the violent terms and all of the terms of opprobrium in the Russian language, and the Russian language is full of them.

Senator STERLING. Did that happen a short time before you came away or when you first went there?

Mr. SAYLER. Up to the time I left. And often, gentlemen, I would see next shoulder to me the Bolshevik Red Guard posted to keep order at that corner, and he was simply taking it all in.

Senator NELSON. Have they good swear words in the Russian language? [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYLER. Oh, wonderful words. I wish I had brought some of them back to England to my friends. [Laughter.] We had a Belgian who had served in the Russian navy until he lost his commission as an officer, who came out on the train with us, and of course he learned them all while he was there; and he got out into Peking, and expected to find a wonderful international society, all kinds of jewels, and beautiful ladies, etc., to repay him for these years of hardship in Russia; and when he did not find it he let loose all of that string of Russian swear words, translated into English.

To come back to the point, though, there was free speech, as far as I could see, in Russia at that time. I do not pretend to judge as to what has happened since. I should say, just as a guess, that if things have become as intense and as bitter as they have, freedom of speech is a lost thing in Russia to-day. It is one of those cases where violence breeds violence and tyranny breeds tyranny, and free speech goes down after it has existed for awhile.

Drunkenness is another element that comes under the head of order as well as disorder, because I can not swear to having seen more than two people under the influence of liquor the whole time I was in Russia.

Senator STERLING. Well, vodka had been prohibited.

Mr. SAYLER. Vodka had been prohibited, Senator, under the Czar, in the first month of the war. That prohibition had persisted throughout the war under the Czar. It had persisted throughout the régime of Kerensky. It persisted and, as far as I know, persists to-day under the rule of the Bolsheviki; because they know, gentlemen—there is no use in dodging this fact—that if they can not preserve a certain amount of order where they are in power they can not persist in power; and they know perfectly well that to release that particular curse on the Russian people would bring about the kind of disorder that they could not control.

The church, as I spoke of a while ago, and order in general, as I have indicated, now exists where it exists simply for the reason that the Bolsheviki know that if they do not preserve a certain amount of it they can not retain their control.

Let me jump at once—I am taking too much time——

Mr. HUMES. I want to ask you one thing there. What are the admissions to the theaters in Moscow?

Mr. SAYLER. That gets into a point that I was going to try to sidestep, Major, because it involves the decision of what a ruble is worth in our money. I can tell you what the admissions were in rubles, yes; but what a ruble is worth God knows, and I do not think He is very sure.

Mr. HUMES. What is it in rubles?

Mr. SAYLER. At the Moscow Art Theater, the greatest of the Russian theaters of the drama, the prices run from a ruble and a half to 15 rubles. At the opera and the ballet the prices are higher; and, of course, there is speculation. Where you have seats sold out you have theater ticket speculation everywhere in the world.

Senator OVERMAN. We will close this testimony right here, and the case, subject to the call of the chairman. We will not take any more testimony.

Senator KING. Unless there is some particular point Maj. Humes wanted to ask this witness about.

Mr. SAYLER. May I submit, Senator, a memorandum?

Senator NELSON. If you will give us facts instead of theories we would like it. I speak for myself only. Give us facts about this matter, instead of exploiting your theories.

Mr. SAYLER. I do not know that I have any particular theories, gentlemen.

Senator OVERMAN. You are arguing all along; but you have been a pretty good witness.

Senator KING. Oh, I think the witness has been very fair, and has presented his view, and it is very interesting. I appreciate it very much. I am glad to get your view.

Mr. SAYLER. May I, gentlemen, submit to you for incorporation in the record my views of Russia, of the propaganda methods of the Bolsheviks in relation to the Germans, the Czecho-Slovaks, the anarchists, and the international situation? It seems to me that possibly would be pertinent to the record and to the case.

Senator KING. I should be glad to have you do so; and, as a matter of fact, that is really the primary purpose of this branch of the inquiry.

Senator OVERMAN. How long will it take you to do it?

Mr. SAYLER. To do it carefully, it would take me some time. I could do it more carefully for you, gentlemen, if you wish me to write it out.

Senator KING. I move that the witness be permitted to do that.

Senator OVERMAN. Can you not make your full statement, like you have made it here, and hand it to me?

Mr. SAYLER. Very well. I will have it ready for you—when shall I call on you, Senator?

Senator OVERMAN. Can you get it ready by Monday or Tuesday?

Mr. SAYLER. Yes, sir.

Senator OVERMAN. All right. Just make your statement and hand it to me.

Mr. SAYLER. Very well. I appreciate your courtesy.

Senator KING. Speaking for myself, anything that you know relative to the propaganda of the Bolsheviks, not only in Europe but in our country, in the Western Hemisphere, I should be very glad to have incorporated in the record.

Mr. SAYLER. Very good. I have the last word in the now famous Saratov decree concerning the nationalization of women—the last chapter.

Senator NELSON. Give us facts.

Senator KING. What does it say—just put it in the record here now—about the nationalization of women?

Mr. SAYLER. I will submit in my memorandum to Senator Overman the entire decree.

Mr. HUMES. He has the proclamation in Russian, just as it was posted.

Mr. SAYLER. Yes; I have the proclamation in Russian, and I have the translation of it; but the upshot of it is this: The so-called Saratov decree concerning the socialization of women seems, as far as I can understand by an interpretation of this proclamation of the anarchists in reply to the original proclamation, to be a piece of Bolshevik provocatsia—that is a Russian word; we have nothing like it—provocation propaganda, against the anarchists, charging the anarchists with this in order to oppose them at a time when the anarchists were their most dangerous opponents, last spring and summer in Russia.

Senator OVERMAN. Do they have respect for women over there? Do they treat them well?

Mr. SAYLER. Why, the average Russian has respect for women, yes; as far as I could see, intense respect.

Senator NELSON. But the Red Guard, the Bolshevik leaders—what about them?

Mr. SAYLER. I saw nothing to the contrary with respect to them at the time I was there.

Senator OVERMAN. Do you know anything about the Red Guard going to the place where that seminary was, where there were three or four hundred young girls, taking possession of it, and keeping the girls in there with them?

Mr. SAYLER. I saw or heard nothing of that; no.

Senator KING. That was in Petrograd, where Dr. Simons was.

Mr. SAYLER. I was in Moscow most of the time. I was in Petrograd two weeks.

Senator KING. Only two weeks?

Mr. SAYLER. Two weeks only; 10 days of it after the embassies had gone.

Senator KING. I move that the hearings be closed, and that the subcommittee adjourn subject to the call of the chairman.

(The motion was agreed to.)

Senator OVERMAN. The testimony is closed.

(Thereupon, at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., the subcommittee adjourned subject to the call of the chairman.)

(The following statement was submitted in writing several days later:)

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT OF OLIVER M. SAYLER.

I have recounted to you, gentlemen, the facts which I observed in Russia from November, 1917, to May, 1918, showing a complete demoralization of such functions of civilized life as the food supply, railroad transportation, the financial and banking structure, the army, the educational system, etc., existing side by side with such survivals of order as the intermittent continuation of even the conservative newspapers, the continuation of the theaters, the more serious rather than the lighter ones of mere amusement, the existence of free speech (so long as I was in Russia), the absence of drunkenness, due, as I have said, to the fact that the Bolsheviks knew that they must preserve order under their system or that system would fail, and the continued power of the church over the minds and hearts of a vast share of the population in spite of the fact that it had lost such control as it used to exercise through the application of fear by virtue of its connection with the old régime.

These facts seemed to me to indicate, as I have said, that although the Bolsheviks by their program of violent social revolution by any and every means have tended to aggravate the demoralization of the functions of life, they are rather to be looked on as a symptom than as a cause—one of the coordinate results of the oppression of the old régime making their appearance on the Russian scene alongside and partly because of hunger, disintegration of the army and of all industrial life, etc. In other words, they have been unable to put into practical effect the idealistic plans they have contemplated because of the existence in the Russian scene of the same conditions which brought them to power and also by their determination, at any cost, to retain their power.

I should like to proceed, gentlemen, to recount the instances and the events that passed before my eyes while I was in Russia which indicate the methods of the Bolsheviks in their attempt to spread their doctrine and system over the world by violent social revolution. Those methods in their various forms might be termed, I suppose, propaganda. In every instance those methods took the form of opportunism, a Machiavellian subordination of means to ends. In their relationship to their own people, to the Germans, to the Czecho-Slovaks, to the anarchists, and to the rest of the world this statement regarding the methods they have used would, I think, invariably apply.

First of all let us take their relationship to their own people. In their published statements of doctrine it has been evident to you that their program is international even to the exclusion of any thought whatever for Russia as Russia. Since they are necessarily dealing with Russians and using Russians for achieving their ends, they were compelled during my residence in Russia to play fast and loose with the international idea, and in proclamations which I saw in the streets and in the newspapers emphasis was occasionally shifted to Russia when that course seemed advisable for the purpose of their retaining control of their forces. This was particularly true at the time of the German advance of February and March, 1918, in the days before the treaty of Brest-Litovsk was provisionally signed by the Kommissars who had gone to the front. A sense of national patriotism was appealed to in the handbills which were strewn over Petrograd at that time.

Their opportunist methods, however, are even more clear in their relationship with the constitutional assembly, the elections for which were held after the Bolsheviks came into power in November, 1917. The nominations for that election had been made and confirmed under the Kerensky régime, but the Bolsheviks had been the loudest in their demand that the assembly be hurried up instead of postponed. Their intent, as it turned out, was to abide by the decision of the assembly only if they could elect a majority of its members. As far as I could see in Moscow the election was held in an orderly and honest manner, but the result of the election throughout the country gave the party of the Socialists-Revolutionists a majority over all the other parties in the make-up of the assembly, while the Bolsheviks elected a much smaller proportion of the delegates. As soon as this result became known the efforts of the Bolsheviks to retain their new power without the mandate of the assembly became apparent. There was a question for a time whether they would permit the assembly to meet at all, and numerous hardships were placed in the way of opposing delegates in distant parts of the country in their attempt to reach Petrograd. The time for the assembly was postponed and the number of delegates necessary for the opening of the convention was placed so high that they thought that that number could not reach Petrograd. Finally, however, their conditions were fulfilled, the assembly was permitted to open and then was closed before its first session was fairly over, never to meet again. Thus the Bolsheviks had played fast and loose with the situation, acting arbitrarily only when they found they had to do so to retain their power.

The inner relationships of the Bolsheviks and the Germans are still obscure. From a thorough reading and study of their proclamations and their acts and their newspapers and from conversation with numerous individuals who held the Bolshevik faith, I am confident that whatever aid and orders the Bolsheviks took from Germany were accepted and carried out with the distinct understanding in their own minds that they would use that aid against the German imperial power ceaselessly and relentlessly whenever the opportunity presented itself. In fact, the All-Russia congress of Soviets which ratified the treaty of Brest-Litovsk in Moscow (I was in Moscow at the time and observed the facts) proceeded after the ratification of the treaty to consider means and methods for breaking and nullifying that treaty. I know personally of the vast quantity of revolutionary propaganda which poured across the line into Germany even as early as December when the armistice was signed, designed to undermine the loyalty of the German troops to the imperial power. I have in my possession an original four-sheet illustrated paper, a translation into English for record and souvenir purposes, of the document which was probably most freely used in this connection. That it is such a document and such only and was not intended for use as propaganda in English-speaking countries seems to me to be apparent from the make-up of the paper which, through the choice of the illustrations, constantly plays upon the German mind and emotions, and is not directed toward our institutions as it would be in case it was intended for use as English or American propaganda.

No one of the newspaper correspondents in Russia had the least doubt that there were German agents among the Bolsheviks. Who they were was practically impossible to determine in all the chaos of the situation. The best reason to suppose there were such agents was the fact that in this chaos there was nothing to prevent such action on the part of Germany, and Germany never passed up such an opportunity anywhere in the world. Under the conditions, however, Germany's purposes seemed to be served best by merely supporting and not interfering with the Bolshevik régime and program; for it kept Russia helpless in a military way for the time being. The Russian or rather the Bolshevik viewpoint at the same time was that it could afford to take aid from Germany and execute German orders outwardly while at the same time it took advantage of the opening of the frontier to flood the German proletariat with revolutionary propaganda. In this connection, it has seemed to me that the point of the so-called Sisson documents was largely missed in this country, for granted that they were accurate and true (which I do not grant, except for the purposes of argument in view of the fact that I have no personal knowledge of them or the facts and the situations which they purport to reveal), even then it has seemed to me that they were most eloquent as showing the opportunist methods of the Bolsheviks in accepting aid from whatever source in order to maintain their power and spread their doctrines when the time seemed ripe throughout the world.

A great deal has been said of the fact that German and Austrian prisoners cooperated with the Bolsheviks in Siberia and in European Russia. On my way out through Siberia I took the pains to talk with a number of these individuals, many of whom had been to America and spoke English, particularly the Austrians, and I found that the larger share of these men who were working with the Bolsheviks were sincere Bolsheviks themselves, internationalists, working with the Russian Bolsheviks as such rather than as German and Austrian nationals. That this state of affairs was permitted and encouraged by the German imperial power seems to me to be only a part of their general scheme to support the Bolshevik régime for the sake of keeping Russia powerless.

Bolshevik relationships with the Czecho-Slovaks took much the same course as their relationships with other forces and groups inside and outside Russia—an opportunist course designed to further their course of violent international revolution. My impressions in this matter were gathered from a close observation of the early days of the Czecho-Slovak expedition. I was in Samara for 10 days while the matter of permitting the Czechs to depart from Russia was under consideration and on my own way out I passed numerous units of the Czechs who had preceded me. I wish to state here that I have never seen a finer, more manly, more soldierly group of men than those which made up the rank and file of the Czecho-Slovaks. Their behavior under my observation was exemplary. While I was in Samara several conflicting orders and decisions as to their disposal came through from Moscow. Trotzky's difficulty seemed to be in deciding whether the Czechs in the heart of Russia would be more dangerous to the Bolsheviks than the Czechs on the frontiers. In the former case they could be watched, in the latter they would be more or less safely distant from the seat of power. Why the Czechs were not routed to Archangel, which was then closed by ice but which would have been open for their transfer to Europe in much shorter time than the Pacific journey would have consumed, was a matter of mystery to all of us in Moscow and Samara. That is a matter, however, involving the motives of the French and others who stood financially back of the Czech movement and does not concern this inquiry. It is sufficient for me to add that from the moment the Siberian route was chosen I found many Russians with whom I talked in favor of the movement for the sake of the chances it would offer toward the end of embroiling the Czechs against the Bolsheviks as counter-revolutionists, against the knowledge of the Czechs themselves, it might be. This fine body of men thus came to be used both by the Bolsheviks and the reactionary Russians as a smoke screen behind which and through which to further their own propaganda.

Bolshevik methods of propaganda are excellently revealed, it seems to me, in their relationships with the anarchists in Russia. As a party group, the anarchists were the most dangerous opponents of the Bolsheviks during the spring and early summer of 1918. Their strength in some communities became so great that they seemed on the point of seizing the power from the Bolsheviks, notably Samara, Saratoff, and other cities along the Volga and also Irkutsk in Siberia. To counteract this growing power, the Bolsheviks used any and every means, finally arriving at a violent suppression of them about July, I understand, some weeks after I had left Russia. While I was still in Russia, though, I observed one particularly eloquent piece of propaganda against the anarchists. It took the form of provocatsia, a favorite Russian method of attack, imputing to your opponent discreditable motives, etc., and signing his name to it in public.

This is the explanation I am sure of the now famous so-called Saratoff decree concerning the nationalization of women. I have a literal translation of this famous proclamation, but I understand, gentlemen, that it has been presented heretofore in the testimony of former witnesses. I was in Samara at the time this proclamation was posted in Samara, Saratoff, and other Volga cities. I took particular pains to trace it down and in my quest I visited the anarchists' clubhouse in Samara, a building which they had requisitioned and confiscated from a Samara millionaire. In answer to my request for an explanation, a copy of a proclamation which they had begun to post throughout the city was handed to me and I give below a literal translation of the original which I have in my possession:

"From the Samara Federation of Anarchists Regarding the 'Decree'" (the Saratoff Decree):

"The enemy" (that is, the Bolsheviks) "is powerless. The enemy is falling lower and lower. And in his fall he is blaspheming. And in his fall he is slandering. And he makes use of the most repulsive provocative means.

"The enemy of the oppressed—he thirsts for domination, and worst of all to him are the Anarchists who have raised high the banner of freedom.

"And the enemy is spreading the vicious slander that freedom goes so far as to do violence to women. In our name they spread with their dirty hands 'The Decree Concerning the Socialization of Women.'

"What a gross, absurd provocation!

"For centuries everywhere the Anarchists have been fighting against all decrees and laws of all powers,—could they, then, issue such decrees?

"As enemies of all violence, could Anarchists demand or even admit forcible expropriation of women?

"How many asses of Buridan will be found who will believe this provocation and join the ranks of these hissing reptiles?

"No! no! Trying to incite against us the unconscious masses, the enemy did not think twice and only bared his own dirty little soul.

"Alas!—he has not yet learned the sharpness of our swords—he will find out!

"Death to the provocateurs! Merciless death! On the spot—without hesitation—by any method and by any weapon!

"And everyone who will secretly or publicly spread this slander, feigning the befuddled lamb, will be declared an accomplice of this black gang, or he will be declared a provocateur. The fate of either will be the same.

"And everyone who is with us or not with us but lives and struggles honestly will help us to mete out punishment, will himself take revenge on these poisonous reptiles who are stirring up reaction.

"For the punishment we shall have plenty of weapons!

"And all means will be justified!

(Signed) "THE SAMARA FEDERATION OF ANARCHISTS."

Through the period of my residence in Russia, the Bolsheviks appeared to be willing to take the aid of the anarchists, just as they were willing to take the aid of the Germans or anyone else, in order to tear down the existing fabric of civilization. The time came, as I have said, when the anarchists became a power, threatening the Bolshevik program, which is at the opposite pole from the program of the anarchists, the Bolshevik believing in a closely centralized State, where the individual is subordinated, and the anarchists in a loosely constructed State, where the private contract is the only binding form of law. And when that time came they used this means of undermining their opponents set forth in the above-described situation, and finally came to violence in July to put their opponents out of the way, having got out of them all they desired.

Gentlemen, it must be apparent from this that I would not be the person to suggest or uphold official recognition of the Bolshevik in any case or under any circumstances, for I understand, from seeing the operation of their methods of propaganda in Russia, that they would in all probability take advantage of the presence of their official representatives in this country to spread and incite social revolution of a violent kind in our own country, and to that I am unalterably opposed. Just what should be the policy of our Government in dealing with the Russian situation and just how we should take steps to counteract the spread of Bolshevik doctrine—whether spread from Russia or whether arising from our own local situation—is a matter in which I do not pretend to be an expert. I only know from my observation of the workings of American governmental policy in Russia that we have not achieved the success which all true Americans and all true Russians, with their deep sympathy one for another, have wished and hoped for. The mistake in our early policy, as I saw it in its reaction in Russia, was that we failed for too long to realize that the Russian revolution was a social revolution, with international significance, and not a mere political revolution with significance for Russia alone.

An even greater mistake—a mistake which I saw inaugurated and persisted in throughout my stay in Russia—was the idea that Russia by some means or other could be induced to take up actively and openly the fight against Germany. It was for the purpose of showing you, if possible, how hopeless that course was that I outlined for you so fully in the first part of my testimony the state of utter demoralization and disintegration of the entire fabric of civilized life in Russia. Russia could not fight. Her armies were rotten to the core from hunger and resentment against the treatment they had received and from the failure to make plain to them the reasons for which the allies were fighting. Their Czar had sent them to war, and they had found it a thankless task. When they got rid of their Czar they felt that they had gotten rid of the Czar's war, too, and so they quit. Even if they could have been induced to fight for principles which they could be made to understand and believe in, the material resources of the country and the channels for their distribution were hopelessly inadequate for the sustaining of life in the civilian population, let alone the vaster resources necessary to keep an army effectively at the front. It is the failure to realize and understand this situation, I believe, which led to the mistakes and the cross purposes which characterized our relationship with Russia during the spring and summer of 1918. I prefer not to go into personalities in these matters, gentlemen, for the mistakes of the past are not thus corrected. I should appreciate it, however, if you would permit me at this point to pay a tribute to the unflagging zeal with which the late Mr. Maddin Summers, our consul general in Moscow, faced a difficult and dangerous situation. It was my privilege during my four months' residence in Moscow to see Mr. Summers very often, and I found him in close touch with the shifting problems with a keen eye to their significance. He was tireless in his work and gave himself up as freely and as gladly for his country as any soldier on French battlefields. Any recognition which the gentlemen of the committee might think it fit to recommend that Congress give to the memory and services of Mr. Summers would, in my opinion, be richly merited.

I hesitate, gentlemen, to express any conclusions regarding the situation in Russia to-day, so long after my departure. At the time I left I had the feeling that the vast majority of the population were not interested in party or class programs and only looked anxiously for the time when food and other supplies would be plenty again. I am, therefore, of the opinion that an unofficial commission of some kind opening up the way for foodstuffs and clothing, etc., into the heart of Russia, dealing, if necessary, with the Bolsheviks themselves in getting the needed articles to the starving population, would do more than a million soldiers; yes, more than two million in restoring order and a normal state of mind among the Russians. I am confident that Bolshevism has thrived in Russia to the extent that hunger and disorder have prevailed, and food and clothing will more quickly than anything else restore the Russians to the point where they can summon the energy to oppose the disruptive elements in their country.

Although I realize only too keenly the sinister purpose of the Russian Bolsheviks to overthrow all the existing governments and social structures of the world, I do not greatly fear the attack of their propaganda on us. I have enough faith in the essentially firm groundwork of our democracy to resist such attempts provided we keep ourselves and our house clean, and provided we hasten our progress in righting industrial wrongs and social discrepancies. So far as I know, no American has returned from Russia empowered by the Bolsheviks or authorized by them to conduct revolutionary propaganda. Those who have returned—and I know most of them personally—with sympathy for the Bolshevik doctrine, have that sympathy in all honesty because before they went or while they were there they of their own free will made the choice.

While I do not agree with some of Col. Raymond Robins's conclusions as to the internal situation in Russia as he outlined them in the testimony he has given before your committee, I am in thorough agreement with his opposition to intervention in a military way as a solution of the Russian problem and in just as thorough agreement with his contention that the way to combat Bolshevism and Bolshevik propaganda—no matter what its source—in this country is to clean our own house of whatever injustice may have crept into its social and industrial structure. I shall not, therefore, repeat the ideas and the theories and the solutions which he has so ably outlined to you, but merely say that I subscribe to them as if they were my own. With a firm determination to make justice prevail, no matter at what cost to some of our traditional ways of doing things, we shall keep ourselves beyond the danger of harm from propaganda of any kind and develop our commonwealth richly toward the vast opportunities which lie before it in its service to its own citizens and to the world.

I thank you, gentlemen, for the privilege of bringing to you these facts and these observations which resulted from my residence in Russia during difficult times and commend them to you for the consideration which I am sure you will give to all the mass of evidence which has been brought before you. I am,

Most respectfully, yours,

OLIVER M. SAYLER,
Dramatic Editor, Indianapolis News.

WASHINGTON, March 11, 1919.

BOLSHEVIK PROPAGANDA.

MONDAY, MARCH 10, 1919.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met pursuant to the call of the chairman, at 4 o'clock p. m., in Room 226, Senate Office Building, Senator Lee S. Overman presiding.

Present: Senators Overman (chairman), King, Nelson, and Sterling.

Present also, Senator Hiram W. Johnson.

TESTIMONY OF MR. RAYMOND ROBINS—Resumed.

Senator OVERMAN. Col. Robins, you have been sworn, and I will not swear you again. I understand you want to be heard again, and we will be glad to hear you, but of course we want to confine ourselves to new matter and not to repeat any of the old.

Mr. ROBINS. I will do my best to do that, Senator.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on reaching Chicago last Saturday evening, I read, as published in the Chicago Daily Journal of Saturday, March 8, 1919, the following from the testimony of the American ambassador, David R. Francis, as reported to have been given before this committee on that day:

"I called Robins," the ambassador went on, "and asked him about his visit to the Soviet headquarters. He told me that they had told him their principles and said he approved of them."

If that is a correct report of the testimony of the ambassador, it is an entire misstatement of facts. I never once said to the ambassador that I had inquired at Smolny of their principles, or that I believed in them. On the contrary, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, at all times, in this country and in Russia during my stay there, and since my return, I have been opposed to the principles of the Bolshevik program. They are not unfamiliar to those who have been careful students of radical social agitation for the past 20 years in the world; and as such I was entirely familiar with them at the time, and did not need to go to Smolny to inquire their principles, and should not have gone in any event. It is a statement without a scintilla of foundation in fact.

Senator OVERMAN. What do you mean by the statement "if the report is true"?

Mr. ROBINS. If the newspaper report of the testimony is true; if the ambassador made this statement. I have not seen the official report of his statement and therefore I can not say. I was unable to get that this morning.

Senator KING. As I understand, you are challenging now some of the statements of the ambassador, and admitting those that were reported to have been made by him which you think are correct, and calling attention to those which you do not accede to?

Mr. ROBINS. I am not admitting any statements made by the ambassador at all, but am simply referring to those that I wish specifically to deny.

Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON. I might say to you that I tried for Col. Robins to get the testimony of the ambassador in order that he might read it, and in that fashion take it up verbatim as to the matters that would be of moment, but I was unable to obtain a copy of the testimony for him, and so he was unable to see his testimony as transcribed.

Senator KING. That is, for the purpose of meeting the reported statement of the ambassador, and it was for that purpose that you sought this opportunity to reappear before the committee?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; thank you, Senator.

This report of the testimony of the American ambassador continues:

Robins did receive a cablegram so instructing him. I told Robins I thought it was unwise for him to sever his relations abruptly, and moreover, I wanted to know what the Bolsheviks were doing. So I cabled Washington along these lines, but never received a reply, and Robins continued to go to Soviet headquarters.

In that particular matter it was the request of the ambassador that I violate the instructions sent by the department, and the ambassador said, "I myself am responsible in this matter, Col. Robins, and authorize you to continue your relations with the soviet government."

I make that as a deliberate statement of fact.

Senator OVERMAN. I think that is what the ambassador said when he was here.

Mr. ROBINS. Immediately upon verifying through other newspaper offices that other papers in Chicago would print similar, and in some instances more extensive, statements of a like character alleged to have been made by Ambassador David R. Francis in testifying before your subcommittee, I sent to the chairman of your subcommittee the following telegram:

Respectfully request right promised me by you and the members of your subcommittee to appear before your committee and present documents setting forth and relating to instructions to me for my relations with the Soviet government of Russia by Ambassador Francis which refute false statements alleged to have been made by him in regard thereto in testifying to-day before your committee and printed in a newspaper here. Am returning to Washington to-morrow and will be ready to meet the convenience of your committee on Monday or any day thereafter. I make this request not alone for my own right but also in the interest of truth and public honor. My address until to-morrow is 1437 West Ohio Street, Chicago, Ill.

RAYMOND ROBINS.

SATURDAY, March 8, 1919.

Subsequently I telephoned to your chairman, and was told by him that your subcommittee had adjourned but that he would see if it was possible to convene it again, and that he would advise me in regard thereto.

Referring to the above alleged statement of the ambassador and the following statements published in the newspapers as named, on Sunday morning, the 9th of March, 1919, I submit to your honorable committee the following documents, with my comments thereon.

(The document was filed and marked as "Robins Document No. 1.")

This is an exact copy of a document in my possession which was O.K'd and initialed by David R. Francis, as indicated on the face thereof, and contains the written notations in his handwriting, made by him in my presence in his private office in the American embassy in Petrograd, Russia, on the evening of the 2d of January, 1918. [Reading:]

ROBINS DOCUMENT No. 1.

SUGGESTED COMMUNICATION TO THE COMMISSAIRE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

At the hour the Russian people shall require assistance from the United States to repel the actions of Germany and her allies, you may be assured that I will recommend to the American Government that it render them all aid and assistance within its power. If upon the termination of the present armistice Russia fails to conclude a democratic peace through the fault of the Central Powers and is compelled to continue the war I shall urge upon my government the fullest assistance to Russia possible, including the shipment of supplies and munitions for the Russian armies, the extension of credits and the giving of such advice and technical assistance as may be welcome to the Russian people in the service of the common purpose to obtain through the defeat of the German autocracy the effective guarantee of a lasting and democratic peace.

I am not authorized to speak for my Government on the question of recognition but that is a question which will of necessity be decided by actual future events. I may add, however, that if the Russian armies now under command of the people's commissaires commence and seriously conduct hostilities against the forces of Germany and her allies, I will recommend to my Government the formal recognition of the de facto government of the people's commissaires.

Respectfully,

(Note in lead-pencil at bottom: "O. K., D. R. F. Subject to change by Dept., of which Col. Robins will be promptly informed 1/2/18.)

(In the margin: "To Col. Robins.")

Senator OVERMAN. What is the date of that?

Mr. ROBINS. The date of this is January 2, 1918, better than two months after they had taken Petrograd, or just about two months after they had taken it.

Senator OVERMAN. Who?

Mr. ROBINS. Trotsky and Lenine.

That bears this notation in pencil "O. K., D. R. F. Subject to change by Dept., of which Col. Robins will be promptly informed".

And then again in pencil on the upper margin, "To Col. Robins."

The circumstances for the preparation, O.K'ing, and initialing of this document were as follows:

For some days I had been working under the verbal instructions of the ambassador of the United States in conferences with Lenine and Trotsky and other officers of the soviet government seeking to prevent the signing of a German peace at Brest-Litovsk. To provide against the possibility of error in statement and subsequent refutation of my authorization to represent the ambassador in the manner indicated by his verbal instructions, this document was prepared by me and submitted to him as a correct statement of his verbal instructions to me, and was O. K'd by him. The next document is filed and marked as "Robins Document No. 2." This is an exact copy of an original in my possession, the notations on this document being in the handwriting of the American ambassador, written thereon in my presence in his private office in the American embassy at Petrograd, on the evening of the 2d of January. 1918. This document reads:

ROBINS DOCUMENT NO. 2.

(Note in lead-pencil in margin: "To Col. Robins: This is substance of cable I shall send to Dept. on being advised by you that peace negotiations terminated and soviet government decided to prosecute war against Germany and Austro-Hungary. D. R. F. 1/2/18.")

From sources which I regard as reliable I have received information to the effect that Bolshevik leaders fear complete failure of peace negotiations because of probable demands by Germany of impossible terms.

Desire for peace is so fundamental and widespread that it is impossible to foretell the results of the abrupt termination of these negotiations with only alternatives a disgraceful peace or continuance of war.

Bolshevik leaders will welcome information as to what assistance may be expected from our government if continuance of war is decided upon. Assurances of American support in such event may decidedly influence their decision.

Under these circumstances and notwithstanding previous cables I have considered it my duty to instruct Gen. Judson to informally communicate to the Bolshevik leaders the assurance that in case the present armistice is terminated and Russia continues the war against the Central Powers I will recommend to the American government that it render all aid and assistance possible. Have also told Robins of Red Cross to continue his relations with Bolshevik government, which are necessary for the present.

Present situation is so uncertain and liable to sudden change that immediate action upon my own responsibility is necessary otherwise the opportunity for all action may be lost.

Nothing that I shall do will in any event give formal recognition to the Bolshevik government until I have explicit instructions, but the necessity for informal intercourse in the present hour is so vital that I should be remiss if I failed to take the responsibility of action.

This is a proposed cable to be sent in the event of certain things transpiring.

Senator KING. By Mr. Francis?

Mr. ROBINS. By Mr. Francis, yes; and I was to communicate the substance of that to them in the event that it should be sent.

Senator NELSON. What date was that?

Mr. ROBINS. The same date.

Senator KING. January 2, 1918?

Mr. ROBINS. January 2, 1918.

Senator NELSON. All that occurred before the treaty of Brest-Litovsk?

Mr. ROBINS. Undoubtedly, sir.

The notation in the handwriting of Ambassador David R. Francis made under the circumstances indicated is "To Col. Robins: This is substance of cable I shall send to Dept. on being advised by you that peace negotiations terminated and soviet government decided to prosecute war against Germany and Austro-Hungary. D. R. F. 1/2/18."

This document was prepared by me and submitted to the ambassador and O. K'd by him, for the same reasons and purposes stated in the circumstances of Robins Document No. 1.

The next document to be filed is marked "Robins Document No. 3." This is a photographic copy of an original in my possession, which was written by Nicolai Lenine in his office at Smolny Institute, in Petrograd, Russia, on the evening of the 26th of February, 1918, immediately subsequent to the cancelation by said Lenine of the prohibition previously enforced against the departure of the train of the American Embassy for Vologda, Russia, from Petrograd. The document is in Russian, directed to the Soviet of Vologda, asking for protection and all courtesy to be extended to the American ambassador and members of the American embassy, and is signed "Nicolai Lenine," with the stamp of the people's commissars upon it.

The circumstances of this prohibitory order and its cancellation were testified to by me in my previous hearing before this committee.

The American ambassador, David R. Francis, asked me to secure from Nicolai Lenine, minister-president of the soviet republic, such a letter for his safe conduct to and protection in Vologda; that is, without the use of the ambassador's name.

The next document I wish to be filed and marked as "Robins Document No. 4." This is a photographic copy of an original in my possession which was prepared in the temporary American embassy at Vologda, Russia, on the 9th of March, 1918, and was given to me by the American ambassador to be used at my discretion as evidence to Nicolai Lenine, minister-president of the soviet government of Russia, and the officials of the Fourth All-Russian Soviet, which was scheduled to meet at Moscow on the 14th of March, 1918, to aid in preventing the ratification of the Brest-Litovsk treaty, being evidence of the willingness of the ambassador of the United States, David R. Francis, to urge against intervention in Siberia. [Reading:]

ROBINS DOCUMENT No. 4.

[Special cipher message.]

MARCH 9, 1918.

SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington:

Col. Robins arrived at midnight. He returned from Petrograd after an important conference with Trotsky on the 5th.

Senator OVERMAN. As I understand, what you say about urging against intervention in Siberia is your comment.

Mr. ROBINS. That was my comment. Returning to this "Robins Document No. 4", it says:

Col. Robins arrived at midnight. He returned from Petrograd after an important conference with Trotsky on the 5th.

Senator KING. What is this communication?

Mr. ROBINS. It is a cablegram sent to the Department of State, according to the statement of the ambassador, but given to me to show to the soviet afterwards as indicating his attitude on the questions involved.

Senator KING. Based on the statement that you had made to the ambassador, I suppose?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; and his own knowledge. This document continues:

The result of that conference he wired to me in the code of the military mission but as the mission had left for Petrograd of which fact you were advised, with the code, I did not learn of the conference until the arrival of Robins an hour ago. Since R. left Petrograd, Moscow and Petrograd soviets have both instructed their delegates to the conference of March 12th to support the ratification of the peace terms. I fear that such action is the result of a threatened Japanese invasion of Siberia which I have anticipated by sending Wright eastward. Trotsky told Robins that he had heard that such invasion was countenanced by the allies and especially by America and it would not only force the government to advocate the ratification of the humiliating peace but would so completely estrange all factions in Russia that further resistance to Germany would be absolutely impossible. Trotsky furthermore asserted that neither his government nor the Russian people would object to the supervision by America of all shipments from Vladivostock into Russia and a virtual control of the operations of the Siberian Railway but a Japanese invasion would result in non-resistance and eventually make Russia a German province. In my judgment a Japanese advance now would be exceedingly unwise and this midnight cable is sent for the purpose of asking that our influence may be exerted to prevent same. Please reply immediately. More tomorrow.

FRANCIS.

Senator STERLING. This was from Francis to the State Department?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; that is the complete cable.

The next document I wish to file is "Robins Document No. 5." This is a photographic copy of an original in my possession which was given to me at the same time and place and for the same use and purpose as Document No. 4. [Reading:]

ROBINS DOCUMENT No. 5.

[Paraphrase of special cipher.]

MARCH 9, 1918.

SECSTATE, Washington:

I have seen the Bolshevik and anti-Bolshevik press since sending my cable of 12 o'clock last night. Both lay great stress upon the threatened Japanese invasion and all harmoniously express violent opposition to the same. I am just in receipt of a confidential message from the Ruggles and he reports that in accordance with his instructions he has interviewed Trotsky besides the Chief of Staff and the French Military Mission; he states that as yet it is too early to judge what the bolshevik leaders can do but thinks their intention is to fight the Germans even if peace is ratified by the Moscow All Russian Soviet Congress; he personally urges avoidance of reprisals and occupations and states that there is time therefor if the situation becomes hopeless later on; that he will accompany the Russian, French, Italian staffs to Moscow March 11th.

I cannot too strongly urge the folly of an invasion by the Japanese now. It is possible that the Congress at Moscow may ratify the peace but if I receive assurances from you that the Japanese peril is baseless I am of the opinion that the Congress will reject this humiliating peace. The Soviet Government is the only power which is able to offer resistance to the German advance and consequently should be assisted if it is sincerely antagonistic to Germany. In any case the peace ratification only gives Russia a breathing spell as the terms thereof are fatal to bolshevikism as well as to the integrity of Russia.

Senator STERLING. From whom and to whom is the last?

Mr. ROBINS. From the ambassador of the United States, to the Department of State at Washington, sent from Vologda, according to his statement, he having given it to me as an evidence of his action that I could present to the soviet leaders at Moscow.

Senator STERLING. Do you know that such a cablegram was actually sent.

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; I have not that knowledge. The files of the department will, of course, inform the Senator.

Senator KING. The deduction is inevitable, from that, that Francis was doing all that he could to prevent the ratification of the Brest-Litovsk treaty.

Mr. ROBINS. And to prevent intervention—Japanese intervention. Both were working together in the situation.

Senator KING. Yes; he felt that Japanese intervention might lead to a ratification of the Brest-Litovsk treaty, whereas the failure of the Japanese to intervene might possibly influence the soviets of Moscow and Petrograd to oppose the Brest-Litovsk treaty.

Mr. ROBINS. Quite so; that was part of the situation.

Senator KING. So that apparently he was doing all that he could to prevent the ratification of the Brest-Litovsk treaty.

Mr. ROBINS. As we both were at all times.

Senator KING. Because you and he both felt that that would be hurtful to the allies?

Mr. ROBINS. Absolutely. We did everything that we could to that end at all times.

Senator KING. That it would free the German armies on that front and permit their return to France to aid in the assault upon the French and upon the English and upon our own troops there.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; and for the additional reason that it would release raw materials in Russia that would go to the central powers.

Senator STERLING. Did you not fear at that time that there would be a ratification of the Brest-Litovsk treaty?

Mr. ROBINS. Without the cooperation of the allies it seemed inevitable. With the cooperation of the soviet power with the allies it seemed that it might not have been.

Senator KING. Assuming, of course, that Lenine and Trotsky and those with whom they were associated were sincere opponents of Germany?

Mr. ROBINS. Not necessarily sincere opponents of Germany, but sincere international revolutionists against all governments.

Senator KING. Assuming that they were not internationalists bent upon the destruction of all governments?

Mr. ROBINS. No. Assuming that they were sincere internationalists, then they would be opposed not only to that Government but to all governments, and we could use this fact at that point in opposition to the German power. That judgment has been testified to by me. If the Senator had been at the other hearings at which I testified, he would be familiar with that.

Senator KING. I am familiar with your testimony.

Mr. ROBINS. Then you will know, sir, that that opinion was joined in by the British High Commission, by Mr. Harold Williams, by the representative of the National City Bank in America, and by other persons, as was testified before this committee.

Senator STERLING. Do you believe that being internationalists and opposed to all governments they would give cooperation, sincere cooperation, with the allied powers?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, Senator, I believe that people can always be relied upon to do what is to their interest, even though it be at times contrary to their formulas. I have seen that enough in life not to be concerned with indoor formulas so much as with outdoor facts.

Senator KING. Your idea was that if they could receive recognition from our Government and from the allied Governments, that would give them greater power in Russia, and they could carry on their propaganda later in this country or otherwise for the destruction of all governments?

Mr. ROBINS. Precisely.

Senator KING. And all forms of organized society?

Mr. ROBINS. Not necessarily that. That would be at the time possibly in their minds, but they would be led to deal with the facts of life. To feed, clothe, and house 180,000,000 people is a job that you can not do on formulas. In order to do that they would have to modify their formulas in some instances.

I present a document filed and marked "Robins Document No. 6." This is a photographic copy of an original in my possession and was prepared in the temporary American embassy at Vologda, Russia, on the date indicated in the document, and given to me by the American Ambassador, David R. Francis, to be used in the service of the United States as his unofficial representative in Moscow or elsewhere in Russia. [Reading:]

ROBINS DOCUMENT No. 6.

(Stamp of the Embassy of the United States of America.)

VOLOGDA, RUSSIA, March 10, 1918.

CERTIFICATE.

The holder of this document, is Colonel Raymond Robins, an American Citizen, and Chief of the American Red Cross Mission to Russia. I commend him to the courtesies of all to whom this Certificate may be presented. Colonel Robins is travelling in the Special Car No. 447 and is accompanied by eight or ten men engaged in Red Cross Work. Colonel Robins will name these men if required to do so. I specially request that he be permitted to enter Moscow and any other city in Russia he may desire to visit.

[SEAL OF THE EMBASSY.]

DAVID R. FRANCIS,
American Ambassador.

I present also a document filed and marked as "Robins Document No. 7." This is a photographic copy of an original direct wire telegram in my possession, ordered sent by the ambassador of the United States, David R. Francis, through his private secretary as indicated, from Vologda, and received by me at Moscow on the morning of the 22d of April, 1918. [Reading:]

ROBINS DOCUMENT No. 7.

Johnston on the wire to Colonel Robins from the Ambassador: Do not feel I should be justified in asking you to remain longer in Moscow to the neglect of the prosecution of your Red Cross work but this does not imply any want of appreciation of the service you have rendered me in keeping me advised concerning matters important for me to know and giving suggestions and advice as well as being a channel of unofficial communication with the soviet government. When will Webster and Hicks return? Will they stop at Vologda or go direct Moscow from Omsk? Following message received from Thompson American Consul Omsk yesterday "Please inform Webster and Hicks on their arrival that Turens figures exceed theirs eight times. Tell Webster copy telegram not found at Jordans. Will mail staffs letters Monday Moscow?" Also following from Halsey Murmansk "Forward to Robins and Wardwell latest indications Chat Doras Red Cross cargo coming here early May. Advise you urge London to send it directly to Archangel as it must eventually go there Murman railway now."

Senator STERLING. Will you not read the first line again, Colonel? (The telegram in part was reread by the witness.)

Senator STERLING. How long had you been at Moscow at the time of the receipt of that wire?

Mr. ROBINS. Some six weeks. The first paragraph of this message indicates the specific character of my unofficial relationship as special representative of the ambassador with the soviet government of Russia as late as the 22d of April, 1918.

I present a document filed and marked as "Robins Document No. 8." This is a photographic copy of an original telegram in my possession, sent by the American ambassador from Vologda and received by me on the evening of the 23d of April, 1918. [Reading:]

ROBINS DOCUMENT NO. 8.

Twenty-third. Please inform Chicherin his telegram my first knowledge that China prohibited any exportation to Russia and have instituted inquiries to ascertain facts. Why does he think such is result of allied agreement and if so why does he think same based on misunderstanding?

FRANCIS.

Senator STERLING. May I see that?

(The telegram last read was handed to Senator Sterling.)

Mr. ROBINS. This telegram evidences the continuation of my relationship as special representative between the American ambassador and the soviet government of Russia.

I present a telegram filed and marked as "Robins Document No. 9." This is a photographic copy of an original telegram in my possession, sent by the American ambassador from Vologda and received by me at Moscow in the evening of the 29th of April, 1918. This document consists of three photographic prints of the three pages of the original telegram, and reads as follows:

ROBINS DOCUMENT NO. 9.

Twenty-ninth from Chicherin in Russia enclosed in your letter April twenty-seventh concerning the Chinese embargo about which I received urgent telegram in Russian April twenty-second from Chicherin addressed American Ambassador Vologda. Immediately cabled Department also Peking and Harbin mainly for information. Received prompt reply from Moser Harbin—expressing regret could not request annulment of prohibition to which I as promptly replied had made no such request but only inquiry as to facts which again demanded reply through legation Peking. Nothing further from Harbin and nothing from Peking. Just received however cable from Department giving detailed history of embargo which clearly shows government never consented thereto. Quite contrary stated specifically to Chicherin such prohibition inadvisable. February nineteenth American legation Peking advised Department that food stuffs permitted go to Irkutsk and points east under consular control—latter to prevent such shipments reaching enemy, war prisoners at that time not being factor in situation. This agreement influenced by my conferring with Chinese minister Petrograd and latters cooperation. Obtaining this information within seven days is quick work and demonstrates disposition of Department and Embassy toward embargo on food stuffs to relieve distress.

Moser is the American consul at Harbin—

Cannot account for renewed operation of embargo but expecting further information as Department cable says repeated to American Legation Peking my cable on subject and its—reply thereto. Might discreetly inform Chicherin of facts above mentioned but take care that no friction produced between China and America or Japan and America. If you fear imparting such information likely result in further complication better withhold for present and only state that I am energetically investigating embargo.

And will the Senators kindly note the language—

FRANCIS.

This document further evidences the nature of my confidential relationship as the unofficial representative of the American ambassador in dealing with the soviet government of Russia. The character of this communication and the instructions in its concluding paragraph indicate the willingness of the American ambassador at that time to trust in my discretion in dealing with the soviet government of Russia for the benefit of the American and allied Governments, and his willingness to trust in my discretion in the use of this important information to that end. This is now at a date nearly six months after the inauguration of the soviet régime in Russia and after more than four months of my continuous service as special representative of the American ambassador with the soviet government, something better than two months after the ratification of the Brest-Litovsk peace.

Senator OVERMAN. I understood Mr. Francis to say that you were transacting business for him with his permission, and were of service to him.

Mr. ROBINS. Most of his testimony indicates friction between Mr. Robins and the ambassador, and other things indicate a lack of confidence.

Senator KING. I got just the other impression from his testimony, Col. Robins, that you were acting for him unofficially, and he recommended that you continue so to act so that he would have a conduit—I think he used that word—to receive information from the Bolshevik government.

Mr. ROBINS. Of course I have not seen the testimony, and have to rely on the quotations from it.

Senator KING. That was the impression I obtained.

Mr. ROBINS. I am very glad if that was the result of the testimony.

Senator OVERMAN. There is no doubt about that, that he admitted that he was using Col. Robins as a conduit, and that Col. Robins was of great value to him, and that you were friendly and that there was no criticism.

Senator KING. Yes, he stated that he went to Vologda and met you there at the platform, and that the relations between you and him were pleasant. It was suggested that there were differences of opinion as to the schemes and purposes of the Bolsheviks; that you were attributing to them—this is not his language, but this is the idea which I derived from his statement—a sincerity—I use that term in the absence of a better one—in their motives that he did not think they possessed, but that you gave him valuable information, which he utilized for his purposes.

I have in mind a statement that was made early in December, 1917, by the Bolshevik government, which led me at that time—and has influenced my judgment somewhat as to their purpose—to conclude that they have conceived a propaganda to be prosecuted for the destruction of all organized governments, and this is a part of the language in the proclamation which was issued. I want to ask if that came to your attention while you were in Russia, Colonel, while they were insisting upon the right to send representatives to other governments? It is said:

It is necessary for us to maintain diplomatic relations, not only with foreign governments through couriers, but also with the socialistic and revolutionary parties which are endeavoring to overthrow the existing governments. The soviet considers the existing situation intolerable. The people's commissioner for foreign affairs has been ordered to refuse visés and general facilities to those embassies which refuse to visé the passports of the couriers and create other small chancery difficulties.

Do you recall that proclamation?

Mr. ROBINS. Very well.

Senator KING. What I want to call your attention to is that as early as the 22d of December, 1917, the Bolshevik government then stated that it was necessary "For us to maintain diplomatic relations, not only with foreign governments through couriers, but also with the socialistic and revolutionary parties which are endeavoring to overthrow the existing governments." Do you not regard that, Col. Robins—probably I ought not to ask for your opinion, and you need not give it if you do not care to, and it is perhaps not germane to this inquiry—as a challenge by them then to all existing governments and expression of a purpose upon their part to get into communication with revolutionary organizations everywhere for the purpose of destroying all existing governments?

Mr. ROBINS. Thoroughly so, and from the beginning I was in full understanding of that purpose, as stated here in my original testimony. If a man is going to shoot at me with an ordinary gun, and I am 5 miles away, I am not greatly worried, perhaps. But if I happen to have an enemy I want killed who is 200 yards away in line, I may even say, "Shoot, brother, shoot!" I felt that if there was revolutionary propaganda, being universal in its nature, that would fall into the hands of Germany and Austria and turn back upon them that poison gas which they had been fighting us with in Russia, it would be the best service that could be rendered to break the morale of the central powers at that time, and therefore it seemed to be desirable to the Committee on Public Information, and a number of thousands of rubles were paid into my hands by Edgar Sisson of the Committee on Public Information to forward that particular enterprise, in full knowledge of exactly what they were proposing, but believing that as we were in a world war, it would be a good thing as an attack on Germany, which was a danger very near, while others were most remote.

Senator KING. That is to say, you understood they were going to light the fires of revolution everywhere?

Mr. ROBINS. Wherever they could.

Senator KING. And after it had burned out in Europe we might extinguish it in our own country?

Mr. ROBINS. After it had burned in Germany, and it had been sufficient to fight the central powers, it would not go further.

Senator KING. But you knew it was the purpose to destroy our Government as soon as they could.

Mr. ROBINS. Everybody there knew it. Their propositions of economic cooperation and other things always contained the final words, "We are doing this without in anywise losing our character as a socialist revolutionary government."

Senator KING. And you understood that their purpose was then as it is now, the destruction of all organized governments?

Mr. ROBINS. The destruction of present organized governments. They have a different, particular organization and program, which I think is impossible and wrong.

Senator KING. I recall your testimony in that respect.

Mr. ROBINS. I present a document filed and marked as "Robins Document No. 10." This is a photographic copy of an original letter in my possession written in the temporary American embassy at Vologda on the date indicated, and transmitted by special messenger and received by me in the office of the American Red Cross mission to Russia at the Hotel Elite, in Moscow, on the 6th day of May, 1918. The document consists of two photographic prints of the two pages of the original letter. [Reading:]

• ROBINS DOCUMENT NO. 10.

Vologda, May 3, 1918.

Colonel RAYMOND ROBINS,

Commanding American Red Cross Mission to Russia, Moscow, Russia.

MY DEAR COLONEL:—

Note the date, May 3d—

Your telegram of May second received this morning but it says nothing about the unprecedented order of the Soviet Government prohibiting the reception and transmission of cipher telegrams from any source other than the Government. I thought until the receipt of your telegram that you were en route to Vologda; suppose you have learned of this order today—did you know of it before it was issued?

I may say that a telegram of mine crossed this letter advising him that it was an error made on the part of the commissar of telegraphs, and it was revoked at once. [Continuing reading:]

It my judgment this means the withdrawal of privileges heretofore enjoyed by all diplomatic representatives and it may possibly be the beginning of the withdrawal of all diplomatic immunities; in that event all Embassies and Legations will be subject to indignities and pilfering and regardless of personal comfort or safety of their members, would through consideration of the dignity of the Government they represent be compelled to withdraw from Russia.

Do you think the Soviet Government would opposed allied intervention if they knew it was inevitable? I can understand the difficulty of the position of Lenin and Trotsky and their colleagues and know they are compelled to profess when organizing an army or preparing any kind of resistance, that such is the promotion of world-wide social revolution; at the same time you I know have always felt that it was necessary to encourage such professions in order to organize any resistance whatever to the Central Empires and were confident that such an organization would never be used against existing governments including our own but it is difficult to induce our government to accept that view. You are acquainted with my efforts to bring railroad men to the assistance of the Soviet Government—and you are also aware of my action in bringing about the aid of the military missions toward organizing an army—

Lenine and Trotsky—

The army of the soviet.

and you are likewise familiar with the result of such efforts—

They failed because the home government refused to indorse the program. [Continuing reading:]

But Webster has just come in to tell me good-bye and I have not the time to write at greater length.

If this prohibition of cipher telegrams is applicable to neutrals as well as Allies, I shall as Dean of the Diplomatic Corps recommend that united protest be made and it will doubtless be made through the Consuls of all the Missions that have Consuls in Moscow or Petrograd. My opinion is that the Soviet Government has made a great mistake in issuing this decree or order.

There are many things which I would like to talk to you about and cannot write even if I had the time. You are correct in thinking that I was not at all disturbed by the newspaper surmise that I was to be succeeded by yourself, not that I think such suggestion absurd but I did not for a moment feel that you were a party to any such move.

Senators, it has been testified here by certain persons that I was seeking the office of American ambassador in Russia. No man who knows politics—and whatever else I may be, I am not supposed to be entirely ignorant or entirely a fool—would have entertained the idea for a moment.

Senator KING. Was that suggested by anybody except Louise Bryant?

Mr. ROBINS. This paper stated that Dr. Simons testified that it created confusion because I was persistently trying to be made ambassador and opposing American officials. and the ambassador stated specifically that if there were any statements to be made referring to himself or the Government, they would be issued by him, indicating that I was doing some such a thing.

May it under oath be recorded that I never made a single public statement regarding my official position or unofficial service in any paper during my work in Russia. May it be recorded that I never at any time publicly in any wise pretended to represent the Government of the United States, but did only, in the matter intrusted to me, act quietly, and at most times secretly, to the end that we might handle the difficult situation that was there. I conceived the ambassador and myself as working, gentlemen of the committee, in entire harmony, with certain differences of judgment as to the actual facts and conditions that are reasonable and expected in honest and sincere men everywhere. [Reading:]

It is possible that I may write again tomorrow after learning more about this prohibition of cipher telegram.

The food has arrived from Petrograd but has not yet been unloaded I am told.

Must close now in haste.

Yours sincerely,

DAVID R. FRANCIS,

(By direction,)

E. W. JOHNSTON, Secy.

This document further evidences the character of my instructions and services as the special representative of the American ambassador, David R. Francis, in relation to the soviet government of Russia as late as the date aforesaid, which was about six months after the inauguration of the soviet government régime in Russia.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, you will note that in this letter the American ambassador writes of my acquaintance with his efforts to bring railroad men to the assistance of the soviet government as well as his action in bringing about the aid of the military missions toward organizing an army for that government and of the failure of his efforts due to the noncompliance with his recommendations by the Government of the United States at Washington.

Senator KING. Anterior to that period, as you know, of course, our Government had attempted to send material, and had attempted to send railroad men, and so forth.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, sir, but had restrained them from coming in.

Senator KING. They had gone up into Siberia.

Mr. ROBINS. But had restrained them from coming in.

Senator KING. They were in Siberia.

Mr. ROBINS. No, at that time in Harbin, I think.

Senator KING. And the uncertain situation there in Russia deterred the Government from ordering them in.

Mr. ROBINS. I present another document, filed and marked as "Robins Document No. 11." This is a photographic copy of an original in my possession written on the date incited thereon and handed to me by the American Ambassador David R. Francis personally. [Reading:]

ROBINS DOCUMENT No. 11.

VOLOGDA, May 15, 1918.

The Honorable PAUL S. REINSCH,

American E. E. & M. P., Peking.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: This letter will be presented by Lieut. Col. Raymond Robins, who has been in charge of the American Red Cross Mission to Russia for some months past and who is now en route America to inform his organization and the Government about conditions in Russia with which Colonel R. is very familiar.

Suggesting that maybe I did a little bit more than distributing some milk. [Reading:]

The Colonel has been in close touch with the Soviet Government since its organization in October last and has kindly kept me informed concerning its acts and policies so far as he was able to do so.

Senator NELSON. Let me see, right there. That quotation coincides with what Mr. Francis testified to before the committee.

Mr. ROBINS. If so, Senator, I am glad.

Senator NELSON. I can not see any issue between you and him on that point.

Mr. ROBINS. Well, I do not want to make any. [Continuing reading:]

While the Colonel and I have not agreed on the subject of recognition we are of accord and have been from the beginning in thinking it important if not necessary that the Soviet Government should show resistance to Germany, and have worked together to that end.

And I submit, gentlemen of the committee, they could not show a resistance to Germany unless there was some sincerity in that situation. If they were believed to be German agents, you could not expect them to take any amount of action showing resistance to Germany.

Senator KING. Pardon me, is not that rather a deduction that might or might not be warranted? It would depend upon the facts. If a majority of the Russian people wanted the Russians to continue the military operations, and the minority—assuming that Lenine and Trotsky represented the minority—were opposed, then they might be compelled to yield to the majority. Though in their hearts they were opposed and might have been German agents, they might have to bow to the majority.

Mr. ROBINS. That would be tenable if it had not been so constantly said that Lenine and Trotsky were in absolute command of the situation, again and again, by witness after witness. [Reading:]

I commend the colonel to your favorable acquaintance and bespeak for him your courtesies and assistance. Believe me, my dear colleague,

Yours sincerely,

DAVID R. FRANCIS.

The American ambassador and members of his staff from the temporary American Embassy at Vologda met the special car of the American Red Cross mission in Russia, at the railway station in Vologda, on the said date, when I and certain members of the American Red Cross mission in Russia were at Vologda en route to Vladivostock in obedience to cable instructions to report upon the Russian situation to the American Government and the American Red Cross in Washington. On this same occasion the American ambassador spoke in the most generous terms to me of my services to him and to the American Government, in the presence of other members of the American Red Cross mission. The American ambassador on this occasion also delivered into my hands, for safe-keeping and transmission to the Department of State of the United States at Washington, a special sealed pouch.

The character of this letter of introduction to the American ambassador at Peking, China, indicates my relationship between David R. Francis, American ambassador, and the soviet government, and indicates confidence and trust in me. The ambassador gave me at that time and place several other letters of a similar character, to be presented to American consuls en route through Siberia, and to the American ambassador of the United States to Japan, which letter was delivered by me to said Ambassador Morris in Tokyo, with whom I dined at the embassy and to whom I gave a confidential report upon the Russian situation as I understood it.

Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, in view of the extraordinary circumstances surrounding the whole matter of my relationship and the character of my services in Russia, both as commander of the American Red Cross mission and as unofficial representative of the American ambassador with the soviet government, I wish to submit and to have filed in the record of the investigation by this committee, the following additional documents:

I present another document, filed and marked as "Robins Document No. 12." This is a photographic copy of an original cable message in my possession, sent by the director general of the American Red Cross, the Hon. Henry P. Davison, from Washington, D. C., on the date indicated thereon. [Reading:]

ROBINS DOCUMENT No. 12.

Impossible convey my admiration appreciation and congratulations upon your signal service to your country to Red Cross and to me. Some day history will record service being rendered by you. Affectionate Xmas greetings to yourself and staff.

DAVISON.

I present another document, filed and marked as "Robins Document No. 13." This is a photographic copy of an original in my possession. This cable message was sent from Paris, France, and was received by me April 18, 1918, at Moscow, after I had been for four and a half months commander of the American Red Cross in Russia. [Reading:]

ROBINS DOCUMENT No. 13.

CONSUL AMERICAN,
Moscow Russia:

Sixteenth for Robins. "Be assured your services to Red Cross of extraordinary value and highly appreciated inside and outside Red Cross organization. Distressed you should have misconstrued cable regarding assistance.

You will be advised by cable later relative this point. Assume you will not contemplate leaving Russia except for personal safety without advising me in plenty of time. Seems to all here that it would be misfortune to have Red Cross withdrawn from Russia and certainly as you have made such signal success. Give no further consideration question assistant until further advised Perkins."

SHARP.

The occasion for this communication was a previous cable message from Paris, suggesting the intention of sending certain assistants for the work of the American Red Cross mission in Russia under my command. As there was no statement of the reasons for sending such assistants, and as there was no need for any additional help in the work of the American Red Cross mission at that time in Russia, I replied to the previous cable to the effect that I did not need assistance for our work in Russia, and that if my administration of the American Red Cross mission in Russia was not satisfactory to the administration of the American Red Cross in Washington, or to the American Government, I should be recalled. To this answering cable of mine, I received the cable message above set forth, marked "Robins Document No. 13."

Senator STERLING. Colonel, how does that meet or refute anything that has been said by Ambassador Francis in his testimony?

Mr. ROBINS. It meets this, Senator. In the newspaper report of the testimony it is said that the ambassador spoke of my recall, and the nature of his words was an inference that I was recalled because I was not useful or was not desirable; or as it was reported, not indispensable, was the way it seemed to me and to others. For instance, I received a telegram, which I will submit in the record, from the Chicago Tribune, saying:

Will you please make a statement for the Tribune answering Ambassador Francis's charges in testimony?

The Chicago Tribune met me at the train and asked me for a statement when I came here.

Senator STERLING. I did not get that impression from Ambassador Francis's testimony.

Mr. ROBINS. But that is the impression it gives in the newspapers, and I have the right to disabuse the public of that.

Senator NELSON. Francis did not testify that you were recalled at his request. He simply made the statement that you were recalled.

Senator OVERMAN. He said the relations between him and Col. Robins were most pleasant; that he had met you at the depot, and that some conversation took place; and said that he had authorized you to go to the Bolshevik government and discuss matters with them. I see no conflict between you.

Mr. ROBINS. Would you not see the conflict between——

Senator OVERMAN. I am not talking about the press report.

Mr. ROBINS. No; but did not the ambassador say that I had gone to Smolny to inquire as to the principles of the Bolsheviki, and had come back and said that I agreed with them?

Senator KING. I think he said substantially that.

Mr. ROBINS. That is not true at all.

Senator STERLING. It was stated, Col. Robins, that you went to the ambassador and asked him if he was not going to recognize the soviet government of Russia, and he said to you that you knew that he was not, or that in substance.

Mr. ROBINS. I state under oath that the facts in that relation are that the ambassador called me into his office and asked me to serve him in his special affairs in relation to the soviet government.

Senator STERLING. I think he so testified.

Mr. ROBINS. I present another document, marked and filed as "Robins Document No. 14." This is a photographic copy of an original in my possession, same being a cable message from the Department of State of the United States of America and the American Red Cross at Washington, D. C., and was received by me in Moscow on May 9, 1918. [Reading:]

ROBINS DOCUMENT No. 14.

AMERICAN CONSUL GENERAL,

Moscow.

128 Ninth Washington for Robins Moscow twenty two seventh 15158 10095.
"Under all circumstances consider desirable that you come home for consultation we are very reluctant however to withdraw entire Red Cross Commission anticipating that there will be many opportunities to help distribution food and other Red Cross relief measures next two months must leave decision in your hands for you alone can judge possibilities of personal welfare members commission also likelihood continuing service but all here feel that Red Cross will find much valuable relief work to do and hope you before leaving will find possible arrange for sufficient personnel to remain and if you desire we will endeavor send other Red Cross representatives to help in maintaining Red Cross efforts position in Russia founded on fine basis established cable promptly care Davison."

LANSING.

The character of this cablegram indicates that at that date, after nearly six months of my administration as commander of the American Red Cross mission in Russia and as unofficial representative of the American ambassador, David R. Francis, with the soviet government, the American Government and the American Red Cross, at Washington relied upon my information and judgment in relation to retention of the mission in Russia, the service it should undertake, and the matter of additional help to carry out its work. It also evidences an appreciation of the merit of the work previously accomplished by the American Red Cross mission in Russia.

Senator KING. The word "recall" as used by Mr. Francis did not imply, as I understood it, any rebuke.

Mr. ROBINS. I am very glad; because as it was reported, it did.

Senator OVERMAN. He said here that you were recalled.

Senator NELSON. That simply indicated that you were recalled, as I understood, by the Red Cross.

Senator OVERMAN. This is what was said [reading]:

Mr. FRANCIS. Col. Thompson succeeded Col. Billings as the head of the American Red Cross Mission to Russia, and he spent a million and a quarter dollars of his own money—

Senator NELSON. Thompson did?

Mr. FRANCIS. Which was distributed through Robins to sustain Kerensky in his fight with the Bolsheviki. Consequently he was very much frightened when the Bolsheviki revolution took place, and he left Petrograd within ten days or two weeks of that time. He left Robins in charge. Robins went to the Bolsheviki and said he had been fighting them and he wanted to know what their principles were.

They told him their principles, and he was ever afterward persona grata at Smolny, and followed them to Moscow, and tried to get me to go to Moscow, and I refused because I did not want to be any closer to the Bolsheviki government than I was.

Senator NELSON. Can you tell us anything further about his operations in that connection?

Mr. FRANCIS. About whose operations?

Senator NELSON. Col. Robins's.

Mr. FRANCIS. Col. Robins I had heard was being quoted down there as the mouthpiece of America. My relations with him were pleasant. I had, as I told you this morning, told him that he could continue to visit the soviet officials, because I wanted to learn what they were doing. He was recalled on the 5th of May, and on the 15th of May he went through Vologda, going to Vladivostok. I went to the station to meet him. We had a private conversation of about twenty minutes—the train was there 50 minutes—and I turned away from him, or he turned away from me; I have forgotten which—not in any unfriendly spirit * * *.

Senator KING. The word "recalled" there, the way he spoke it, did not imply any rebuke.

Senator OVERMAN. He just stated the facts.

Senator NELSON. He did not imply that he had asked for your recall.

Mr. ROBINS. As it was reported it did imply that.

Senator NELSON. I gathered the idea that you were recalled by the Red Cross authorities, and that letter indicates that.

Senator STERLING. There was not a word of Ambassador Francis's testimony which could be construed as a reflection on the Red Cross.

Mr. ROBINS. Or on my work as unofficial representative, or on me in relation to the subject?

Senator STERLING. I would not say about that; but as to your Red Cross work, not one word of criticism.

Mr. ROBINS. May I say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that I wish to enter my own statement of what I think to be the fact, having been in constant relation with Col. William B. Thompson, that there was no man in Russia during that entire critical period who was less frightened at anything than William B. Thompson, and no man who left in less haste. He left largely at my earnest request that he should go out by way of England, and that he should make an effort to get a correct understanding of the thing in England. At that time Sir George Buchanan, the British ambassador, and Gen. Knox, the chief of the military mission, were absolutely unwilling to do anything like cooperating as did the ambassador of the United States, to try to meet the needs of the situation; and Col. Thompson did go out and he saw Lloyd George, and the result was that the British high commissioner recalled the British ambassador, Buchanan, and the chief of the British military mission, Gen. Knox.

May I say this, and then I am through, and ready to answer any question, if I can—may I suggest this? I have always taken the position that the report of the committee would be of significance in the radical situation in this country, and that it is one of the most important issues before the country now. I did not suppose that the committee would rest so soon. May I make this recommendation, which may be considered by the committee for what it is worth, that Gen. William V. Judson, chief of the American military mission in Russia, a gentleman there at that time, be called before this committee and required to testify; that Maj. Thomas D. Thacher, secretary of the American Red Cross, who had special knowledge of the situation at Murmansk, and who was there during the entire life of the mission in Russia, until some time in March, be called; that Maj. Allen Wardwell, who remained in Russia until the 5th of October, 1918, and left Petrograd on the 16th day of October, 1918, be called; that Prof. H. G. Emery, of the Guaranty Trust Co., who was also there for a long time, be called; that R. R. Stevens, chief director of the National City branch banks in Russia, be called; that Mr. Jerome Davis, Y. M. C. A. secretary, and ablest man of their number, and who reached farthest in out-of-door contact, in my judgment, of any of the Y. M. C. A. secretaries, be called before the committee; to the end that when the committee does make its report it can not be questioned anywhere; to the end that there shall have been before this committee all of the real information obtainable. None of these gentlemen are Bolshevik, every one is anti-Bolshevik, and some of them will differ in their judgments from me; but I know that they are all honest and able men, and all of them had serious tasks to perform in the Russian situation, most of them for periods as long as mine and some of them longer, on different kinds of missions, scientific on the one hand and business or relief and political on the other.

To meet the challenge of the Bolshevik program, which is the most definite and fundamental in modern times, is, in my judgment, of the very highest moment.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, for the courtesy and privilege of this statement.

Senator KING. Col. Robins, just a question or two. I think the committee has gone rather far afield in this investigation. Really, the technical duty rested upon the committee, in investigating this Bolshevik situation, of inquiring only into the activities of the Bolshevik organization. Whether it was good or bad was immaterial in this country, and generally its methods of propaganda, and my judgment is that we have gone rather far afield in the investigation. Our duty really was to ascertain whether the Bolshevik organization was conducting a propaganda in this country, and incidentally in other countries, for the purpose of spreading the doctrine and principles of that organization. Therefore what its principles are or were was not really material, as submitted by the resolution. And therefore, speaking for myself, I do not think the committee should pursue the matter any further, because there is evidence, it is obvious in the testimony, including your own, that they are carrying on a propaganda in this country as well as in other countries.

Mr. ROBINS. Senator, if the findings of the committee do not find in relation to the actual facts in Russia and do not make a recommendation in relation to Russia, I believe that would be an exact distinction.

Senator KING. So far as I am concerned—I have not talked with my colleagues——

Senator NELSON. We have no jurisdiction.

Senator KING (continuing). I should be opposed to finding anything about conditions in Russia, or what the principles of the Bolshevik government were and what they would lead to. Our findings, if my views prevail, will be limited to finding as to the activities of the Bolsheviks to spread their doctrines, and we are not called upon to pass upon the goodness or the badness, if I may be permitted that expression, of their peculiar political system.

Mr. ROBINS. May I ask another question, Senator? If that is the point of view, why was it that Santera Nuorteva, who I understand is a pro-Bolshevik, head of the Finnish bureau here, who has had more to do with the propagation of Bolshevik ideas in this country than any other one person in America, if I am correctly advised—why has he not been called before the committee?

Senator KING. I never heard his name mentioned except by Miss Bryant. I do not know him, and do not know what he is here for.

Mr. ROBINS. I understand he has a bureau in New York and is engaged in propaganda.

Senator OVERMAN. It has been testified time and again that he is.

Senator KING. Then would you say that the Bolsheviks are engaged in propaganda here as well as in other countries?

Mr. ROBINS. I would say this, that there are individuals in America propagating Bolshevik ideas—in fact, every I. W. W. is doing that job and has been for 20 years—and if there is an organized propaganda supported by money from Europe, that is something I would like to know. I do not know it of my own knowledge. I have heard it charged that that was so in the case of Nuorteva. If that is so I would like to know it. I do not know it of my own knowledge.

Senator KING. But he was here?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes.

Senator KING. And is carrying on a propaganda in favor of Bolshevik ideas?

Mr. ROBINS. Whether he was doing that, or whether it was to get recognition of the Bolshevik government—there may be some distinction between the two—but that he is a person who believes in its rule, and may have the same right to do that that I have to believe against it. But he was engaged in a definite propaganda here in this country, and probably could tell you more about it than any other person.

Senator OVERMAN. Mr. Humes is going to submit to this committee a number of documents, many of them from this man you speak of. These documents will be in the record, showing that the propaganda is going on to a great extent.

Senator NELSON. We have a great number of documents which have been submitted and printed in this country; and I want to say for myself that all I have cared about the Russian situation was to ascertain what the creed and doctrine of this Bolshevik government was, and then beyond that to see what they were doing in this country.

Now, the resolution that authorized us to investigate it was simply directed to their operations in this country—the Bolshevik propaganda in this country. There were a number of these socialists who came here who wanted to testify, who volunteered and insisted, and they injected a lot of stuff about the Russian situation. They came here to exhibit their own knowledge of Russia and their propaganda, and to tell us about the situation, or rather to preach in favor of recognizing that government. We have nothing to do with that, but the committee let them come and testify. I do not think we forced you to come in. You came in voluntarily, as I understand.

Mr. ROBINS. I came at the request of the chairman. I was asked by a gentleman, who said he was an agent of the Department of Justice, whether I would come voluntarily or whether I would have to be required to come. I said, "I will come voluntarily."

Senator OVERMAN. Just as you have done this afternoon?

Mr. ROBINS. Just exactly; only to-day at my request and before at yours.

Senator OVERMAN. Some of them requested that you be called, and I told them I would be glad to call you, and I told them to ask you if you would come without a subpoena.

Senator KING. What Senator Nelson has said is my understanding, and as far as I am concerned there will be no finding at all in regard to the conditions in Russia, or whether there ought to have been recognition of the Bolshevik government, or anything of that nature at all. It will simply be a finding as to whether or not the Bolshevik government has attempted to propagate its views in this country. That is the only issue.

Senator OVERMAN. I thought we ought to find out what their principles are, and if they are a menace to us, if they are working an injury to our own country, the propaganda ought to be stopped. I thought we ought to know what their principles are in order to make some recommendation to Congress as to future legislation. I asked you that question, and you said you thought there ought to be some legislation.

Senator NELSON. The main question in a nutshell is this: Are their doctrines and propaganda a danger and a menace to this country? If so, how can we counteract them? That is all we have got to do. Now I have listened to your testimony, and I do not see any real conflict between you and Ambassador Francis.

Mr. ROBINS. I am very glad that that is so, resting on the record, Senators. In the newspapers it was made a definite effort to appear that the ambassador was discrediting me. I could not understand it. I did not know why it was possible. Certain persons said to me, "The ambassador is going to discredit you." I said, "That is impossible, because there is nothing to discredit," and I went back to Chicago with a perfect freedom of conviction as to our understanding.

Senator OVERMAN. When you read the record in this case you will see that there is no reflection whatever on you.

Mr. ROBINS. I am very glad to know that.

Senator KING. I want to ask one or two questions. There are a number of people going back and forth, or at least there were a year or more ago a number of people going back and forth to Russia, who were engaged in propagating Bolshevik ideas.

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know as to that, Senator. You see, I came out in June, 1918. During the six months I have been out I do not think anybody could come out or go back.

Senator KING. There were a number of persons who went to Russia from the United States.

Mr. ROBINS. After the revolution?

Senator KING. After the revolution.

Mr. ROBINS. A great number, sir.

Senator KING. Some testimony here indicates that one week 800 went from the United States to Petrograd.

Mr. ROBINS. I should think that was entirely reasonable.

Senator KING. And that a large number of them were from New York and were Russian nationals who had been living in the United States for some time, and that they participated in the revolution and became followers of Lenine and Trotsky. Would your observation corroborate that view?

Mr. ROBINS. Oh, as to a great many of them I should say that was true. And on the other hand, some very loyal supporters of Kerensky were men who were emigrants from the United States.

Senator KING. Do you know whether or not people have gone from Russia to other countries, Germany, Switzerland, and other European countries and our own country, and to South America, for the purpose of carrying on the Bolshevik propaganda?

Mr. ROBINS. I know absolutely in relation to groups of men going into Germany and into Austria. I was told of one group that was to meet on a certain night, and I was advised by Mr. Edgar G. Sisson, of the American Committee on Public Information, that I could probably use some money in forwarding that enterprise, which was in his judgment and in my judgment sound, and he gave me the right to use 75,000 rubles in helping these men get into Germany and Austria; but when I got there and had held a conference with them, they would not take the money, but said they were going there, and discussed the enterprise. They had men there who were business men and workingmen, and men who were soldiers, who spoke not only the German language but Bohemian and various other languages of Austria, to go in there and spread the Bolshevik formulas.

Senator KING. Do you know of people who have been in the United States, and who are now sympathizers with Bolshevism, and who are seeking to spread it in this country?

Mr. ROBINS. I would not know whether they were spreading it, but there are some people here who are Americans who are sympathizing with the Bolshevik formulas, and who believe Bolshevism is the best way out; that it is a wonderful new program, and all that sort of thing.

Senator KING. Do you know whether the Bolshevik government has sent propagandists to South America?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know, only by hearsay. I have seen it stated and have heard it stated.

Senator NELSON. There is a man by the name of Radek. I guess you are familiar with him?

Mr. ROBINS. I know him very well. He is in Germany, and possibly in prison or dead. Radek was possibly the ablest of the journalists of the Bolshevik group.

Senator NELSON. Was he a Russian or a German?

Mr. ROBINS. An Austrian.

Senator NELSON. A Hebrew?

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir; he is not a Hebrew. He is an Austrian Gentle and a very able man.

Senator KING. He prepared many of the proclamations signed by Lenine and Trotsky?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; and wrote a great many of the documents sent out to the army for Austria and Germany.

Senator NELSON. Do you know a Finn by the name of Nuorteva?

Mr. ROBINS. That is the man I suggested that you should have appear before you. I have met him twice.

Senator NELSON. What sort of a man is he?

Mr. ROBINS. He seemed to be a very intelligent person and to be thoroughly committed to his program.

Senator NELSON. You know there are two kinds of Finns—Swedish Finns and real Finns.

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know which he is.

Senator NELSON. What is his name?

Mr. ROBINS. Santera Nuorteva.

Senator NELSON. That is a Finnish name.

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know. I am not wise in those matters.

Senator KING. Of course, it is obvious that the Bolshevik government is now attempting to destroy Poland, and perhaps some of those other governments which the allies, including our own Government impliedly, if not openly, must support. Do you understand that they are doing that now?

Mr. ROBINS. As to Poland, I followed that with some care because the Polish situation was constantly before us, and my understanding as to Poland was this, that there are two groups of the Polish citizens, the Pilsudsky's group, the Socialist group, and Paderewski's group which more nearly represents the bourgeois class, the landlords, and so on.

Senator KING. You know they are working together, do you not?

Mr. ROBINS. I know that there is a claim that they are, but there are things in the press which indicate that they are not, and those who are familiar with the situation can well understand that there might be a conflict between them.

Senator KING. You understand that the Bolsheviks, in line with their view, are attempting to disintegrate or destroy the incipient Polish republic and subject it to Bolshevik control?

Mr. ROBINS. Put it this way, that they were throwing all the influence they had on the side of Pilsudsky and against Paderewski, and that would mean a split and probably civil war.

Senator KING. And that they are going to give military aid if necessary in order to destroy or prevent the formation of a republic there which would be supported by the allies, or maintained by the allies?

Mr. ROBINS. I do not know how far they would go. I do not know what the purpose of the American Government in the Polish situation really is. I do not know what the purpose of the American Government in the Russian situation really is. I have tried to find out, but I do not know.

Senator KING. I am speaking only of Poland. Judging from what we learn, there is to be a recognition of the Polish Republic, and a Jugo-Slav Republic, and a Czecho-Slav Republic; and the point I am trying to get at is that the Bolsheviks are trying by propaganda to prevent the erection of these independent republics, and to subject whatever governments may be organized there to Bolshevik control.

Mr. ROBINS. This is the thought I would suggest. The Bolsheviks will try to have what they call an economic soviet republic as against what we might call a political democratic republic, and if they find that in Jugo-Slavia after awhile, in the struggle there, there is a socialist movement, they would support that socialist movement.

Senator KING. By military force?

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; and before the story is over we may be in the position of having to decide what we will do in matters of that sort, just as we have had to decide about a very similar situation down in Mexico. If I understand it truly, Carranza's program is very similar to the Bolshevik program, and I believe we have recognized them.

Senator KING. I differ with you there, but I do not care to be led into a discussion of Mexico.

Mr. ROBINS. The subject is broad enough as it is.

Senator KING. Yes; I can only say that I am not satisfied with conditions in Mexico. But the point I am trying to get at is that the propaganda of the Bolsheviks is not limited to mere preachments, but will extend to military operations, as I understand their position.

Mr. ROBINS. If they have the power. They believe in the use of force, and one of the reasons why a people who believe in settling questions by the ballot are opposed to the Bolsheviks is because the Bolsheviks believe in force.

Senator KING. Then when they withdrew from the military operations against Germany it was not because they did not believe in force?

Mr. ROBINS. Not at all.

Senator KING. They are willing now to organize armies, and are attempting to organize armies?

Mr. ROBINS. They organized resistance to Germany. They sent the Red Guard out, and the sailors—sent them out against the Germans—but they were overwhelmed by the rotting old army, that fell back as soon as the Germans advanced. They fought the German advance, and the White Guard advance on the Finnish border. They fought the Ukrainian Rada and the White Guards. But they had a desperate economic situation and a desperate disorganization of the army to deal with. They kept saying, "We have got to fight German militarism, because German militarism will not allow us to live. As soon as we get an economic reorganization, as soon as we get a new revolutionary army, then we can fight the German power, but for the time being we have got to make peace." And the peace of Brest-Litovsk was a peace of Tilsit—was a peace of preparation. That was the program.

Senator KING. My point is that they are perfectly willing to carry on their propaganda not only by preachment but by force.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes. So far as I understand their belief, they believe in self-determination; that any group has the right to determine its own government. Now any revolutionary socialist government would receive support from Russia, in the desire that there should be a world-wide revolution. I do not believe the soviet government of Russia would send troops, if it had troops to send, into another country, unless there was a revolutionary movement of the workers and peasants of that country.

Senator KING. We know that they sent Radek with millions of rubles into Germany for the purpose of stirring up a revolution there.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes, at a time when there were already absolute soviet groups organized; and probably Liebknecht and Rosa Luxembourgh and others called on their Russian comrades, and they went over there.

Senator KING. You know that in Germany they had an election, and from all reports it was a fair election. The women participated. Everybody over 20 years of age, men and women, participated in that election, and we have received from time to time without any contradiction the returns of that election, which show that the Spartacides received a very inconsiderable fraction of the legal vote, but notwithstanding that fact Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg and the Spartacides precipitated a revolution, and the Bolshevists were perfectly willing to aid them in overturning the government that had been established by a majority, and which represented, so far as the ballot could express their views, the wish of the majority.

Mr. ROBINS. There is no question about that.

Senator KING. And they would be willing to send troops into England or France or into our country for the purpose of aiding—

Mr. ROBINS. For the purpose of aiding a revolutionary group in any of those countries.

Senator KING. No matter how insignificant that revolutionary group was.

Mr. ROBINS. That would be a matter of judgment. In general I would say that is sound.

Senator KING. So that their purpose is to foment revolution and destroy governments, for the purposes of propagating their views and their peculiar theories, and they believe in international revolution and dictatorship of the proletariat.

Senator STERLING. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say this. I do not want it to be implied from my silence when we were discussing the scope of this investigation awhile ago that I assent to all that has been said by members of the committee. I think it entirely relevant to this investigation that we should have gone into the conditions in Russia, for we found there the source, for the most part at least, of Bolshevism, and we can not understand Bolshevism in this country until we understand its workings in Russia, the intentions and motives of its leaders there, and the excesses and atrocities committed by Bolshevism there; and I think this investigation has proven to be most profitable from that standpoint. We know what Bolshevism is there, and we know what a menace it is to the world by knowing what it is there as described by various witnesses, Col. Robins among them, and we should prize his testimony for the information it gives us in regard to conditions in Russia.

Senator KING. I suppose, though, technically speaking, in our findings we will be limited by the resolution.

Senator STERLING. We may be limited to finding what conditions are in this country, but in our report I think we would be authorized to discuss Bolshevism as it exists in Russia, as a justification for our conclusion.

Mr. ROBINS. That is the only reason I made the suggestion, because it had gone that far afield, and having done so it ought to cover those witnesses who would give you the largest information upon it—creditable witnesses.

Senator KING. My view was that we were limited to the purposes declared in the resolution, and I still think that any findings we might make would be limited to those that were indicated by the resolution; and yet that is a matter about which I have no very strong convictions.

Senator OVERMAN. We can state conditions and findings separately.

Senator KING. But that is not a matter that is material for the record.

Senator NELSON. It seems, Mr. Robins, that all the witnesses you suggest calling would testify with reference to the operations of the Red Cross.

Mr. ROBINS. No, sir. There is Prof. Emery, a most intelligent man, who was at the head of the tariff commission, and who is a university man——

Senator OVERMAN. He was captured over there.

Mr. ROBINS. Yes; he was in the German camp and saw the spread of Bolshevism there.

Senator STERLING. I should like to ask if the statement of Col. Vladimir S. Hurban has been put in the record?

Senator OVERMAN. Yes; and the attention of Mr. Robins ought to be called to that. Then if he desires to make any reply, it can be put in the record.

Mr. ROBINS. I have read his statement, and I have no comment to make upon it.

Senator OVERMAN. The committee will adjourn, subject to the call of the chairman.

(Whereupon, at 5 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m., the subcommittee adjourned, subject to the call of the chairman.)

(The following letter and accompanying statement were ordered to be inserted in the record:)

HOTEL MAJESTIC,
New York, March 10, 1919.

HON. LEE S. OVERMAN,

Member United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR OVERMAN: I take pleasure in sending you herewith an article of mine about the Czecho-Slovaks in Russia, which I have written with reference to the recent testimony of Col. Raymond Robins before the Senate Committee.

Trusting that this article will be of interest to you, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

CATHERINE BRESHKOVSKY.

THE CZECHO-SLOVAKS IN RUSSIA.

[By Catherine Breshkovsky.]

With so many misrepresentations and calumnies afloat now about conditions in Russia, it is almost impossible to reply to every false assertion or testimony. Yet there are matters of such great consequence, questions so pregnant with meaning that it would be a crime not to give the world a true exposition of the actual facts. Among many other calumnies regarding conditions in Russia, one of the most revolting is the recent testimony of Colonel Raymond Robins before the Senate Committee in the matter of the Czecho-Slovaks, their stay in Russia and their fighting against the Bolsheviks.

The events referred to occurred in the Spring of 1918, when the remnant of this brave and honorable Army, who for three years had fought against Germany together with our Russian troops, decided—after the treacherous peace arranged by Lenine and Trotzky at Brest-Litovsk was signed—to go to France and continue the war for the freedom of all the democracies of the world, and their own as well. As it was impossible for them to cross the former Russian front because of the German troops, the Czecho-Slovaks decided to go to the east, through all Russia and Siberia, to reach Vladivostok and from there to sail to France,—a journey of many thousands of miles by land and water. As for myself—I was at this time hidden in Moscow and through my many friends could get news from some provinces along the Volga River, where small detachments of the Czecho-Slovak Army appeared by and by, part on foot and part by rail, all armed and even with some artillery. Then I began to get letters from many peasants asking me who those mysterious troops were and what their intentions were. To these questions they added that this strange Army was a well-behaved one, never harming anyone and paying regularly for all the provisions obtained along their route.

Soon afterwards we read in the papers that detachments of Czecho-Slovaks, armed and in good order, dotted the long way from the Volga to Eastern Siberia. Finding it impossible to be transported and fed in one large body, they had dissolved themselves into many groups and were continuing on their way. In the meantime Moscow was ruled by the Kaiser's Ambassador, Count Mirbach, who ruled all the Bolshevik provinces and whose obedient servants were Lenine and Trotzky. In keeping with their purpose to cheat the Russian people, these two leaders of the Bolsheviks let it be known secretly that they would begin a new war against the Kaiser, "who has not fulfilled the terms of the peace," and they even started a sham mobilization to undertake a "crusade against the oppressors of the freedom of the Russian people," as Trotzky expressed himself.

After two weeks of such proclamations, Lenine published another one in which he said that, acknowledging the situation, he understands that it would be foolishness to continue a war that would check the progress of the revolution, and therefore he asserts that "peace with Germany must be concluded, whatever the terms may be." So, Mirbach, smiling at all the comedies of his Bolshevik assistants, ordered them to disarm the Czecho-Slovaks, who were moving to the east, and to check their march.

It was in May of 1918 that some officers were sent by the Bolsheviks to Siberia to order these brave men to lay down their arms. Some arms were given up by the small detachments near Novo-Nikolayevsk, but about half was retained by the Czecho-Slovaks. These happenings were reported in the Moscow papers without any comment, but intelligent people began to understand the meaning of the persecution of the Czecho-Slovaks. It was clear that behind the Bolshevik policy to disarm any force fighting the Germans in Russia, stood Count von Mirbach.

And very soon afterwards we read again that some more officers and Red Guards had been sent to Siberia for the same purpose. But the Czecho-Slovaks understood that it meant death for them to be left to the mercy of the Red Guards, who already counted among their number many thousands of German and Magyar prisoners, equipped and armed at the command of Moscow. Instead of surrendering, the Czecho-Slovaks turned to the west, and their first deed was to turn the Red Guards out of the town of Novo-Nikolayevsk. The joy of the inhabitants was intense.

The first of July, I left Moscow secretly with a young friend, a member of our Party, and proceeded to the East, where I hoped to encounter friends and partisans able to organize a truly democratic government for all Russia. Crossing the Ural Mountains, making a detour to avoid the front, stopping in the villages to change horses and get some rest, on all sides we heard the same lamentations of the peasants about the looting and violence of the Red Guards and about the peasants' wishes to get aid from somebody. "There are people, the Czecho-Slovaks, good people," I heard from the peasants. "Why do they not come here to turn out these brigands!" And the nearer we approached Siberia, the louder were the complaints of the people and the more eager the desire to have these brave soldiers with them.

Tumen, an important trading center, was full of Bolsheviks when we entered it. These brigands were turning the people mad with despair and fear of their violence and robbery, taking from every family everything possible and emptying all the shops and stores to send the goods to Ekaterinburg. It was just the moment when the Czecho-Slovaks, having turned the Bolsheviks out of Omsk, Tobolsk and the villages on the way, were approaching Tumen and were expected from day to day by the tortured inhabitants.

The Bolshevik party has opened its ranks not only to criminals, but also to many psychologically abnormal, almost insane elements. Given the privilege of choosing their functions, these elements had every opportunity to satisfy their cruel instincts. So, in Tumen, there was a Bolshevik inspector of the prison, a ferocious monster who tortured the prisoners arrested by the Bolsheviks so incessantly that some went absolutely mad, some died from their tortures and some were buried under the stones and rocks before they were dead.

Having friends all over Russia, I was concealed by several doctors in a hospital for some time, until we should find it possible to leave Tumen safely. Then one morning shouts were heard throughout the hospital: "They are coming! They are coming!" And they came, Colonel (now General) Sorovoy, with his gallant Czecho-Slovaks, and a Russian general with some Russian troops. It was a thanksgiving day! Not only the town, but all the surrounding villages were represented here with thousands of people praying, cheering and crying with joy like children. The municipality, the schools, the churches,—all the organizations sent their delegates to invite the saviours to the common feast. Many of the women came dressed in mourning; some of the mothers of the victims of the Bolshevik terror had to be supported, for they could not walk by themselves.

It was the first time I saw with my own eyes and came in close touch with the Czecho-Slovak officers and men. They were admired by all of us, not only for their gallant appearance, but they were also highly esteemed as brave warriors, most perfect gentlemen and splendid citizens.

After this memorable day I always had the most friendly relations with Czecho-Slovak soldiers and officers. I was interested in their political aspirations, and everywhere and in all circumstances I found them the same: noble, unselfish, strong in their duties and faith. In Omsk I was proclaimed by the Czecho-Slovaks the "grandmother" of their troops in Russia. There, as well as in Ekaterinburg, in Cheliabinsk, in Ufa, in Samara, in all these places, I always found them fine men, beloved and esteemed by all the Russians.

Yes, they were admired especially for their humanity, their sense of honor and bravery. While Col. Robins tell his stories about the Czecho-Slovak "atrocities," I have never heard any complaint against them, never a derogatory remark, even by those who envied their valour, their constant and unflinching success. All intelligent Russians are proud to have them as brothers in the Slavonic race; all our simple people love them for their readiness to sympathetically aid every suffering human being.

It is natural that such excellent people, such examples of bravery and honor, are hated by the Bolsheviks and their supporters, who are in character the very antipodes of the blessed Czecho-Slovak people.

* * * * *

(The following note, submitted by Mr. Humes at the time of handing in the exhibits next appearing hereafter, explains the source:)

The character and nature of the propaganda now being carried on in the United States can be readily ascertained from the literature and newspapers published by the several so-called radical groups and by them circulated among their own followers and the elements of the population whose support they are seeking, and the following excerpts, extracts, and articles from various publications, books, newspapers, and periodicals are presented as a clear indication of the nature of the propaganda now being carried on and as typical of the character of the activities of the several so-called radical groups:

EXTRACTS FROM PAMPHLET ENTITLED "SABOTAGE," BY EMILE POUGET.

* * * * *

What then, is Sabotage? Sabotage is:

A. Any conscious and wilful act on the part of one or more workers intended to slacken and reduce the output of production in the industrial field, or to restrict trade and reduce the profits in the commercial field, in order to secure from their employers better conditions or to enforce those promised or maintain those already prevailing, when no other way of redress is open.

B. Any skillful operation on the machinery of production intended not to destroy it or permanently render it defective, but only to temporarily disable it and to put it out of running condition in order to make impossible the work of scabs and thus to secure the complete and real stoppage of work during a strike.

Whether you agree or not, Sabotage is this and nothing but this. It is not destructive. It has nothing to do with violence, neither to life nor to property. It is nothing more or less than the chloroforming of the organism of production, the "knock-out drops" to put to sleep and out of harm's way the ogres of steel and fire that watch and multiply the treasures of King Capital.

* * * * *

This booklet is not written for capitalists nor for the upholders of the capitalist system, therefore it does not purpose to justify or excuse Sabotage before the capitalist mind and morals.

Its avowed aim is to explain and expound Sabotage to the working class, especially to that part of it which is revolutionary in aim if not in method, and as this ever-growing fraction of the proletariat has a special mentality and hence a special morality of its own, this introduction purports to prove that Sabotage is fully in accordance with the same.

Let us therefore consider Sabotage under its two aspects, first as a personal relaxation of work when wages and conditions are not satisfactory, and next as a mischievous tampering with machinery to secure its complete immobilization during a strike. It must be said with especial emphasis that Sabotage is not and must not be made a systematic hampering of production, that it is not meant as a perpetual clogging of the workings of industry, but that it is a simple expedient of war, to be used only in time of actual warfare with sobriety and moderation, and to be laid by when the truce intervenes. Its own limitations will be self-evident after this book has been read, and need not be explained here.

Well, now, for argument's sake, why shouldn't you admire a striker who went as scab, say, to work in the subway, and then by putting a red lantern in the wrong place (or rather in the right place) disarranges and demoralizes the whole system? If a single, humble red lantern can stop an express train and all the trains coming behind it, and thus tie up the whole traffic for hours, isn't the man who does this as much of a benefactor to his striking brothers as the soldier mentioned above to his army? Surely this is "ethically justifiable" even before the Capitalist morality, if you only admit that there is a state of belligerency between the working class and the capitalist class.

Saboteurs are the éclaireurs, the scouts of the class struggle, they are the "sentinelles perdues" at the outposts, the spies in the enemy's own ranks. They can be executed if they are caught (and this is almost impossible), but they cannot be disgraced, for the enemy himself, if it be gallant and brave, must honor and respect bravery and daring.

Now that the bosses have succeeded in dealing an almost mortal blow to the boycott, now that picket duty is practically outlawed, free speech throttled, free assemblage prohibited, and injunctions against labor are becoming epidemic; Sabotage, this dark, invincible, terrible Damocles' sword that hangs over the head of the master class, will replace all the confiscated weapons and ammunition of the army of the toilers. And it will win, for it is the most redoubtable of all, except the general strike. In vain may the bosses get an injunction against the strikers' funds—Sabotage will get a more powerful one against their machinery. In vain may they invoke old laws and make new ones against it—they will never discover it, never track it to its lair, never run it to the ground, for no laws will ever make a crime of the "clumsiness and lack of skill" of a "scab" who bungles his work or "puts on the bum" a machine he "does not know how to run."

There can be no injunction against it. No policeman's club. No rifle diet. No prison bars. It cannot be starved into submission. It cannot be discharged. It cannot be blacklisted. It is present everywhere and everywhere invisible, like the airship that soars high above the clouds in the dead of night, beyond the reach of the cannon and the searchlight, and drops the deadliest bombs into the enemy's own encampment.

Sabotage is the most formidable weapon of economic warfare, which will eventually open to the workers the great iron gate of capitalist exploitation and lead them out of the house of bondage into the free land of the future.

ARTURO M. GIOVANNITTI.

ESSEX CO. JAIL, LAWRENCE, MASS., August, 1912.

SABOTAGE.

ORIGIN OF SABOTAGE—ITS EARLY APPEARANCE—BALZAC ON SABOTAGE—THE ENGLISH "GO CANNY"—BAD WAGES, BAD WORK—NEW HORIZONS—PANIC AMONGST THE BOSSES—AN IMPRESSING DECLARATION—AN EPOCH-MAKING DISCUSSION AT THE CONGRESS OF THE C. G. T.—TRIUMPHANT ENTRANCE OF SABOTAGE IN FRANCE.

Up to fifteen years ago the term Sabotage was nothing but a slang word, not meaning "to make wooden shoes" as it may be imagined but, in a figurative way, to work clumsily as if by sabot¹ blows.

¹ Sabot means a wooden shoe.

Since then the word was transformed into a new form of social warfare and the Congress of Toulouse of the General Confederation of Labor in 1897 received at last its syndical baptism. The new term was not at first accepted by the working class with the warmest enthusiasm—some even saw it with mistrust, reproaching it not only for its humble origin but also its immorality.

Nevertheless, despite all these prejudices which seemed almost hostilities, Sabotage went steadily on its way around the world. It has now the full sympathy of the workers.

* * * * *

The bourgeoisie, of course, has felt itself struck at heart by Sabotage—that is, struck in its pocketbook. And yet—be it said without offensive intention—the good old lady must resign herself and get used to living in the constant company of Sabotage. Indeed it would be wise for her to make the best of what she cannot prevent or suppress. As she must familiarize herself with the thought of her end (at least as a ruling and owning class), so it were well for her to familiarize herself with Sabotage, which has nowadays deep and indestructible roots. Harpooned to the sides of capitalistic society it shall tear and bleed it until the shark turns the final somersault.

It is already, and shall continually become more so—worse than a pestiferous epidemic—worse, indeed, than any terrible contagious disease. It shall become to the body social of capitalism more dangerous and incurable than cancer and syphilis are to the human body. Naturally all this is quite a bore for this scoundrelly society—but it is inevitable and fatal.

It does not require to be a great prophet to predict that the more we progress, the more we shall Sabot.

* * * * *

The most important part of a strike, therefore, precedes the strike itself and consists in reducing to a powerless condition the working instruments. It is the A B C of economic warfare.

It is only then that the game between masters and workers is straight and fair, as it is clear that only then the complete cessation of work becomes real and produces the designed results, i. e., the complete arrest of labor activity within the capitalist shop.

Is a strike contemplated by the most indispensable workers—those of the alimentary trades? A quart of kerosene or other greasy and malodorous matter poured or smeared on the level of an oven * * * and welcome the scabs and scabby soldiers who come to bake the bread! The bread will be uneatable because the stones will give the bread for at least a month the foul odor of the substance they have absorbed. Results: A useless oven.

Is a strike coming in the iron, steel, copper or any other mineral industry?

A little sand or emery powder in the gear of those machines which like fabulous monsters mark the exploitation of the workers, and they will become palsied and useless.

The iron ogre will become as helpless as a nursing and with it the scab.

* * * * *

A. Renault, a clerk in the Western Railroad, has touched on the same argument in his volume "Syndicalism in the Railroads," an argument which cost him his position at a trial in which the commission acted as a court martial. "To be sure of success," explained Renault, "in case that all railroad workers do not quit their work at once—it is indispensable that a stratagem of which it is useless to give here the definition be instantaneously and simultaneously applied in all important centers as soon as the strike is declared.

For this it would be necessary that pickets of comrades determined to prevent at any cost the circulation of trains be posted in every important center and locality. It would be well to choose those workers amongst the most skilled and experienced, such as could find the weak points offhand without committing acts of stupid destruction, who by their open-eyed, cautious and intelligent action as well as energetic and efficacious skill, would by a single stroke disable and render useless for some days the material necessary to the regular performance of the service and the movement of the trains. It is necessary to do this seriously. It is well to reckon beforehand with the scabs and the military.

* * * * *

This tactic which consists in reinforcing with the strike of the machinery the strike of the arms would appear low and mean—but it is not so.

The class conscious toilers well know that they are but a minority and they fear that their comrades have not the grit and energy to resist to the end.

Therefore, in order to check desertion and cut off the retreat to the mass, they burn the bridges behind them.

This result is obtained by taking away from the too submissive workers the instrument of their labor—that is to say by paralyzing the machine which made their efforts fruitful and remunerative.

* * * * *

If the workers disable the machines it is neither for a whim nor for diletantism or evil mind but solely in obedience to an imperious necessity. It should not be forgotten that for many workers in the majority of strikes it is a question of life and death. If they do not paralyze the machines they surely go on to unavoidable defeat, to the wreck of all their hopes. On the other hand by applying sabotage the workers will surely call upon them the curses and insults of the bourgeoisie—but will also insure to themselves many great probabilities of success.

* * * * *

The workers' sabotage is inspired by generous and altruistic principles. It is a shield of defense and protection against the usuries and vexations of the bosses; it is the weapon of the disinherited who, whilst he struggles for his family's existence and his own, aims also to better the social conditions of his class and to deliver it from the exploitation that strangles and crushes it. It is the ferment of a better life.

EXTRACTS FROM PAMPHLET ENTITLED "SABOTAGE" BY ELIZABETH GURLEY FLYNN.

ITS NECESSITY IN THE CLASS WAR.

I am not going to attempt to justify sabotage on any moral ground. If the workers consider that sabotage is necessary, that in itself makes sabotage moral. Its necessity is its excuse for existence. And for us to discuss the morality of sabotage would be as absurd as to discuss the morality of the strike or the morality of the class struggle itself. In order to understand sabotage or to accept it at all it is necessary to accept the concept of the class struggle. If you believe that between the workers on the one side and their employers on the other there is peace, there is harmony such as exists between brothers, and that consequently whatever strikes and lockouts occur are simply family squabbles; if you believe that a point can be reached whereby the employer can get enough and the worker can get enough, a point of amicable adjustment of industrial warfare and economic distribution, then there is no justification and no explanation of sabotage intelligible to you. * * *

Sabotage is to this class struggle what the guerrilla warfare is to the battle. The strike is the open battle of the class struggle, sabotage is the guerrilla warfare, the day-by-day warfare between two opposing classes.

GENERAL FORMS OF SABOTAGE.

Sabotage was adopted by the General Federation of Labor of France in 1897 as a recognized weapon in their method of conducting fights on their employers. But sabotage as an instinctive defense existed long before it was ever officially recognized by any labor organization. Sabotage means primarily: the withdrawal of efficiency. Sabotage means either to slacken up and interfere with the quantity, or to botch in your skill and interfere with the quality, of capitalist production or to give poor service. It is something that is fought out within the four walls of the shop. Sabotage is not physical violence, sabotage is an internal industrial process. And these three forms of sabotage—to affect the quality, the quantity and the service are aimed at affecting the profit of the employer. Sabotage is a means of striking at the employer's profit for the purpose of forcing him into granting certain conditions, even as workingmen strike for the same purpose of coercing him. It is simply another form of coercion.

* * * * *

Working-class sabotage is aimed directly at "the boss" and at his profits, in the belief that that is the solar plexus of the employer, that is his heart, his religion, his sentiment, his patriotism. Everything is centered in his pocket book, and if you strike that you are striking at the most vulnerable point in his entire moral and economic system.

* * * * *

BOYD'S ADVICE TO SILK MILL SLAVES.

So it is with the quality. Take the case of Frederic Sumner Boyd, in which we should all be deeply interested because it is evident Frederic Sumner Boyd is to be made "the goat" by the authorities in New Jersey. That is to say, they want blood, they want one victim. If they can't get anybody else, they are determined they are going to get Boyd, in order to serve a two-fold purpose to cow the workers of Paterson, as they believe they can, and to put this thing, sabotage, into the statutes, to make it an illegal thing to advocate or to practice. Boyd said this: "If you go back to work and you find scabs working alongside of you, you should put a little bit vinegar on the reed of the loom in order to prevent its operation." They have arrested him under the statute forbidding the advocacy of the destruction of property. He advised the dyers to go into the dye houses and to use certain chemicals in the dyeing of the silk that would tend to make that silk unweavable.

* * * * *

Sabotage is for the workingman an absolute necessity. Therefor it is almost useless to argue about its effectiveness.

When a man uses sabotage he is usually intending to benefit the whole; doing an individual thing but doing it for the benefit of himself and others together. And it requires courage. It requires individuality. It creates in that working man some self-respect for and self-reliance upon himself as a producer. I contend that sabotage instead of being sneaking and cowardly is a courageous thing, is an open thing. The boss may not be notified about it through the papers, but he finds out about it very quickly, just the same. And the man or woman who employs it is demonstrating a courage that you may measure in this way: How many of the critics would do it? How many of you, if you were dependent on a job in a silk town like Paterson would take your job in your hands and employ sabotage? If you were a machinist in a locomotive shop and had a good job, how many of you would risk it to employ sabotage? Consider that and then you have the right to call the man who uses it a coward—if you can.

EXTRACTS FROM PAMPHLET ENTITLED "THE ONWARD SWEEP OF THE MACHINE PROCESS."

While the craft unions (the American Federation of Labor) says that the workers must organize to get a "fair share" of what they produce, the industrial organization (the Industrial Workers of the World) says that the workers must organize to get all they produce. The I. W. W. also says: "The workers made the machines, and the workers run the machines; therefore, by God, the machines should also belong to the workers."

EXTRACTS FROM PAMPHLET ENTITLED "THE REVOLUTIONARY I. W. W.," BY GROVER H. PERRY.

ORGANIZING A NEW SOCIAL SYSTEM.

The I. W. W. is fast approaching the stage where it can accomplish its mission. This mission is revolutionary in character.

The Preamble of the I. W. W. Constitution says in part: "By organizing industrially, we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old." That is the crux of the I. W. W. position. We are not satisfied with a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. Such a thing is impossible. Labor produces all wealth. Labor therefore is entitled to all wealth. We are going to do away with capitalism by taking possession of the land and the machinery of production. We don't intend to buy them, either. The capitalist class took them because it had the power to control the muscle and brain of the working class in industry. Organized, we, the working class, will have the power. With that power we will take back that which has been stolen from us. We will demand more and more wages from our employers. We will demand and enforce shorter and shorter hours. As we gain these demands we are diminishing the profits of the boss. We are taking away his power. We are gaining that power for ourselves. All the time we become more disciplined. We become self confident. We realize that without our labor no wealth can be produced. We fold our arms. The mills close. Industry is at a standstill. We then make our proposition to our former masters. It is this: We, the workers, have labored long enough to support idlers. From now on, he who does not toil, neither shall he eat. We tear down to build up.

EXTRACTS FROM BOOKLET "THE I. W. W., ITS HISTORY, STRUCTURE AND METHODS," BY VINCENT ST. JOHN.

THE I. W. W.—A BRIEF HISTORY.

In the fall of 1904 six active workers in the revolutionary labor movement held a conference. After exchanging views and discussing the conditions then confronting the workers of the United States, they decided to issue a call for a larger gathering.

These six workers were Isaac Cowen, American representative of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers of Great Britain; Clarence Smith, general secretary-treasurer of the American Labor Union; Thomas J. Hagerty, editor of the "Voice of Labor," official organ of the A. L. U.; George Estes, president of the United Brotherhood of Railway Employees; W. L. Hall, general secretary-treasurer U. B. R. R. E., and Wm. E. Trautmann, editor of the "Brauer Zeitung," the official organ of the United Brewery Workers of America.

Invitations were then sent out to thirty-six additional individuals who were active in radical labor organizations and the socialist political movement of the United States, inviting them to meet in secret conference in Chicago, Illinois, January 2, 1905.

Of the thirty-six who received invitations, but two declined to attend the proposed conference—Max S. Hayes and Victor Berger—both of whom were in editorial charge of socialist political party and trade union organs.

The conference met at the appointed time with thirty present and drew up the Industrial Union Manifesto calling for a convention to be held in Chicago, June 27, 1905, for the purpose of launching an organization in accord with the principles set forth in the Manifesto.

The work of circulating the Manifesto was handled by an executive committee of the conference, the American Labor Union and the Western Federation of Miners.

The Manifesto was widely circulated in several languages.

On the date set the convention assembled with 186 delegates present from 34 state, district, national and local organizations, representing about 90,000 members.

All who were present as delegates were not there in good faith. Knowledge of this fact caused the signers of the Manifesto to constitute themselves a temporary committee on credentials.

This temporary credentials committee ruled that representation for organizations would be based upon the number of members in their respective organizations only where such delegates were empowered by their organizations to install said organizations as integral parts of the Industrial Union when formed. Where not so empowered delegates would only be allowed one vote.

One of the delegations present was from the Illinois State District of the United Mine Workers of America. The membership of that district at that time was in the neighborhood of 50,000. Under the above rule these delegates were seated with one vote each. This brings the number of members represented down to 40,000.

Several other organizations that had delegates present, existed mainly on paper; so it is safe to say that 40,000 is a good estimate of the number of workers represented in the first convention.

The foregoing figures will show that the precautions adopted by the signers of the Manifesto were all that prevented the opponents of the industrial union movement from capturing the convention and blocking any effort to start the organization. It is a fact that many of those who were present as delegates on the floor of the first convention and the organizations that they represented have bitterly fought the I. W. W. from the close of the first convention up to the present day.

The organizations that installed as a part of the new organization were: Western Federation of Miners, 27,000 members; Social Trade and Labor Alliance,¹ 1,450 members; Punch Press Operators, 168 members; United Metal Workers,¹ 3,000 members; Longshoremen's Union, 400 members; the American

¹ Existed almost wholly on paper.

Labor Union.¹ 16,500 members; United Brotherhood of Railway Employees, 2,087 members.

The convention lasted twelve days; adopted a constitution with the following preamble, and elected officers:

ORIGINAL I. W. W. PREAMBLE.

"The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

"Between these two classes a struggle must go on until all the toilers come together on the political, as well as on the industrial field, and take and hold that which they produce by their labor through an economic organization of the working class, without affiliation with any political party.

"The rapid gathering of wealth and the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands make the trade unions unable to cope with the ever-growing power of the employing class, because the trade unions foster a state of things which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. The trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

"These sad conditions can be changed and the interests of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries, if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all."

All kinds and shades of theories and programs were represented among the delegates and individuals present at the first convention. The principal ones in evidence, however, were four: Parliamentary socialists—two types—impossibilist and opportunist, Marxian and reformist; anarchist; industrial unionist; and the labor union fakir. The task of combining these conflicting elements was attempted by the convention. A knowledge of this task makes it easier to understand the seeming contradictions in the original Preamble.

The first year of the organization was one of internal struggle for control by these different elements. The two camps of socialist politicians looked upon the I. W. W. only as a battle ground upon which to settle their respective merits and demerits. The labor fakirs strove to fasten themselves upon the organization that they might continue to exist if the new union was a success. The anarchist element did not interfere to any great extent in the internal affairs. Only one instance is known to the writer: that of New York City where they were in alliance with one set of politicians, for the purpose of controlling the district council.

In spite of these and other obstacles the new organization made some progress; fought a few successful battles with the employing class, and started publishing a monthly organ, "The Industrial Worker." The I. W. W. also issued the first call for the defense of Moyer, Haywood and Pettibone under the title, "Shall our Brothers be Murdered?"; formed the defense league; and it is due to the interest awakened by the I. W. W. that other organizations were enlisted in the fight to save the lives of the officials of the W. F. M. which finally resulted in their liberation. Thus the efforts of the W. F. M. in starting the I. W. W. were repaid.²

SECOND CONVENTION.

The second convention met in September, 1906, with 93 delegates representing about 60,000 members.

This convention demonstrated that the administration of the I. W. W. was in the hands of men who were not in accord with the revolutionary program of the organization. Of the general officers only two were sincere—the General Secretary, W. E. Trautmann, and one member of the Executive Board, John Riordan.

¹ Existed almost wholly on paper.

² Berger in the "Social Democratic Herald" of Milwaukee denied that the Moyer, Haywood and Pettibone case was a part of the class struggle. It was but a "border feud" said he.

The struggle for control of the organization formed the second convention into two camps. The majority vote of the convention was in the revolutionary camp. The reactionary camp having the chairman used obstructive tactics in their effort to gain control of the convention. They hoped thereby to delay the convention until enough delegates would be forced to return home and thus change the control of the convention. The revolutionists cut this knot by abolishing the office of President and electing a chairman from among the revolutionists.

In this struggle the two contending sets of socialist politicians lined up in opposite camps.

The second convention amended the Preamble by adding the following clause:

"Therefore without endorsing or desiring the endorsement of any political party."

A new executive board was elected. On the adjournment of the convention the old officials seized the general headquarters, and with the aid of detectives and police held the same, compelling the revolutionists to open up new offices. This they were enabled to do in spite of the fact that they were without access to the funds of the organization, and had to depend on getting finances from the locals.

The W. F. M. officials supported the old officials of the I. W. W. for a time financially and with the influence of their official organ. The same is true of the Socialist Party press and administration. The radical element in the W. F. M. were finally able to force the officials to withdraw that support. The old officials of the I. W. W. then gave up all pretense of having an organization.

The organization entered its second year facing a more severe struggle than in its first year. It succeeded, however, in establishing the general headquarters again, and in issuing a weekly publication in place of the monthly, seized by the old officials.

During the second year some hard struggles for better conditions were waged by the members.

The third convention of the I. W. W. was uneventful. But it was at this convention that it became evident that the socialist politicians who had remained with the organization were trying to bend the I. W. W. to their purposes; and a slight effort was made to relegate the politician to the rear.

The fourth convention resulted in a rupture between the politicians and industrial unionists because the former were not allowed to control the organization.

The preamble was amended as follows:

I. W. W. PREAMBLE.

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade unions unable to cope with the ever-growing power of the employing class. The trade unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers, in the same industry, thereby helping to defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries, if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wages for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with the capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

The politicians attempted to set up another organization claiming to be the real industrial movement. It is nothing but a duplicate of their political party and never functions as a labor organization. It is committed to a program of the "civilized plane," i. e. parliamentarism. Its publications are the official organs of a political sect that never misses an opportunity to assail the revolutionary workers while they are engaged in combat with some division of the ruling class. Their favorite method is to charge the revolutionists with all the crimes that a cowardly imagination can conjure into being. "Dynamiters, assassins, thugs, murderers, thieves," etc., are stock phrases.

Following the victory of the Lawrence textile workers the S. L. P. politicians renewed their efforts to pose as the I. W. W.

By representing that they were the I. W. W. and the only I. W. W. they were enabled to deceive several thousand textile workers in Paterson, Passaic, Hackensack, Stirling, Summit, Hoboken, Newark, New Jersey; and Astoria, Long Island, and collect from them initiation fees and dues.

In every instance these political fakers betrayed the workers into the hands of the mill owners, and the efforts of the workers to better their conditions resulted in defeat. At Paterson and Passaic the S. L. P. entered into an alliance with the police to prevent the organizers of the I. W. W. from exposing them to the workers.

Their own actions, however, resulted in exposing them to the workers in their true colors and today they are thoroughly discredited with the workers throughout the district.

For a time the other wing of the political movement contented itself with spreading its venom in secret. Since the conclusion of the Lawrence strike the publications of the Socialist Party (with a very few exceptions) have never failed to use their columns to misrepresent and slander the organization and its active membership. Their attacks have extended to members of their own party who happened to be active members or supporters of the I. W. W.

* * * * *

STRUCTURE OF THE I. W. W.

In its basic principle the I. W. W. calls forth that spirit of revolt and resistance that is so necessary a part of the equipment of any organization of the workers in their struggle for economic independence. In a word, its basic principle makes the I. W. W. a fighting organization. It commits the union to an unceasing struggle against the private ownership and control of industry.

There is but one bargain that the I. W. W. will make with the employing class—complete surrender of all control of industry to the organized workers.

The experience of the past has proven the mass form of organization, such as that of the Knights of Labor, to be as powerless and unwieldy as a mob.

* * * * *

I. W. W. TACTICS OR METHODS.

As a revolutionary organization the Industrial Workers of the World aims to use any and all tactics that will get the results sought with the least expenditure of time and energy. The tactics used are determined solely by the power of the organization to make good in their use. The question of "right" and "wrong" does not concern us.

No terms made with an employer are final. All peace so long as the wage system lasts, is but an armed truce. At any favorable opportunity the struggle for more control of industry is renewed.

As the organization gains control in the industries, and the knowledge among the workers of their power, when properly applied within the industries, becomes more general, the long drawn out strike will become a relic of the past. A long drawn out strike implies insufficient organization or that the strike has occurred at a time when the employer can afford to shut down—or both. Under all ordinary circumstances a strike that is not won in four to six weeks cannot be won by remaining out longer. In trustified industry the employer can better afford to fight one strike that lasts six months than he can six strikes that take place in that period.

No par of the organization is allowed to enter into time contracts with the employers. Where strikes are used, its aim to paralyze all branches of the industry involved, when the employers can least afford a cessation of work—during the busy and when there are rush orders to be filled.

The Industrial Workers of the World maintains that nothing will be conceded by the employers except that which we have the power to take and hold by the strength of our organization. Therefore we seek no agreements with the employers.

Failing to force concession from the employers by the strike, work is resumed and "sabotage" is used to force the employers to concede the demands of the workers.

The great progress made in machine production results in an ever increasing army of unemployed. To counteract this the Industrial Workers of the World aims to establish the shorter work day, and to slow up the working pace, thus compelling the employment of more and more workers.

To facilitate the work of organization, large initiation fees and dues are prohibited by the I. W. W.

During strikes the works are closely picketed and every effort made to keep the employers from getting workers into the shops. All supplies are cut off from strike bound shops. All shipments are refused or missent, delayed and lost if possible. Strike breakers are also isolated to the full extent of the power of the organization. Interference by the government is resented by open violation of the government's orders, going to jail en masse, causing expense to the taxpayers—which is but another name for the employing class.

In short, the I. W. W. advocates the use of militant "direct-action" tactics to the full extent of our power to make good.

* * * * *

The future belongs to the I. W. W. The day of the skilled worker is passed.

EXTRACTS FROM PAMPHLET ENTITLED "THE RED DAWN," BY HARRISON GEORGE,
THE BOLSHEVIKI AND THE I. W. W.

* * * * *

Here the writer challenges all philosophers, both bourgeois and pseudo-socialist, by claiming that—now and hereafter—Wherever it is possible for the bourgeoisie to rule the proletariat, it is possible for that proletariat to accomplish its industrial freedom by revolution.

* * * * *

Imagine the Industrial Workers of the World—the I. W. W.—as having organized American wage workers in its folds, and these workers controlling as well as operating all industries, and you have the same thing, the Bolsheviks have practically accomplished in Russia! Horrible! What? That depends. Impossible? If so, read what the learned professors of Economic Science said at their Association Convention of Minneapolis in December 1913. There, the advice, already given capitalists by a famous economist to prepare themselves for this very thing, i. e.; the rule of the I. W. W.; in the near future, over the whole of American production; the advice given the rich to put their pampered sons and daughters to the acquiring of useful habits in factories, was read and very seriously discussed!—Overalls!?

* * * * *

INTERNATIONALISM?

The thought of the world is fluid and streams across national boundary lines. The wave or bourgeois ideology that poured into Russia now is overturned and, with terrific force, its proletarian crest sweeps outward over Europe. The war between national groups of the bourgeoisie is changing, under pressure of Russian workers, into a war between classes.

Soon there will emerge an International Capitalist State of League of Nations, with an international military power to crush such sectional revolts as happened in Russia. The bourgeoisie, excepting the extreme reactionists, already are endorsing "Internationalism" again, as in "Government Ownership", feeding on the sentiment engendered by parliamentary socialists. The bourgeoisie always are forced to mask their robbery of the workers behind the "camouflage" screen of popular (?) and representative (?) governments.

The "internationalism" of the parliamentary socialists will remain only a word, because with office-seeking eyes, they strive primarily to control national parliaments and remain nationalists.

COSMO-INDUSTRIALISM.

The world proletariat is forced into economic organizations by the pressure of world capitalism. In various nations, Industrial Unionism, in itself a revolutionary labor structure, is in a state of forced formation. It is inevitable that industrial unity—solidarity—between the Industrial Unions of all countries shall be established and girdle the globe.

World Labor shall establish a world industrial administration with a directive body of workers for efficient service to all mankind. The world proletariat shall crush its enemy, without and within: break its rusty chains and establish real freedom—Industrial Freedom.

The lesson of the Bolsheviki and the road to power of the I. W. W. are before you. The former, an example of the possibility of the "impossibilism." Under different conditions than the I. W. W., the Bolsheviki took on tremendous odds by attempting to establish an industrial administration practically born out of military mutiny.

But America's strongest element is the wage-working class. Scientifically organized labor is the efficient and bloodless weapon of the proletariat in its accomplishment of industrial revolution: and, at the same time, it is "the structure of the new society within the shell of the old."

No lives need be lost, not one drop of blood need be shed, if the working class will rally to the I. W. W. with its program of peaceful evolution from wage-slavery to industrial Freedom. Will you respond and do your share for your own freedom?

FULL PAGE ADVERTISEMENT FROM NEWSPAPER "THE BUTTE DAILY BULLETIN"

"YOU, TOO!"

Down with capitalism! Down with the system which is founded on robbery! Down with the system that robs us in the factories, mills and mines, and bleeds us to death on its bloody battlefields! Down with an order that has the ethics of capital—the morals of profit ideals; of legal plunder! Down with it! It came covered with blood and dirt; it will go out covered with dirt and blood. Down it! Down it forever!

Capitalism means the land and natural resources are owned by the landlords and capitalist rulers who work not, but live by robbery which they call rent and interest.

Capitalism means that the mills, factories, and railroads, are owned and controlled by the capitalists and used for the further robbery of the working class.

Capitalism means that all the machines of production and distribution are capital-owned by the capitalist, because they are not used for the production of useful things for all humanity, but are only used for production for exchange—for profit.

Capitalism means that you, the working class, have to ask the capitalist class for a job, and when they give you one, you produce surplus value for them, which in turn means that you are robbed every day you work of about four-fifths of what you produce, or even more.

Capitalism means riches for the few; luxury for the idle; monkey suppers for the indolent and debauched, whilst poverty, cruel-biting poverty, for the many.

Capitalism means classes—the capitalist class and the working class. These classes can not be abolished as long as the capitalism exists, for they were brought in and will remain in existence through the very nature of capitalism.

The capitalist class are very few, but they rob the many of hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of wealth each year.

The working class are many, and they, through the medium of machine production, produce abundance, but they hunger and want because the capitalist class rob them of the fruits of their toil.

The capitalist class can not consume all of the values that the working class produce, even though they dress poodle dogs in silken shirts, and eat themselves to bursting.

The working class only consume that which their wages will buy back, which means about one-fifth; therefore, the markets become glutted.

The capitalist class will only run their factories, mills, and mines when they can get the desired amount of profit; therefore, the working class are thrown out of employment when they have stocked the warehouses of the master class full and flooded the market with the products of their toil.

The capitalist compete with one another in the sale of the commodities that their various wage-slaves have produced, and they have wars with one another.

The working class fight these wars, although they have nothing to sell but their labor power.

The capitalists also compete with one another for world financial domination—in other words, for who shall do the most robbing of the wage slaves. But the capitalists throughout the world unite to crush any attempt on the part of the workers to put a stop to the robbery.

The working class children are robbed in the mills; their sisters beaten into prostitution; their brothers slaughtered in capitalist bloodfests, their fathers bled white that users may grow round and fat.

The capitalist class and the working class have nothing in common.

The capitalist class and the working class are in a fight to death.

The capitalist class and the working class are divided as masters and slaves.

The class struggle—the war between the capitalist class and the working class is now reaching the final battle. The working class is lining up in Europe under the banner of the international proletariat. The Imperialists are now in the depth of their cunning schemes to rip the life out of the glorious Socialist Republic of Russia—to drown in blood the revolution of Central Europe.

The working class of all countries must unite and down this brutal cunning, robbing capitalist class.

The working class must act as a class. Fight en masse. Class-action and mass-action are the same.

Are you with us, fellow-workers? This is a call from your mates in the factory—your comrades in oppression.

Are you a coward or a red-blooded rebel? If you are a cowardly cur: then do your master's bidding, help him to crush your class; stab the whitened bosom of your sisters and wives and hold your children in the hell of capitalist slavery.

If you are a rebel and hate your master's bloody, greedy rule, then arouse your fellow-workers to action. Raise your banner high. The day is here. Push back the tyrants. Rip their hypocritical masks from the faces made horrible by their greed. Down with them, you sons of freedom!

No compromise! No reforming slavery! No more red herrings and sops to quiet our voices!

Down with capitalism! All power to the working class! We have nothing to lose but our chains; we have a world to gain!

Come on you sons of toil—be you an artisan in the factory or a worker at the plough! Come on! Down with capitalism! Up with the glorious commonwealth of the workers! Come on!

Victory to the working class; down with capitalism. Workers' Council of Butte. (Paid advertisement.)

EXTRACTS FROM NEWSPAPER "DEFENSE NEWS BULLETIN" CHICAGO.

* * * * *

Wait not to be backed by numbers. Wait not until you are sure of an echo from the crowd. The fewer the voices on the side of truth the more distinguished strong and distinct must be your own.

WORKERS OF AMERICA, AWAKEN.

Justice should be the surest the most available and impartial thing obtainable from the courts for man. But alas in America at least, it has become an expensive luxury. It does not take a scholar or a student of any sort to realize that the common, average man of the street has very little respect for the law as it is administered in the Courts of the United States of America today.

* * * * *

We awakened self-confidence and lit the fire of enthusiasm in the hearts of millions upon millions of workers of all countries. We sent broadcast the clarion call of the international working class revolution. We challenged the imperialism plunderers of all countries. * * *

EXTRACTS FROM PAMPHLET ENTITLED "THE LABOR DEFENDER," DECEMBER 1, 1918.

* * * * *

A mass-meeting of ten thousand people in Chicago, November 17th, cheered for the red flag and the Bolsheviki, denounced foreign intervention in Russian affairs and demanded the "immediate annulment of all sentences against champions of the working class who have been subjected to trial and imprisonment under the pretense of war necessity.

* * * * *

SUCCESSFUL REVOLUTIONS.

A successful revolutionary uprising cannot come as a bolt from the clear blue sky. Mere dissatisfaction with existing conditions, no matter how violently it may be expressed, cannot be successful in its initial onslaught, nor can it remedy the conditions that were the cause of its outbreak. Such a revolt may have the effect of merely overthrowing one class of oppressors in favor of another. It cannot do away with economic oppression, because the oppressed and rebellious class is not prepared to assume control over its own destinies.

Only when the masses have become inculcated with an intense spirit of class solidarity, only when there has been created within them an indomitable confidence in their own powers, can they hope to reap the fruits of the great revolutionary struggle.—Ludwig Lore.

* * * * *

STINGERETTES.

They thought they'd get the Stars and Stripes into Berlin first, but the red flag beat them to it!

EXTRACTS FROM NEWSPAPER "THE INDUSTRIAL UNIONIST" SEATTLE, WASH., JANUARY 25, 1919.

NOTICE TO BULGARIAN FELLOW WORKERS.

Other I. W. W. Papers Please Copy.

Your attention is called to the fact that a new Bulgarian paper has been placed in the field. The name of this new propaganda medium is "Probuda" and the first issue will be off the press on Jan. 20th. All Bulgarian Fellow Workers should immediately decide how many copies of this paper they can handle and write in for subscription books and bundle orders. If every one of us does his share it will only be a short time until this paper is on a solid foundation. Every new language paper that is put in the field is one more blow struck at the citadel of capitalism. We, the Bulgarian fellow workers of Seattle ask that everybody interested will get in and boost for the new paper. The class war is spreading from Europe all over the world and to prepare for our part in the coming crisis we must have a strong working class press. The address of the new paper is Probuda, 1001 Madison St., Chicago.

FROM THE LABOR DEFENDER.

CHANGE OF NAME.

With the next issue of this paper, we shall change the name to The Rebel Worker.

The time has come to drop the defensive and go back to the good old I. W. W. doctrine of offensive tactics—offensive to the masters and to all their tools, including the lickspittle editors, smug-voiced preachers and vote-hunting politicians. There is a new spirit throughout the organization. We have learned that the best defense is aggressive organization and education. Come out of your holes, fellow workers, and get on the firing line.

* * * * *

CHINESE I. W. W. ORGANIZE IN NEW YORK.

Just before Christmas, a Chinese branch of the I. W. W. was started in New York City among restaurant and laundry workers, with an initial membership of seventy-five. They have applied to Chicago headquarters for a charter and intend to start a Chinese paper. Their headquarters are at 33 Mott Street, apartment 19. The bosses' secret association have offered their professional gunmen $500 reward if they will "get" the Chinese worker who has put this across.

* * * * *

Among the organizations actively affiliated in the new Workers Defense Union of New York is the Syndicate of Chinese Workers.

* * * * *

TWO NEW I. W. W. PAPERS.

The Finnish I. W. W. members in New York have just started a Finnish paper entitled Loukkataistelu ("The Class Struggle"). The price is 25c. per copy. The publication office is at 58 E. 123rd Street, New York. We urge all Finnish Fellow workers to jump in vigorously and help establish this newest addition to the list of I. W. W. foreign language papers.

We have received the following letter regarding the publication of a new Jewish revolutionary papers and ask that all Jewish speaking rebels in the northwest comply with the request contained in it.

* * * * *

FELLOW WORKER: The Jewish speaking members of the I. W. W. in New York organized into a Jewish Speaking Publishing Association have decided to publish a Jewish papers which will be devoted to the propagation of Revolutionary Industrial Unionism. We will soon announce the name of the paper and request all Fellow Workers interested to send us articles, correspondence job news, etc. All mail should be addressed to the following temporary address.

ZINA BENDER, 27 E. 4th St., N. Y.

Watch these columns for further announcements.

EXTRACTS FROM NEWSPAPER "THE INDUSTRIAL UNIONIST" OF JANUARY 1, 1919, SEATTLE, WASHINGTON.

WE DO NOT DEFEND; WE ACCUSE.

Ever since the time the United States entered the world war the servants of the capitalist class have used the pretext of patriotism to wage a bitter civil war against all the liberal forces in this country, with particular attention to the Industrial Workers of the World. As a consequence, the sections of the working class on whom the brunt of these capitalist attacks have fallen have been obliged to spend considerable time in answering false accusations and in trying to keep the record clear in the public eye. These conditions made it necessary for the I. W. W. to issue various Defense Bulletins and to fight on the defensive most of the time.

Right from the start it should be understood that this paper is not a Defense Bulletin. It is an Offense Bulletin. We propose to carry the fight into the camp of the enemy and to wage a war against the intrenched institutions of as worthless a class as has ever been recorded in history.

If it be a crime to contrive to be dangerous to a class which has made a mockery of the lives of the useful producers, a class whose position is based upon the slavery and degradation of the vast majority of mankind, a class which has its foundations in an enforced prostitution of the minds and bodies of men and women and which has even sunk so low as to flaunt a tinsel pomp and power created from the labor of babies in industries and sanctioned by the Supreme Court, then we must plead guilty from the outset and confess that we glory in our actions.

Even were we to admit the obviously false and accept the idea that the I. W. W. has been guilty of all the things charged against it in the kept press of the employers, still would the record of the capitalist class of America and of the world be so black by comparison as to give the I. W. W. just reason for pride.

The sordid history of the ruling class does not make nice reading. It contains a record of adulterated food, shoddy materials furnished to the government and to the private purchasers, of faultily constructed bridges, of sawdust life preservers, of inflammable fire curtains, or purposely defective arms, ammunition, aeroplanes and army equipment, of unsafe mines, of coffin ships, and child labor, of robbery, murder, and rapine, and of international gambling with the lives of helpless humans as stakes in the game. And the fact that the peoples of other countries have already risen or are rising and the gathering of the storm clouds in this country are proof that this worthless class has grossly mismanaged society.

So we do not defend; we accuse. Tho we know that the answer may be the torch or the rope or the jail from those whose reign is based on brute force instead of logic, still we do accuse. With full knowledge of all it entails, we, the indicted, herewith launch the Industrial Unionist as a weekly indictment of the capitalist class.

EXTRACTS FROM NEWSPAPER "THE NEW SOLIDARITY" OF JANUARY 18, 1919, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

AMERICAN UNIT OF INTERNATIONAL.

Superior, Wisc.—The Workers Council idea is sweeping Duluth and Superior like wild-fire. All the Socialists, with the exception of the Finnish Local in Superior which out-yellows the yellows, have joined forces with the Woblies to create what we hope will become the American unit of the Red International. Soon the Council will make a drive to line up the Red minorities in the craft unions.

The constitution of the Council states: "Its object shall be to prepare the working class of this territory for the social revolution, that is, to demand that the capitalist class surrender unconditionally the ownership of the means of production and distribution to the industrially organized workers, and the reconstruction of society on the basis of the dictatorship of the proletariat.

"This Council is prepared to use whatever methods and tactics may seem from time to time most effective to accomplish its purpose. Its conception of the new society and the way to attain it is identical with that of our comrades, the Bolsheviki of Russia, the Spartacus Group of Germany, and groups with similar purposes in every country."

* * * * *

CROCODILE TEARS.

Great sobs well up from the heart of the American press about the "Red Terror" in Russia. Sorrow has been shed because of the killing of a few business men and army tyrants, but nothing said about the "white terror" of those same business men and army tyrants.

But sometimes a stray note slips thru that gives a glimpse of the facts. Such a glimpse is afforded by three photos that are reproduced in the "Star" of Rockford, Ill. The statement that goes with the photos is as follows:

These photographs by Dr. Harold Nattwig, chief of the Norwegian Red Cross brigade accompanying White Guard troops in Finland, were taken one immediately after the other.

No. 1 shows a firing squad immediately after a salvo. The troopers are straining forward to see the results of their marksmanship on 16 Red Guards.

No. 2 shows those reached by bullets in various stages of collapse.

In No. 3 an officer is using his revolver to finish those not thoroughly done for by the firing squad.

Note the vitality of one whose remaining life breath makes a white stream from the mouth.

The White Guard executed after the method shown in these photos, upwards of 10,000.

Such information as has been possible to get from Russia points to the fact that no one was executed by the "Red Terror" except they had first been tried and proven guilty. The facts as proven with regard to the "White Terror" is that thousands were executed for no other reason than that they were workers who were supposed to be in favor of equality and freedom for all. Where the Bolsheviki slew their thousands, the imperialists have slain their tens of thousands.

EXTRACTS FROM "STRIKE BULLETIN"—SHIPBUILDERS INDUSTRIAL UNION No. 325
OF THE I. W. W.—SEATTLE, WASHINGTON, JAN. 25, 1919.

* * *. Any labor strike that ever occurred or ever will occur regardless of its proportions was and is direct action. Therefore direct action is not something new. We may say, however, with more or less truth, that its great value as an abstract force—a modern force—has dawned upon the working class in recent years. Its great possibilities are as yet not fully conceived by the workers in general. Its final expression is the General Strike. The general strike if well organized and universal will bring the situation to such a point that a new system may be placed in operation without bloodshed.

* * * * *

THE PROLETARIAT.

[By Laura Payne Emerson.]

Crushed by the weight of Church and state
And driven by hunger's pain,
Lean and gaunt from toil and want
They are rising their rights to gain.
And the church says: "Here our brothers dear
Of you we are very fond,
Through preacher and pope realize your hope
In the land of the great beyond.

The vultures of state both small and great
Good shepherds of the herd would be Come rally around our platform profound,
Support us and you shall be free.
In the halls of fame give us a name
And your cause we'll ably plead;
We'll pass just law for your noble cause
And to all your wants take heed.

So the siren's song through centuries long
Has silenced the crowd, alas!
While in serpent fold slimy and cold
Has struggled the working class.
And for reverence for law and the Gods that be
They are given the club and gun;
Their blood soaks down through the groaning ground,
And their cause seems far from won.

Arise! ye slaves, in tumultuous waves;
Break barrier, bond and creed;
The power you can wield on industrial field
Is the only savior you need.
You feed the world, you clothe the world,
You fashion, and form, and make;
Reach forth your hand o'er the pulsing land,
It is yours, reach forth and take.

Let those play the game of political shame
Who have nothing in common with you.
On your own strength recline and in mill, shop and mine,
Build a structure substantial and true—
The social regime of the idealist's dream
You'll shape from the forces that be;
And from church and state, murder and hate,
The earth shall at last be free.

EXTRACT FROM "THE INDUSTRIAL UNION BULLETIN" NOV. 15, 1918, SEATTLE DISTRICT.

What we, as revolutionary industrial unionists, ardently desire is that the workers of Germany continue their rebellion until every autocrat in that country is either wiped out or set to do some useful work, and that the victorious German workers then throw their energies into the fight against the enemies of the revolutionary movement in Russia, Finland, and other countries, to the end that the working class of the world be unified and be given new hope and redoubled determination to abolish once for all this damnable curse of wage slavery and to bring about a real and lasting world peace by the introduction of Industrial Democracy.

EXTRACT FROM "CAL. DEFENSE BULLETIN" OF JAN. 13, 1919, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

RUSSIA.

[By Robert M. La Follette.]

The Money Power of this country has been strong enough to defeat the will of the American people and control our Government for many years.

It was Woodrow Wilson who said in his New Freedom:

"The Government of the United States at present is the foster child of special interests. It is not allowed to have its own will."

The Special Interests that have defeated democracy in America are against democracy everywhere.

The most soul-sickening hypocrisy in all this harrowing time is the pretense of the interests and the Interest Press that their support of this war is prompted by the unselfish desire to "make the world safe for democracy."

Are they at last to be unmasked? Are they finally to unmask themselves, through their unrelenting hostility to the industrial democracy, which the Russian people amidst the havoc of revolution are slowly building up?

The following is a list of Industrial Unions of the I. W. W., as well as recruiting unions:

Bakery Workers Industrial Union.....	46
Marine Transport Workers of Atlantic.....	100
Marine Transport Workers of Great Lakes.....	200
Metal and Machinery Workers.....	300
Shipbuilders Industrial Union.....	325
Agricultural Workers.....	400
Oil Workers Industrial Union.....	450
Iron Miners.....	490
Lumber Workers Industrial Union.....	500
Construction Workers Industrial Union.....	573
Railroad Workers Industrial Union.....	600
Marine Transport Workers—Pacific.....	700
Metal Mine Workers.....	800
Coal Miners Industrial Union—Eastern.....	900
Coal Miners Industrial Union—Western.....	950
Textile Workers Industrial Union.....	1,000
	<hr/>
	8,334
General Recruiting Union.....
Detroit Recruiting Union.....	85
Minneapolis Recruiting Union.....	64
Fresno Recruiting Union.....	66
Salt Lake City Recruiting Union.....	69
Sacramento Recruiting Union.....	71
Stockton Recruiting Union.....	73
St. Louis Recruiting Union.....	84
Toledo Recruiting Union.....	86

Redding Recruiting Union-----	88
Oakland Recruiting Union-----	174
San Jose Recruiting Union-----	499
Omaha Recruiting Union-----	599
Los Angeles Recruiting Union-----	603
Denver Recruiting Union-----	614
Spokane Recruiting Union-----	222
San Francisco Recruiting Union, Latin Branch-----	173
New York Recruiting Union, Finnish Branch-----	599
Portland Recruiting Union-----	92
Sandusky Recruiting Union-----
Pocatello Recruiting Union-----
Kansas City Recruiting Union-----	61
Bisbee Recruiting Union-----	65
Seattle Recruiting Union-----	178
	<hr/> 4,567

EXTRACT FROM "INTERNATIONAL WEEKLY" SEATTLE, WASHINGTON, FRIDAY, JANUARY 24, 1919.

The rosy promise of "Freedom, for All, Forever," is dispelled before the reality of the bankruptcy of capitalism. The world may now be safe for democracy, of the soup-house variety, but that is small consolation to the people who have slaved and sacrificed for some vague thing they believed would guarantee happiness and prosperity to them.

When again the flabby-brained and looselipped orators of the capitalistic class come before the workers with their rosy promises they will hear the shout:

Ye are liars!

Your Democracy is a lie!

Your Freedom is a lie!

Your Prosperity is a lie!

Your Equality is a lie!

Your Humanity is a lie!

Your Liberty is a lie!

Your Religion is a lie!

Your Eternal Justice is a lie!

Your God is a lie!

Everything you praise, all that you eulogize and adore, is a lie!

EXTRACT FROM THE "INTERNATIONAL WEEKLY" NOV. 29, 1918, SEATTLE, WASH.

"FRENCH MEN O'WAR RESCUE RED BANNER OF INTERNATIONAL WORKING CLASS FROM SOLDIERS AND SAILORS IN NEW YORK CITY," BY ARFIPROLEWRITER.

It happened in New York City, as soon as the news of the signing of the armistice flashed through the world, instantaneously and spontaneously the workers burst forth in celebration. In groups of two, five, ten, fifty, hundreds, joining other groups, they marched the streets, while thousands thronged the sidewalks, doorways, roofs and fire escapes, carrying and making use of every means and device at their disposal and appropriate for the celebration.

A young girl stood waiving a red flag, when suddenly a group of soldiers and sailors sighting it, grabbed it away from her. Instantly, quicker than a flash, a group of French men o'war made for the soldiers and sailor, seized the red banner and unfurling it, high up, they proceeded proudly in defile, while quickly thousands of men, women and children joining the procession lead by the French men o'war carrying the red banner amidst the echoing cheering of the thousands that thronged the streets, marched down Fifth Avenue.

Thus the French men o'war, on the soil of the new world, demonstrated their loyalty to their class by rescuing the red banner of the international.—From Authority and reliable sources.

EXTRACT FROM "WORLD REPUBLIC" BULLETIN OF THE RISING LABOR COMMONWEALTHS—NEW YORK, 1918.

SAVE THE REVOLUTION IN RUSSIA BY SAVING IT IN AMERICA—BEST WAY TO KEEP RED FLAG FLYING IN EUROPE IS TO KEEP IT FLYING IN AMERICA—SUREST WAY TO HAUL DOWN THE SOCIALIST FLAG IN PETROGRAD IS TO LOWER IT IN NEW YORK.

* * * * *

Help the Bolsheviks of Russia, comrades, by standing your ground firmly in America. Build up the socialist party here. That is the best way to help Lenine and Trotsky. * * *—Extract from "The Labor Defender" Dec. 15, 1918, New York.

Every strike is a small revolution and a dress rehearsal for the big one.

EXTRACTS FROM THE "INTERNATIONAL WEEKLY" DEC. 20, 1918, SEATTLE, WASH.

SPARTACUS GROWS RAPIDLY IN GERMANY—PUBLIC SENTIMENT UNDERGOING REMARKABLY SWIFT CHANGE.

Berlin.—The Spartacus group thru its organ "Die Rote Fahne" (The Red Flag) has announced its platform as follows:

Revolutionary uprising of world masses; disarmament of police; seizure of all arms and ammunition; organization of workmen's military and red guard; the trial of Hohenzollern and military leaders; seizure of food supplies for the people's benefit; Soviets to replace existing legislature bodies with central Soviet as chief body; six hours to be the maximum working day; all real estate, banks, mines and large fortunes to be confiscated; government to control public utilities; confiscation of dynastic fortunes; cancellation of all war debts and war loans and the creation of a single Socialist republic.

The children are being organized by the Spartacus group and they are holding, carrying red flags and demanding the overthrow of the present government.

* * * * *

POLITICAL PRISONERS MUST BE RELEASED IMMEDIATELY—WORKING CLASS MUST UNITE TO SECURE FREEDOM OF THOUSANDS OF FELLOW WORKERS HELD IN CAPITALIST BASTILES—NOTHING TO BE EXPECTED FROM RULERS.

One of the first things the American government demanded in the armistice which ended the recent war was the immediate release of American prisoners in German prison camps.

And one of the first things that we should demand for the continuation of the war against our masters is the immediate release from the penitentiaries and prisons of this country of OUR prisoners, the prisoners of the class war, taken during the recent drive to make the world safe for democracy.

Into thousands of cells in hundreds of prisons thruout the land they have thrown those of us who incurred the displeasure of the upper classes, those of us who have had the courage to defy them openly, those of us who worked constantly for the freedom of our class from the hellish scourge of capitalism.

And are we now to desert them? Are we now to let them die in the hell-holes of our masters while serving sentences of five, ten and even thirty years? They who have sacrificed life itself that their class and our class might the sooner see the day of emancipation when all men shall be free, are we to leave them to their fate, solitary and unaided?

The working class must not allow its prisoners to stay in the hands of the enemy one day longer than necessary. Already Germany and Austria have freed their political prisoners. Liebknecht and Adler are free men even now, they who were convicted by the most autocratic governments on earth to sentences of two and four years for treason. Dozens of workingmen have been sentenced to twenty years in this country for declaring that the recent war was the outcome of capitalism. The sentences inflicted by the judges of this country put to shame Czarism's performances in its flower. The class juries of "peers" in America automatically preclude justice for workingmen.

What are you going to do about it?

Shall we bow and scrape before the government of the United States and humbly beg for the release of our prisoners? Shall we point out in decorous tones that this country should also be safe for democracy? What answer may we confidently expect if we do so?

All governments in bourgeois nations are merely the law and order committees of capitalism; to stifle the cry of the robbed while the robbers suck away life itself, to exterminate those who strive to abolish the damnable system of robbery, to safeguard the robbers in their loot. Expect nothing from the law and order committees. Expect everything from yourselves, and yourselves alone!

Emma Goldman is working in a prison factory turning out endless numbers of garments. Because her failing health does not allow her to turn the number required daily she is denied all touch with the outside world; no letters, books, or magazines. Louise Oliverau is completing the first year of a ten-year sentence. She also is denied even the small joy of receiving letters or books. Hundreds of men in the various penitentiaries because they refuse military service are chained to the walls of black dungeons for days at a stretch on a bread and water diet. That is what they are sacrificing for us. What are we willing to sacrifice for them?

There is nothing to gain by appealing to the government for release of these, our prisoners. It is futile to wear the skin off our knees in entreaties before Wilson. We must act!

Agitate! Expose the system which prates of democracy and Christianity and yet makes of the beautiful earth a living hell for the workers. Open the eyes of the dumbest workingman to the monstrosities being committed thruout the length and breadth of this land.

Organize! On the industrial and political field in effective organizations so that when the time comes you can arise and throw off the shackles that bind you to slavery and thus you will Emancipate! Not only the thousands of our prisoners who are living in death in the prison camps of our masters, but yourselves as well.

EXTRACT FROM "THE OHIO SOCIALIST" JAN. 22, 1919.

NEEDED RECONSTRUCTION IN PARTY PROPAGANDA.

Now that war time restrictions upon the use of print paper are removed, numerous Socialist publications of various degrees of usefulness to the movement are being launched by individual party members in all parts of the country. Without questioning in the slightest degree the sincerity or well meaning of these comrades in their desire to serve the great cause to the utmost of their ability, we wish to reiterate our oft-repeated statement that Private Control of the Party's Propaganda is Dead Wrong.

If there ever was a time when the welfare of the Socialist movement demanded party control of every avenue of propaganda, well organized, well financed and heartily supported by every member, that time is now. The welfare of the party, the course it must pursue in the great events of the immediate future, the questions it must meet and answer, the problems it must solve, all, demand unquestionably a party controlled press.

The Socialist movement should seek to establish enough activities to absorb the energies of every comrade who desires to serve the revolution. It should establish itself so firmly and formidably in the various propaganda and organization measures as to leave no room for individual and oftentimes injurious enterprises.

The acquisition of party owned daily, weekly and monthly publication of various types that will cover all the different phases of our propaganda are vitally necessary. This is the problem of the immediate future. Every comrade should give his earnest support to this forward movement. Let us prepare to take this step.

EXTRACTS FROM THE "INTERNATIONAL WEEKLY," JAN. 10, 1919, SEATTLE, WASHINGTON.

REVOLT LIKELY IN DOMINION OF CANADA.

Winnipeg.—The Socialists and revolutionists in Winnipeg are demanding the overthrow of the Canadian government and the establishment of a government similar to Russia's. Similar demands are going up from Labor all over the Dominion, from Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, Calgary, Edmonton, Fernie, Vancouver and Victoria.

In the course of a big meeting in Winnipeg, greetings were sent to the Bolsheviks and heartfelt wishes for a similar government in Canada were expressed. The meeting demanded the release of all political prisoners and the free expression of working class sentiments thru speakers and the press.

The government came in for hisses and jeers, also many of the prominent business of Winnipeg. The socialists declared that they should be out earning their daily bread as well as the men who are forced to dig ditches.

B. B. Russell, business agent of the metal trades workers and a prominent member of the Trades and Labor council, in making an appeal for the workers to demand the withdrawal of allied intervention in Russia, declared that a revolution was about to take place in Canada in which the workers would triumph and the capitalists would be in the same position as those in Russia. He stated that blood would be spilt in Canada the same as in Russia and Germany if the conditions which exist in Canada now are not bettered. "The blood, which is spilt in Canada," he declared, "will depend on the working class. We must have freedom of speech." He appealed strongly to the workers to establish the same form of government as has been established in Russia, so that they might have Russian democracy here. "The only way in which to prevent the coming revolution in Canada, he said, is for the government to establish a form of government, such as the Bolsheviks have already established in Russia and are now establishing in Germany. Capitalism is now defunct and must disappear from the face of the earth."

When Mr. Russell made reference in a sarcastic manner to "this great democratic Canada of our" jeers went up from the audience and hisses against the members of parliament.

PRAISES BOLSHEVIKI.

Alderman Queen acted as chairman of the meeting. He told the socialists present of the many advantages gained in Russia by the Bolshevik government and asked that the workers establish a like government in this country. He proclaimed that every person, capitalist included, should be earning his daily bread. "And those," he said, "who do not work daily for their allowance of bread should starve."

* * * * *

SPREAD OF BOLSHEVISM MEANS OVERTHROW OF CAPITALISM—WORKING CLASS RULE IN RUSSIA AND GERMANY—THREATEN END OF BOURGEOIS RULE IN ALL NATIONS.

At last we have forced International Capitalism to take the Defensive. For fifty years and more the revolutionists against the present intolerable economic system have been fighting, have been jailed, clubbed, starved, and killed; for fifty years and more we have been frankly on the defensive ourselves, rallying our forces and slowly gaining ground.

Hitherto we have been sneered at as "theorists", "faddists", and "dreamers." But our dreams have come only too true, our theories have been proved to be only too correct; Capitalism is now entering upon a definite international alliance against the menace of our growing strength.

We, the toilers, who have had nothing to lose but our chains, now control half the civilized earth; strongholds of capitalism have fallen beneath our blows; we are fast awakening with the sole purpose of overthrowing every bourgeois government on earth and establishing the Industrial Democracy, giving the earth and its products back to its owners and producers, the workers, the only useful class in society. Already our comrades the Bolsheviks have thrown off the imperialist shackles in Russia, our comrades in Germany, the Communists, have done likewise. Today the capitalist system in all Western Europe totters; tomorrow it will be overthrown and cast on the rubbish heap of ancient history.

The representatives of Capital are gathered in Paris not only to settle the past, the problems of the late unpleasantness across the water; they are gathered there to devise ways and means of staving off the spread of Socialism as long as possible by the creation of an international understanding and international unity of capitalist action against the militant workers.

But we are strong and cannot be staved off. There are actually at the present time a hundred million workers animated by the same ideal and acting for the same end, the establishing of the dictatorship of the proletariat. It has taken a world war to awaken the workers.

But the slaughter of 10,000,000 of our comrades has at least brought out to the dullest workingman the full meaning of Capitalism. It has been worth the price. The mask has been torn from Capitalism. There it stands, our One Big Enemy, ruthlessly killing us by the millions in wartime, pitilessly crushing out our lives by the millions in peace-time. Whether in peace or war it is equally hateful and there is nothing left for us to do but follow the example of our comrades in Russia and Germany and overthrow the whole capitalist system, root and branch, before it plunges the whole world into chaos.

From every industrial country of the earth come the premonitions of the great impending change. Within a year the workers of Italy will take the power into their own hands, France and Spain will follow shortly after. The workers on the Clydebank and in South Wales are leading the English movement. In our own country, the East Sides of our industrial hells which are dignified by the name of slums are stirring and who knows what may come of it? In Butte and Seattle definite preparations are under way for the creation of a workers' government which shall assume control when the time comes. Workingmen everywhere in America are beginning to realize that they are regarded as mere slaves, nothing more; that they are handled with less consideration than machines; that they have not a fundamental point of agreement with their employers and the system the employing class have built up for their subjection, and that there is no hope in reform, no hope in anything but the complete elimination of the present ruling class with its legal, judicial, religious and journalistic satellites.

The only course of action at present before the class-conscious workers is thru intensive propaganda in the shops, mills, mines and factories, in the union halls. Show your fellow workers the glaring inconsistencies of capitalism, how it deprives the worker of everything that means life and makes of him merely a machine slave with a mind and a body bound to the machine and its owner. Prove to him the fact that the working class and the employing class have nothing in common. Spread true information concerning the government of the workers in Russia and Germany, of the rising rebelliousness thruout the world.

Concentrate on propaganda, the spoken and the written word by mass meetings, propaganda weeklies, leaflets and pamphlets. Working together we can offset the poison gas of the capitalist newspapers for we bring a vital message to the worker whereas the press merely lies to him.

In due time then we can organize our own administration in embryo, develop it so that when the great crisis comes we can step in with a plan of action, united and daring thru our strength, establish the complete dictatorship of the proletariat and begin the real work of civilization, that of making life worth while, full of meaning and vitality to every useful member of society and thus end forever the damnable system of the leisure class and its slave class.

* * * * *

INTERNATIONAL FLAG OF FREEDOM.

[Tune: Star Spangled Banner.]

O, Comrades we see, the dawn of the day,
When our brothers in toil, redeem this our nation,
From ignorance and vice and war's desolation,
And this for our hope, it will lighten the way,
Then this flag, it will be, a sign we are free
And not stand for spoils on land and on sea
And the Bolshevik flag of freedom, the red flag will wave,
Over the home of the free, no longer a slave.

When we read the full tide of our hearts' fondest dream,
And our battles all won and our slave days are ended,
We will fling to the breeze this flag that has been
The emblem of right for which we have contended;
Then conquer we must, for our Cause it is just!
With courage undaunted we'll prove true to our trust,
And the Bolshevik flag of freedom, the world's flag of right
Will scatter the hosts of our masters in flight.

Three cheers for the flag, and a cheer for the Cause
 That gave it a place in the world's estimation
 In justice and truth we'll fashion our laws,
 And peace and goodwill will again bless our nation;
 Then hoist it on high, long may it fly—
 In this sign we will conquer or by it we will die;
 The international flag of freedom, the red flag will wave,
 When we shatter the chains from the hands of the slave.

—By J. A. ENGSTROM, A Seattle Yipsel.

* * * * *

WE DIFFER.

The Liberator for the current month makes "five immediate demands of our government". They are as follows: The right to speak; The right to know; Liberation of prisoners; Hands off Russia, and the end of organized libel thru the press.

We agree most heartily with the Liberator that these are demands on which the militant workingclass should unite. But we disagree with the Liberator in asking them of "our" government. If the Socialist theory of the class struggle means anything it means to begin with that bourgeois governments in no conceivable sense are "our" governments. They function purely as the law and order committees of capitalism.

Their nature being this, the foolishness of asking "our" governments for any concessions must be apparent. We should demand these five points and in addition the overthrow of capitalism not of "our" governments, but of ourselves. For it is upon our organized strength that we shall be emancipated and not thru any kindly condescension of the masters.

It is valuable, necessary, that we stress constantly these five immediate demands. If our actions and our strength become menacing, "our" governments will probably in the interests of their own prolongation be forced to accede to them. That will be a victory for us and will not delude the workers into thinking that "our" government is so interested in our welfare that it will grant our wishes if we only ask.

The last Soviet Congress sent the following message to the Workmen's, Soldiers' and Sailors' Council of Germany:

"Soldiers, Sailors and Workers: Do not drop the weapons from your hands. The safety of the revolution demands that with weapons in hand you take over the power and form a Workers' Soldiers' and Sailors' government under the leadership of Liebknecht. Don't be betrayed by promises of a Constitutional Assemblage."

* * * * *

A TROUBLED IDEALIST.

All is quiet in the voluptuous sleeping chamber of His Excellency in the Murat Mansion. The body servant has performed his offices and the great democrat reposes in the gilded gondola bed. The silken coverlets are tucked about him and the lights are low, but still he does not sleep. "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown."

* * * * *

Sleep comes not, nor does he want it, for sleep brings more alarming fears. Into his slumber there invariably steals the grewsome figure of the Bolshevik who cries "The World for the Workers!"

The Bolshevik is not lulled by the narcotic of His Excellency's Idealism. The Bolshevik cries "Away with the Imperialists. The World for the Workers!" The Bolsheviks declared long ago through their newspaper the Pravda that His Excellency represented the American Imperialism and they haven't succumbed to idealistic verbiage up to date. They want the goods.

His Excellency stirs uneasily in the gondola bed as he reflects on the latest news from Russia and Germany. The militant proletariat of Germany are driving their own parasitic "moderates" from the republican thrones in Germany. Worst of all the disturbing doctrine is rousing the proletariat of France, Italy and England and in his own country is assembling a mighty congress of workers to demand, not request, the freedom of the class war prisoners who were enchained by the great Idealist.

He stirs in distress and at last sinks exhausted into a troubled sleep in which he dreams that the Murat Mansion is in possession of the working class and the gondola bed is no more filled with the great idealist.

EXTRACTS FROM THE "INTERNATIONAL WEEKLY" JAN. 17, 1919, SEATTLE, WASHINGTON.

SEATTLE COSSACKS CELEBRATE THE ANNIVERSARY OF RUSSIA'S BLOODY SUNDAY BY BEATING WORKERS * * * SYSTEM MUST BE CHANGED.

* * * * *

Walker C. Smith addressed the crowd in the open air meeting. "Our system of government must be changed," declared Smith. "The sooner it changes the better. I would that it could change without bloodshed, but if not, the less bloodshed the better." * * *

CAPITALISM RIDING A HARD FALL.

Now there is a demand for a real political organization not merely a bal-loteering excuse, but an organization which shall understand the true significance of political action as all revolutionary action directed against the bourgeois State, the essence of Capitalism, and the means by which Capitalists, tho greatly inferior in numbers to the workers, keep them in subjection as slaves.

The workers are using mass action more and more and are perfecting their organization against the organization of Capitalism. The Revolution is on! Within the next ten years the most monumental changes in all human history will take place and the fourth decade of the twentieth century will see the Workers supreme over the earth and the products thereof to which they give value.

EXTRACT FROM "THE REVOLUTIONARY AGE" JAN. 4, 1919.

When the emptiness of victory is revealed, then the class struggle will flare up in the Allied countries. The old antagonisms of nation against nation will disappear and in their places will develop the antagonism of the class war. The year 1919, although it has been issued in to the ringing of bells proclaiming "peace on earth, good will to men," will not be a peaceful year. It will be a year fraught with perils, a year more momentous than any every witnessed in the history of mankind, and although its days will be stained with blood, the blood of brothers shed by brothers, though it may not, in itself, be a happy year, yet the historic watch-cry of the workers, swelling loud and strong, foretells that 1919 is a year pregnant with happiness for the workers of the world.

EXTRACTS FROM THE "INTERNATIONAL WEEKLY" DEC. 27, 1918, SEATTLE, WASH.

NICHOLAS LENINE SENDS MESSAGE TO WORKERS—LIBERATOR PUBLISHES LETTER TO REVOLUTIONARY PROLETARIAT OF AMERICA.

New York—Nikolai Lenin in a letter to the "revolutionary proletariat of America," declares that an international revolution is inevitable.

The letter, published in the January number of "The Liberator," formerly The Masses, was written in Moscow August 20, and was just admitted to the United States by the censor.

Lenine indicates the report that the Russian Bolsheviki plan to carry their doctrines into all countries not only is true, but has been uppermost in the minds of the Bolsheviki since their revolution in 1917. * * *

TO ALL THOSE WHO HAVE NO CHRISTMAS.

The International Weekly wishes in particular to extend a Merry Christmas to all the little children who work in mine or mill, to all the political prisoners, to all the prostitutes, to all those who had to accept the shame of charity rather than go hungry;—for these—for each one—for all the millions over the world—the International Weekly hopes that Christmas Day may be very happy.

And we hope that all you prostitutes feel grateful that you live in a country where each citizen has an equal opportunity and where womanhood is sacred; and we hope that all you thousands of little children who toil in factory or mill realize the greatness and unselfishness of our Government and especially the Supreme Court which permitted you to stay at work; and we hope that all you political prisoners are happy because you live in the land of liberty. To all of you we send our greetings.

EXTRACTS FROM THE "INTERNATIONAL WEEKLY" JAN. 3, 1919, SEATTLE, WASH.

SOCIALIST PARTY OF SEATTLE ADVOCATES ESTABLISHMENT OF WORKERS' COUNCIL TO ADMINISTER MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS.

The Socialist Party of Seattle in mass convention last Saturday evening, Dec. 28th, adopted a platform which will go down in the history of the Socialist movement as one of its original documents in the field of the municipal political activity. The cardinal feature of the new platform is the Workers' Council idea, which provides for the control of the machinery of municipal administration by an industrial government of class-conscious workers instead of as previously in all Socialist campaigns merely seeking to install Socialists in bourgeois councils where their activity is ham-stringed and nullified from the very start.

The Workers' Council idea is, of course, modelled very directly after the Russian method of municipal administration which has stood the strain of almost two years of feverish revolutionary change and remains to-day as the example of the successful form of working class administration, founded as it is not on the bourgeois conception of government, but on the conception of an administration controlled directly by the organized class-conscious workers and exclusively in their interests. Inherently is involved the idea of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the abolition of the influence and control of the employing class of government for them instead of for the workers.

Concrete plans have not yet been drawn up for the practical working out of the details of the Workers' Council idea to Seattle, but a committee will soon go to work on the problem guided by the necessity of applying the Russian ideas to the peculiar Seattle conditions, conditions which are similar in fact in all American cities.

The Socialist Party does not consider that it has a copyright on the idea and shall work in conjunction with class-conscious workers of Seattle whether they belong to the Socialist Party or other revolutionary unions and political bodies.

The platform reads as follows:

"We, the Socialist party of Seattle, in convention assembled, reaffirm our entire adherence to the revolutionary principles of international socialism. We reaffirm that there is a struggle between the two classes of society, the exploiters and the exploited, which can be ended only through the triumph of the only useful class in society, the working class, through the use of its political and industrial strength.

"We acclaim joyously the proletarian revolution of Russia and Germany and approve whole-heartedly of the principles involved in the dictatorship of the proletariat. We further hold that the organization of the Russian and German workers in the soviets is the truest and most direct form of working class organization and that it shines forth as a beacon to the workers of the world, demonstrating the truest form of democracy and the most efficient plan for a workers' state. Guided by the principles of revolutionary Socialism and the glorious example of our Russian and German comrades, we pledge the Socialist party of Seattle and its candidates to the following program for the municipal election of 1919:

"ELECTION PROGRAM.

"1. The creation of a city government similar to the soviet plan—an industrial government of the workers which will eliminate bourgeois control and disfranchise the useless members of society.

"2. We propose the immediate establishment of a workers' council.

"(a) This workers' council shall sit alongside of the bourgeois government till the time when the workers shall take over the government.

"(b) The workers' council shall throw a searchlight over the acts of the present city government from the workers point of view.

"(c) It shall draw up legislation on the same subjects that come before the bourgeois city government:—and also draw up legislation on matters of working class interest never considered at all by a capitalist government.

"(d) Thus it shall reveal to the workers the class nature of all bourgeois governments and the futility of the workers' hoping for any material benefit from any bourgeois government, and prepare for the organization against the time when the workers shall seize power.

"3. The immediate expropriation of the public utilities of the city of Seattle now privately owned without remuneration to the present owners, and the control of utilities directly by the workers.

"4. Absolute freedom of speech, press and assemblage.

"5. We advocate militant industrial unionism as the only correct form of organization on the industrial field, and pledge ourselves to constant support thereof."

* * * * *

The Capitalist Press is screaming in seven column headlines about a little incident which has thrown the timid autocrats of Philadelphia into terror. Bomb explosions have damaged the homes of the President of the Chamber of Commerce, the acting head of the police system, and a Supreme Court Justice in the city of brotherly love.

The hysterical denunciations and assumptions that "Russian Soviets," "Anarchists," etc., tried a little direct action against the henchmen of the plutocracy take up so much space in the accounts that they had but little room for the facts of the explosion, as is usual in such prostituted journalism.

* * * * *

Strange that any one should have protested with bombs at the ultra slavery in this ultra American city, Philadelphia, where wages are below and political corruption is above, the American standard;

It will be still stranger when instead of an individual attempting to destroy the homes of the masters, the workers in mass take over the wealth of the parasites for the use of the disinherited of the earth.

The World for the Workers! Hasten the day!

* * * * *

THE RED FLAG AND "DEMOCRACY."

"The Red Flag must be wiped off of this democratic earth if democracy shall survive," said Charley Schwab of Bethlehem fame. The occasion was a banquet, an intellectual feast it would seem, at which the Red Flag was the favorite theme of discussion. In obedience to the wishes of the American King of Steel, Mayer Hylan shortly after approved of the anti-Red Flag ordinance for New York City.

To all of which we solemnly say Amen. For it is very true that if democracy is to be preserved in this land of the free the Red Flag must be wiped out of existence. The two are antagonistic.

When Lenine and Trotsky and the other Russian revolutionists were hunting around for a name for the Bolshevik party, they selected not the word "Socialist" but the word "Communist." For Socialism in Europe at any rate has become thoroly identified with social-patriotism and reform. The majority Socialist parties of France, Germany, and Austria accepted the war. In fact thru opportunism the majority parties had actually become a part of the State and the Government and only small but energetic minorities stood the ground of real Socialism. The word "Socialist" became discredited as the synonym of the political expression of the revolutionary movement. The Russians and the Finns were forced to cast about for a new word, as Marx and Engels were in 1848, and they both selected the word "Communist" as their party name.

In this country of course a like stigma has not become attached to the word because the Socialist Parties adopted a less compromising platform of revolutionary Socialism. Now we will come back to our discussion of democracy.

The same twisting of the meaning of a word is observable in the wornout shibboleth of 'democracy.' It has been appropriated body and soul by the bourgeoisie. Their most infamous laws are passed in the interests of 'democracy' their most wicked crimes are always whitewashed with 'democracy,' their imperialistic wars are always waged for 'democracy.' They cheerfully invade countries whose system of government does not agree with their own with the lie of 'democracy' on their lips; they are attempting to crush out the revolutionary movement of the working class and its symbol, the Red Flag under the guise of 'democracy.' The predominance of the exploiting class is bound up entirely with 'democracy.'

We do not need to find another word for 'Socialism' in this country but we must certainly wipe out the word 'democracy' from our vocabulary. Instead of 'democracy' the 'dictatorship of the proletariat,' that is our only immediate demand. And Charley Schwab is certainly right when he says that the Red Flag and 'democracy' are incompatible and we go him one better when we declare that not the Red Flag but the sham bourgeois democracy of capitalism must go.

EXTRACTS FROM "THE WASHINGTON TIMES" FEB. 10, 1919, WASHINGTON, D. C.

That this country, its self-satisfied newspaper writers and statesmen, may have seriously misunderstood and underestimated the work that is going on in Russia is indicated by two Russian photographs published in the New York Times yesterday.

One shows Russian fighters now ruling Russia and recently pursuing allied troops, including our own, through the swamps in the north. The Times puts this line under that photograph:

"Flower of the Bolshevik army, all well armed, many of them veteran troops of the old Russian regime, marching through the streets of Moscow."

The photograph is so different from the usual pictures of Russian troops in old days that you look at it in wonder.

Under the Czar, troop photographs showed men marching sullenly and obediently to be shot, not knowing why. The Times' photograph of Bolshevik Troops shows men alert, intelligent, keenly interested.

The faces are those of men that know why they are fighting, want to fight, and mean to win. You can imagine such faces in the revolutionary army of France that carried victory everywhere—and gave Napoleon his reputation, when he got hold of them.

If the Bolsheviks have many such troops as The Times photograph shows, look out for such an army. It will not be beaten easily. Given the right leaders it will not be beaten at all—as long as it stays at home and fights for home.

Another photograph, published by the Times, carries this line below it.

"Muscovite boys and girls are taught by the Bolsheviks in free classes of instruction to handle the rifle skillfully as a requirement for graduation."

The photograph shows two long lines of boys and girls of the high school age, one row kneeling, the second standing back of it. All have rifles leveled and evidently know how to hold and use them. The faces are concentrated, keen, full of force. The young women, especially, have a look that seems to say "I mean it." * * *

HEADLINES FROM "THE AMERICAN BOLSHEVIK" JANUARY 17, 1919, MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., VOL. 1, No. 4.

Bolsheviks Gave Land and Factories to Workers Says Williams—Noted Correspondent explodes Lies Told About Soviet Government.

Need of Bolshevism in This Country Shown by War Board Hearings—Prosperity Bubble Exploded by Federal Investigators.

Forty-six I. W. W. Convicted in Judicial Farce at Sacramento—Accused of Everything from Murder Up and Down.

EXTRACTS FROM "THE LIBERATOR" MARCH 1918.

Surely the demands of the "I. W. W.," are just. It is right that the creators of wealth should own what they create. When shall we learn that we are related one to the other; that we are members of one body; that injury to one is injury to all? Until the spirit of love for our fellowworkers, regardless of race, color, creed or sex, shall fill the world, until the great mass of the people shall be filled with a sense of responsibility for each other's welfare, social justice cannot be attained, and there can never be lasting peace upon earth.

EXTRACTS FROM "THE LIBERATOR" FOR JUNE 1918.

* * * The world, fed with lies by the capitalistic press, conceives the proletarian republic as an inchoate jumble of disorganization and tyranny, where anarchists, drunken soldiers and German agents dance a destructive bacchanal.

* * * * *
The greater number of suppressions of newspapers resulted from their violation of the Bolshevik law making advertisements a Government monopoly; other papers were shut down for printing, in time of civil strife, lies (such as the widely heralded rape of the Women's Regiment in the Winter Palace), which incited frantic people to bloodshed on the streets; and still others, with a small bourgeois constituency and a large endowment, were put out of business because the newspapers of the proletarian parties, with their enormous public, needed the paper and the printing shops * * *.

As for the arrests, only those persons who were proved to be involved in plots of armed counter-revolution, those who were caught grafting, those who were responsible for the dissemination of lies, and the most active members of the old Provisional Government, were imprisoned . . . Most of the officials of the Cadet Party, for example, which was declared "enemy of the people," are still at large. The "middle" and "right" Socialist leaders, Lieber, Dan, Gotz, Tsereteli, Skobelev and Tchernov, whose opposition to the Bolsheviks went to the bitterest ends, are still (or were when I last heard from Russia) at liberty to write, plot and make speeches to huge audiences denouncing the Bolsheviks to their hearts' content . . . Breshkovskaya is not arrested, Plechanov is not arrested, Tchaikowsky—he who rose in the Railway Workers' Convention in January and announced that the old-time Terrorist tactics against the Bolsheviks would be resorted to—is not arrested.

The stories about bloodshed are of course ridiculously false.

In the November days, ten Bolsheviks were killed in the attack on the Winter Palace, and not one of the defenders who were simply disarmed and allowed to go home. In the various struggles of the next week, perhaps twenty junkers lost their lives. In the fighting against Kerensky, hundreds of Red Guards were killed and an insignificant number of Cossacks. In Moscow, where the fighting was bitterest, of the eight hundred that died, about five hundred and fifty were Bolsheviks. The attack on the peaceful demonstrations for the Constituent Assembly, in which several people were shot by Red Guards, aroused such a protest among the Petrograd workers that its effect was felt seriously in the elections to the Petrograd Soviet. And when a band of irresponsible madmen killed Shingariov and Kokoshkin in prison, Lenin himself had them remorselessly hunted down and punished, with the full approval of the revolutionary masses.

* * * * *
It has taught me three things:

That in the last analysis the property-owning class is loyal only to its property.

That the property-owning class will never readily compromise with the working-class.

That the masses of the workers are capable not only of great dreams, but that they have in them the power to make dreams come true.

EXTRACTS FROM "THE LIBERATOR" FOR SEPTEMBER 1918.

Think, for instance, of the difference between all the concrete elements of the situation Lenin confronted and mastered during the period of agitation against the pseudo-Socialist régime of Kerensky, the period of rebellion, the insurrectionary capture of power in the capital, and the present period of arduous far-reaching labor at the construction of a new world. Nothing is the same now, except the ultimate end and the bare outline of the method of thought. All the sensations, emotions—of the pleasures—involved in “being a Socialist” are changed. And yet Lenin proceeds with his relentless, unsentimental iron-minded pragmatic thinking and acting in this new situation, and still writes his wise, patient, reiterative articles to the Russian people, as though to children, pleading with them to be philosophic and to understand the difference between these different periods, and the emotions that belong to them, and give all their mind's attention to the definition of the present problems, and all their heart's energies to the kind of action that is demanded now for the achievement of the ultimate purpose upon which they are all agreed.

* * * * *

At present it has become the central problem. We, the Bolshevik party, have convinced Russia. We have won Russia from the rich for the poor, from the exploiters for the toilers.

We have defeated the bourgeoisie, but they are not yet destroyed and not even completely conquered. We must therefore resort to a new and higher form of the struggle with the bourgeoisie; we must turn from the very simple problem of continuing the expropriation of the capitalists to the more complex and difficult problem—the problem of creating conditions under which the bourgeois could neither exist nor come anew into existence.

ARTICLE IN “THE LIBERATOR” FOR OCTOBER 1918.

BREST-LITOVSK—A BRIGAND'S PEACE.

[By Nikolai Lenin.]

The history of mankind is today recording one of the greatest and most difficult crises, a crisis which has an enormous—we can say without the least exaggeration a world-wide—liberating significance. It is not surprising that at the most difficult points of such a crisis, when everywhere around us the old order is crumbling and falling apart with tumult and crash, and a new order is being born in indescribable torments—it is not surprising that some are becoming bewildered, some become victims of despair, and others, to escape from the bitter reality, are taking cover behind beautiful and enchanting phrases.

We have been forced, however, to see things clearly, as we pass through the sharp and painful experience of this most difficult crisis of history which turns the world from imperialism towards communistic revolution. In a few days we destroyed one of the oldest, most powerful, barbarous and cruel monarchies. In a few months we passed through a number of stages of compromise with the bourgeoisie and got over the petty bourgeois illusions, in the grip of which other countries have spent decades. In a few weeks we have overthrown the bourgeoisie and crushed her open resistance in civil war. We passed in a victorious and triumphant procession of Bolshevism from one end of an enormous country to the other. We aroused to freedom and independence the most humble sections of the toiling masses oppressed by czarism and the bourgeoisie. We introduced and firmly established the Soviet republic—a new type of state—infinitely higher and more democratic than the best of the bourgeois-parliamentary republics. We established the dictatorship of the proletariat, supported by the poorest peasantry, and have inaugurated a comprehensively planned system of Socialistic reform. We awakened self-confidence and kindled the fires of enthusiasm in the hearts of millions upon millions of workers of all countries. We sent broadcast the clarion call of the international working class revolution. We challenged the imperialistic plunderers of all countries.

And in a few days an imperialistic brigand knocked us down, attacking those who had no arms. He forced us to sign an incredibly oppressive and humiliating peace—a penalty for our daring to break away, even for as short a time as possible, from the iron grip of the imperialistic war. And the more threatening the spectre of a working class revolution in his own country rises before the brigand, the more furiously he oppresses and strangles and tears Russia to pieces.

We were compelled to sign a “Tilsit” peace. We must not deceive ourselves. We must have courage to face the unadorned bitter truth. We must realize in full to the very bottom, the abyss of defeat, partition, enslavement and humiliation into which we have been thrown. The clearer we understand this, the firmer, the more hardened and inflexible will become our will for liberation, our desire to arise anew from enslavement to independence, our firm determination to see at all costs, that Russia shall cease to be poor and weak, that she may become truly powerful and prosperous.

She can become so, for we still have left sufficient expanse and natural resources to supply all and everyone, if not with abundance, at least with sufficient means of subsistence. We have the material in the natural resources, in the supply of human energy, and in the splendid impetus which the creative spirit of the people has received through the great revolution, to create a really mighty and abundant Russia.

Russia will become so, provided she frees herself of all dejection and phrasemongering; provided she strains her every nerve and every muscle; provided she comes to understand that salvation is possible only on the road of the international Socialist revolution, which we have chosen. To move forward along this road, not becoming dejected in case of defeats, to lay, stone after stone, the firm foundation of a Socialist society, to work tirelessly to create discipline and self-discipline, to strengthen everywhere organization, order, efficiency, the harmonious cooperation of all the people's forces, universal accounting and control over production and distribution of products—such is the road towards the creation of military power and Socialist power.

It is unworthy of a true Socialist, if badly defeated, either to deny that fact or to become despondent. It is not true that we have no way out and that we can only choose between a "disgraceful" (from the standpoint of a feudal knight) death, which an oppressive peace is, and a "glorious" death in a hopeless battle. It is not true that we have betrayed our ideals or our friends when we signed the "Tilsit" peace. We have betrayed nothing and nobody, we have not sanctioned or covered any lie, we have not refused to aid any friend and comrade in misfortune in any way we could, or by any means at our disposal. A commander who leads into the interior the remnants of an army which is defeated or disorganized by a disorderly flight and who, if necessary, protects this retreat by a most humiliating and oppressive peace, is not betraying those parts of the army which he cannot help and which are cut off by the enemy. Such a commander is only doing his duty, he is choosing the only way to save what can still be saved, he is scorning adventures, telling the people the bitter truth, "yielding territory in order to win time," utilizing any, even the shortest respite in order to gather again his forces, and to give the army, which is affected by disintegration and demoralization, a chance to rest and recover.

We have signed a "Tilsit" peace. When Napoleon I forced Prussia in 1807 to accept the Tilsit peace, the conqueror had defeated all the German armies, occupied the capital and all the large cities, established his police, compelled the conquered to give him auxiliary corps in order to wage new wars of plunder, dismembered Germany, forming an alliance with some of the German states against other German states. And nevertheless, even after such a peace the German people were not subdued.

To any person able and willing to think, the example of the Tilsit peace (which was only one of the many oppressive and humiliating treaties forced upon the Germans in that epoch) shows clearly how childishly naïve is the thought that an oppressive peace is, under all circumstances, ruinous, and war the road of valor and salvation. The war epochs teach us that peace has in many cases in history served as a respite to gather strength for new battles. The Peace of Tilsit was the greatest humiliation of Germany and at the same time a turning point to the greatest national awakening. At that time the historical environment offered only one outlet for this awakening—a bourgeois state. At that time, over a hundred years ago, history was made by a handful of noblemen and small groups of bourgeois intellectuals, while the mass of workers and peasants were inactive and inert. Owing to this history at that time could crawl only with awful slowness.

Now capitalism has considerably raised the level of culture in general and of the culture of the masses in particular. The war has aroused the masses, awakened them by the unheard of horrors and sufferings. The war has given impetus to history and now it is moving along with the speed of a locomotive. History is now being independently made by millions and tens of millions of people. Capitalism has now become ripe for Socialism.

Thus, if Russia now moves—and it cannot be denied that she does move from the “Tilsit” peace to a national awakening, and to a great war for the fatherland—the issue of such an awakening is not the bourgeois state but the international Socialist revolution. We are “resistants” since November 7, 1917. We are for the “defense of our fatherland,” but the war for the fatherland towards which we are moving is a war for a Socialist fatherland, for Socialism, we being a part of the universal army for Socialism.

EXTRACT FROM “THE LIBERATOR,” NOVEMBER, 1918.

“It follows,” says Trotsky in a preface to one of his books, “that the time spent in prison and exile is about one-third of the time a Social-Democrat is active.” Reading that preface on my way west to attend the trial of Eugene Debs, I was struck by Trotsky’s unconscious assertion that the time spent in prison is part of the time that a Socialist is “active.” It is often the time that his influence is most active. And though the government may succeed in accelerating the immediate war program by imprisoning Debs, they will also accelerate the effect of his life-long service to the social revolution.

* * * * *

ON INTERVENTION IN RUSSIA.

[By John Reed.]

My point is, that the American people are misinformed about conditions in Europe, and especially in Russia, and that in the case of Russia our Government is acting upon false information. Moreover, people who are in a position to inform the public concerning the Russian situation are either ordered to keep silent, or, if they speak in public, arrested by the Department of Justice, and if they write in the press, barred from the mails by the Post Office Department.

* * * * *

The kind of Russian news usually fed the public is illustrated by the frequent newspaper reports stating that the Soviet Government has fallen, that Lenin and Trotsky have fled to Germany, and that chaos and anarchy are universal in Russia—statements which the very reports of the Allied commanders in Russia have again and again demonstrated to be false. An example of what I mean is the series of dispatches, supported by no competent evidence, stating that thousands of people, especially foreigners, are being massacred by the Bolsheviki. The uncertainty of the newspapers themselves concerning the real situation in Russia was strikingly shown the other day, for example, by a story in the New York Times about the wholesale killing of British, French and Americans; which was followed by another item to the effect that arrangements have been completed by the Soviet Government and the Government of Finland for the safe conduct of all foreigners who wish to leave Russia.

The gravity of the situation is intensified by the recent release for publication by the Committee on Public Information of a series of documents purporting to prove that the leaders of the Russian Soviet Government were in the pay of the Imperial German Government, and that their actions were directed from Berlin. The fact is, that the authenticity of many of these documents is very doubtful. And the documents have been in the hands of the United States Government for more than six months. Why were they not given out before this time? Or, more pertinently, why have they now been released? Was it to give color or excuse to an uninvited intervention in the affairs of a friendly people, and, moreover, a people which has appealed to us for help against Germany?

There is definite evidence now in the United States sufficient, I believe, to prove that the leaders of the Soviets have not been pro-German, but, on the contrary, if anything, pro-Ally. Strangely enough, this evidence is not allowed to reach the public. Colonel Raymond Robbins, former chief of the American Red Cross Mission to Russia and unofficial diplomatic agent of the United States Government in contact with the Russian Soviets, who has more information on the subject than any foreigner alive, has such evidence. So has Colonel William Boyce Thompson and Major Thomas Thacher—both of the Red Cross Mission. All these men have been ordered to remain silent.

I, myself, and certain other Americans, who have had the opportunity to observe closely the character and actions of the Soviet Government, have been shut up by the simple expedient of taking away all documents and corroborative papers which we brought back with us from Russia, on the pretext of "examination." Only those officials and correspondents who are opposed to the Soviets, for one reason or another, are allowed freely to speak or write their erroneous facts and their baseless opinions. * * *

But the point is that the Bolshevik revolution was a revolution against all imperialism, German imperialism included; and the Soviet Government was and still is the most powerful menace to Imperial Germany, and all it implies, in the world; and the Russian leaders, whatever the Germans may have thought they would do, have consistently labored to break up the German power, and to reorganize Russia industrially and in a military way, so as to turn again into open war the secret war they have been conducting so effectively.

I, myself, as well as several other Americans now in this country, can testify to this secret war and to its effects. I was employed by the Soviet Government, in the Commissariat of Foreign Affairs. Among other things, I assisted in the preparation of revolutionary propaganda to spread among the German troops and the German war-prisoners, and helped to get it to them. * * *

The outstanding and misunderstood fact of the matter is that the Soviet Republic, based on the dictatorship of the working class, and the expropriation of the properties classes, could not and cannot exist side by side with Imperial Germany; and even more so, Imperial Germany cannot hope to survive side by side with the Russian Soviets. It was to the interest of the Russian Soviets to enlist our aid in the destruction of their closest and most dangerous enemy. They attempted to do this—and we rejected their plea. But do not forget that it is also to the interest of Imperial Germany to prejudice the Allies against the Russian Soviets. And nothing can be so satisfactory to the Imperial German Government as Allied hostility to the Soviets, and Allied intervention in Russia, which might drive the Soviets, in sheer self-defense, desperately to seek an ally in Germany.

After all, the American people are entitled to know the real reasons for Allied intervention in Russia. The liberal European press—especially that of Great Britain—is outspoken in the opinion that it is dictated by the desire of the French Government to set up a Government in Russia which will guarantee the payment of Russian obligations, repudiated by the Soviets.

The American statement concerning intervention justifies military action in Russia upon the grounds that the Tchecho-Slovak troops—who were supposed to be leaving Russia by way of Siberia to join the Allied armies on the western front—were attacked by "armed German and Austrian war-prisoners."

Several months ago that same story of "armed German and Austrian war-prisoners in Siberia" reached Moscow, and at the request of Trotsky, members of the American and British military missions were given a special train to make an investigation of the charge. And they reported to their Governments that the story was without foundation. Other observers tell the same tale. * * *

But whatever the phrasing of intention the Governments of the Allies, our own included, stand sponsor to an expedition which has interfered with the political sovereignty of Russia, intervened in her internal affairs—even to the extent of supporting Governments hostile to the Soviet Government—and are considered by the Soviet Government to be waging war upon it. * * *

And thousands of Americans who really believe in freedom will some day want to know why America, instead of leading the liberal world, joined with those whose faces are set against the tides of history.

It is time that we knew the truth about Russia.

* * * * *

Last March the constitution of the Soviets was worked out in detail and applied universally.

It restricted the franchise to—

"Citizens of the Russian Socialist Republic of both sexes who shall have completed their eighteenth year by the day of election * * *

"All who have acquired the means of living through labor that is productive and useful to society and who are members of labor unions * * *

Excluded from the right to vote; employers of labor for profit; persons who lived on unearned increment; merchants and agents of private business; employees of religious communities; former members of the police and gendarmerie; the former ruling dynasty; the mentally deficient, the deaf and dumb; and those who had been punished for selfish and dishonorable misdemeanors.

* * * * *

Under the Soviet Government the wage system is retained as a necessary accommodation to the capitalist world, the machinery to abolish it being already in place, and the whole system being under the control of the workers themselves. Lenin has clear-sightedly stated that he considers the retention of capitalist forms a step backward, a temporary defeat for the Revolution, but which must be endured until the workers are self-organized and self-disciplined enough to compete with capitalist industry.

* * * * *

Not so. The Socialist state is not to be a return to primeval simplicity, but instead a system of society more efficient than the capitalist state. In Russia particularly the immediate task of the workers is to be able to compete with the pressure of foreign capital, as well as to supply Russia with necessities. What is true of Russia, moreover, is true of the workers of all countries. Only in no other country have the workers clear-sighted leaders like Lenin; in no other country are the workers so united and so conscious. And in Russia there are groups of industries, like the Ural mines, like the factories of Vladivostok, where Workers' Control has actually improved upon capitalist management. And do not forget that industry belongs to the workers—is run for the profit of the workers.

* * * * *

Across half the world we watch great Russia shake herself and take hold. In our ears sounds "the regular march of the iron battalions of the proletariat."

EXTRACT FROM "THE ADVANCING PROLETARIAT," FEBRUARY, 1917.

Two facts stand out prominently in an examination of modern society; 1st, the proletariat is the subject class, and 2nd, the special function of the state is to keep the proletariat in subjection. Therefore, any organization of the proletariat as a class must at once be considered a menace to the privileged classes and be declared illegal. All the activities of the proletariat furthering its program for a new society must necessarily be revolutionary and be beyond the "Law." Therefore, the Socialist Politician's "legal revolution" idea is regarded as absurd, by the proletariat; and since the proletariat realizes that all its forces must be closely coordinated and drilled in production and co-operation in order to function in the new society, the idea that the whole economic structure of this present society can be changed by going to the polls once every two or four years is especially absurd.

The proletariat makes no appeal to any but the wage working class, though it realizes that the growth of the Social Consciousness among all classes must bring thousands to its standard, whose immediate personal interests would be conserved by an opposite course. It realizes how great a task it is to persuade men against their material interests, and how small the chance is to secure a majority at the polls—a majority, helpless in its strength because undisciplined in cooperation and composed of potentially discordant elements. But more it realizes that the proletariat, operating the machinery of production and really in possession of the wealth of the world, is in a position to dictate the terms of life to all society, if it merely secures the consent and co-operation of the members of its own class. It proposes that the ballot box shall repose first in the Union hall, and then in the shop; and one needs only to function in industry to be a voter there. The recently landed immigrant, who has a "job," is equal to the descendant of the Pilgrim Fathers, who also works for bread.

The future society comes only at the desire and with the consent of the proletariat, for it is evidently the only class able to safeguard humanity by means of a new society; and the revolution can properly occur, only after the proletariat has had sufficient training in voluntary co-operation and self-government to be able to demonstrate its ability to successfully continue production and handle distribution so that all may be fed. Voting en masse at the polls is no evidence whatsoever of such ability, and to teach this class that its way to freedom lies primarily through the ballot box is a most miserable mis-education and paves the way to the most desperate catastrophe that humanity could ever suffer.

EXTRACT FROM PAMPHLET ENTITLED "THE NEW UNIONISM," BY ANDRE TRIDON.
(Fourth printing. Pp. 95-105.)

The spirit of industrial solidarity manifested by the miners spread among other organizations. In the fall of 1904 Isaac Cowen, American representative of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers of Great Britain; Clarence Smith, secretary and treasurer of the American Labor Union; Thomas J. Hagerty, editor of the "Voice of Labor," organ of the A. L. U.; George Estes, president of the United Brotherhood of Railway employees; W. L. Hall, general secretary of the Brotherhood, and Wm. E. Trautman, editor of the "Brauer Zeitung," organ of the United Brewery Workers of America, held a conference in Chicago. They invited thirty-six other men active in the labor movement to meet them in secret conference on January 2, 1905. Out of the thirty-six, only two, Max S. Hayes, editor of a trade union paper, and Victor Berger, editor of a socialist publication, declined to attend.

The conference met at the appointed time, selected William Dudley Haywood as chairman of its executive committee—the other members of the board being William E. Trautman, A. M. Simonds, W. L. Hall and Clarence Smith—and drew up a manifesto addressed to the Workers of the World. It set forth the disadvantages of pure and simple craft organization and advocated the forming of one single union admitting all workers regardless of craft or nationality.

The manifesto ended with a call for a convention to be held in Chicago on June 27. This document translated into several languages was widely circulated by the executive committee assisted by the American Labor Union and the Western Federation of Miners.

One hundred and eighty-six delegates met in Chicago, representing thirty-four State, district, local or national organizations.

The convention lasted twelve days and when it adjourned the Industrial Workers of the World had been organized. The labor groups admitted to affiliation were: the Western Federation of Miners with 27,000 members; the Socialist Trade and Labor Alliance, 1,450 members; the Punch Press Operators, 168 members; the United Metal Workers, 3,000 members; the Longshoremen's Union, 400 members; the American Labor Union, 16,500 members; the United Brotherhood of Railway Employees, 2,087 members.

The following preamble was adopted:

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until all the toilers come together on the political, as well as on the industrial field, and take and hold that which they produce by their labor through an economic organization of the working class, without affiliation with any political party.

The rapid gathering of wealth and the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands make the trade unions unable to cope with the ever-growing power of the employing class, because the trade unions foster a state of things which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. The trade unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These sad conditions can be changed and the interests of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries, if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

The uncertainties and the contradictions found in this preamble are easily understood when one bears in mind the heterogeneous elements which were represented at the first convention and whose divergent views had, to a certain extent, to be harmonized; parliamentary socialists, opportunists, Marxists, anarchists, industrialists, craft unionists. During the first year of the I. W. W.'s existence, those irreconcilable elements struggled bitterly for supremacy. The two socialist factions looked upon the I. W. W. as a convenient battle ground.

The I. W. W. survived this internal strife and began to issue a monthly organ, the "Industrial Worker." It also sent out the first call for the defense of Haywood, Moyer and Pettibone, the officers of the W. F. M. who had been arrested in connection with the assassination of Governor Steunenberg of Idaho.

The second convention met in September, 1906, with ninety-three delegates representing 60,000 workers. The struggle for control divided the convention into two factions: the reactionaries with the help of the chairman tried to obstruct the deliberation until such time as their opponents would be obliged to leave for their homes. The radicals succeeded in defeating these tactics but when the convention adjourned, the former officials seized the general headquarters and held them with the assistance of the police. The newly elected officers, abandoned to their fate by the Western Federation of Miners and the socialist party, had to open headquarters of their own. The W. F. M. finally withdrew its support from the usurpers who gave up the struggle. At the third convention, which was quite uneventful, it became evident that the socialist politicians who had remained within the organization were striving to use it in furtherance of their own ends. In 1908, however, at the fourth convention, the purely industrialist element secured control of the organization. The wording of the preamble was greatly modified and in its amended version that document reflected the revolutionary trend of the new leaders. The second paragraph was changed to read thus:

"Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system."

Finally two new paragraphs were added to the preamble:

"Instead of the conservative motto, 'A fair day's wages for a fair day's work,' we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, 'Abolition of the wage system.'"

"It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the every-day struggle with capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old."

The defeated politicians immediately organized another I. W. W. committed to a parliamentary policy. It stands at present in the same relation to the first I. W. W. as the Socialist Labor Party stands to the Socialist Party. It is little more than a name and has not played any part in the labor disputes which have since arisen.

At the first convention of the I. W. W. it was generally agreed that industrial unionism was to be primarily a departmental structure. The original constitution provided for thirteen departments. This system appeared impracticable and as the purely industrialist view was beginning to dominate the membership it was more and more definitely recognized that the New Unionism should organize from below upward. In other words, the local industrial union, not the department, was to be the basis of organization. The discussions relative to departments taking place at the various conventions have only had a tentative, almost academic character.

We quote the following from a pamphlet "The I. W. W., Its History, structure and methods" by Vincent St. John, who is, at present, general secretary of the organization:

GENERAL OUTLINE.

1. The unit of organization is the Local Industrial Union. The local industrial union embraces all of the workers of a given industry in a given city, town or district.
2. All local industrial unions of the same industry are combined into a National Industrial Union with jurisdiction over the entire industry.
3. National industrial unions of closely allied industries are combined into Departmental Organizations. For example, all national industrial unions engaged in the production of Food Products and in handling them would be combined into the Department of Food Products. Steam, Air, Water and Land national divisions of the Transportation Industry, form the Transportation Department.
4. The Industrial Departments are combined into the General Organization, which in turn is to be an integral part of a like International Organization; and through the international organization establish solidarity and co-operation between the workers of all countries.

SUBDIVISIONS.

Taking into consideration the technical differences that exist within the different departments of the industries, and the needs where large numbers of workers are employed, the local industrial union is branched to meet these requirements.

1. Language branches, so that the workers can conduct the affairs of the organization in the language they are most familiar with.

2. Shop branches, so that the workers of each shop control the conditions that directly affect them.

3. Department branches in large industries, to simplify and systematize the business of the organization.

4. District branches, to enable members to attend meetings of the union without having to travel too great a distance. These branches are only necessary in the large cities and big industries where the industry covers large areas.

5. District Councils, in order that every given industrial district shall have complete industrial solidarity among the workers in all industries of such district, as well as among the workers of each industry. The Industrial District Council combines all the local industrial unions of the district. Through it concerted action is maintained for its district.

FUNCTIONS OF BRANCHES.

Branches of an industrial local deal with the employer only through the Industrial Union. Thus, while the workers in each branch determine the conditions that directly affect them, they act in concert with all the workers through the industrial union.

As the knowledge of the English language becomes more general, the language branches will disappear.

The development of machine production will also gradually eliminate the branches based on technical knowledge, or skill.

The constant development and concentration of the ownership and control of industry will be met by a like concentration of the number of industrial unions and industrial departments. It is meant that the organization at all times shall conform to the needs of the hour and eventually furnish the union through which and by which the organized workers will be able to determine the amount of food, clothing, shelter, education and amusement necessary to satisfy the wants of the workers.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE ORGANIZATION.

Local unions have full charge of all their local affairs; elect their own officers; determine their pay; and also the amount of dues collected by the local from the membership. The general organization, however, does not allow any local to charge over $1.00 per month dues or $5.00 initiation fee.

Each branch of a local industrial union elects a delegate or delegates to the central committee of the local industrial union. This central committee is the administrative body of the local industrial union. Officers of the branches consist of secretary, treasurer, chairman and trustees.

Officers of the local industrial union consist of secretary and treasurer, chairman and trustees.

Each local industrial union within a given district elects a delegate or delegates to the district council. The district council has as officers a secretary-treasurer and trustees. The officers of the district council are elected by the delegates thereof.

All officers in local bodies are elected by referendum vote of all the membership involved, except those of the district council.

Proportional representation does not prevail in the delegations of the branches and to district councils. Each branch and local has the same number of delegates. Each delegate casts one vote.

National industrial unions hold annual conventions. Delegates from each local of the national union cast a vote based upon the membership of the local that they represent.

The national industrial union nominates the candidates for officers at the convention, and the three nominees receiving the highest votes at the convention are sent to all the membership to be voted upon in selecting the officers.

The officers of the national unions consist of secretary and treasurer, and executive board. Each national union elects delegates to the department to which it belongs. The same procedure is followed in electing delegates as in electing officers.

Industrial departments hold conventions and nominate the delegates that are elected to the general convention. Delegates to the general convention nominate candidates for the offices of the general organization which are a General Secretary-Treasurer, and a General Organizer. These general officers are elected by the vote of the entire organization.

The General Executive Board is composed of one member from each Industrial Department and is selected by the membership of the department.

General conventions are held annually at present.

The rule in determining the wages of the officers of all parts of the organization is, to pay the officers who are needed approximately the same wages they would receive when employed in the industry in which they work. The wages of the general secretary and the general organizer are each $90.00 per month.

Concerning the methods of the Industrial Workers of the World Vincent St. John expresses himself as follows:

As a revolutionary organization the Industrial Workers of the World aims to use any and all tactics that will get the results sought with the least expenditure of time and energy. The tactics used are determined solely by the power of the organization to make good in their use. The question of "right" and "wrong" does not concern us.

No terms made with an employer are final. All peace so long as the wage system lasts, is but an armed truce. At any favorable opportunity the struggle for more control of industry is renewed.

The Industrial Workers realize that the day of successful long strikes is past. Under all ordinary circumstances a strike that is not won in four to six weeks cannot be won by remaining out longer. In trustified industry the employer can better afford to fight one strike that lasts six months than he can six strikes that take place in that period.

The organization does not allow any part to enter into time contracts with the employers. It aims where strikes are used, to paralyze all branches of the industry involved, when the employers can least afford a cessation of work—during the busy season and when there are rush orders to be filled.

The Industrial Workers of the World maintains that nothing will be conceded by the employers except that which we have the power to take and hold by the strength of our organization. Therefore we seek no agreements with the employers.

Failing to force concessions from the employers by the strike, work is resumed and "sabotage" is used to force the employers to concede the demands of the workers.

The great progress made in machine production results in an ever increasing army of unemployed. To counteract this the Industrial Workers of the World aims to establish the shorter work day, and to slow up the working pace, thus compelling the employment of more and more workers.

To facilitate the work of the organization large initiation fees and dues are prohibited by the I. W. W.

During strikes the works are closely picketed and every effort made to keep the employers from getting workers into the shops. All supplies are cut off from strike-bound shops. All shipments are refused or missent, delayed and lost if possible. Strike breakers are also isolated to the full extent of the power of the organization. Interference by the government is resented by open violation of the government's orders, going to jail en masse, causing expense to the tax-payers, which is but another name for the employing class.

In short, the I. W. W. advocates the use of militant "direct action" tactics to the full extent of our power to make good.

EXTRACTS FROM "A LETTER TO AMERICAN WORKMEN" BY N. LENIN.

[Reprinted from "The Class Struggle" December 1918.]

The American working class will not follow the lead of its bourgeoisie. It will go with us against the bourgeoisie. The whole history of the American people gives me this confidence, this conviction. I recall with pride the words of one of the best loved leaders of the American proletariat, Eugene V. Debs, who said in the "Appeal to Reason" at the end of 1915, when it was still a socialist paper, in an article entitled "Why Should I Fight?" that he would rather be shot than vote for war credits to support the present criminal and reactionary war, that he knows only one war that is sanctified and justified from the standpoint of the proletariat; the war against the capitalist class, the war for the liberation of mankind from wage slavery. I am not surprised that this fearless man was thrown into prison by the American bourgeoisie. Let them brutalize true internationalists, the real representatives of the revolutionary proletariat. The greater the bitterness and brutality they sow, the nearer is the day of the victorious proletarian revolution.

* * * * *

But the proletariat, even now, in the midst of the horrors of war, is learning the great truth that all revolutions teach, the truth that has been handed down to us by our best teachers, the founders of modern Socialism. From them we have learned that a successful revolution is inconceivable unless it breaks the resistance of the exploiting class. When the workers and the laboring peasants took hold of the powers of state, it became our duty to quell the resistance of the exploiting class. We are proud that we have done it, that we are doing it. We only regret that we did not do it, at the beginning, with sufficient firmness and decision.

* * * * *

Let the corrupt bourgeoisie press trumpet every mistake that is made by our Revolution out into the world. We are not afraid of our mistakes. The beginning of the revolution has not sanctified humanity. It is not to be expected that the working classes who have been exploited and forcibly held down by the clutches of want, of ignorance and degradation for centuries should conduct its revolution without mistakes. The dead body of bourgeoisie society cannot simply be put into a coffin and buried. It rots in our midst, poisons the air we breathe, pollutes our lives, clings to the new, the fresh, the living with a thousand threads and tendrils of old customs, of death and decay.

* * * * *

While the old bourgeoisie democratic constitutions, for instance, proclaimed formal equality and the right of free assemblage, the constitution of the Soviet Republic repudiates the hypocrisy of a formal equality of all human beings. When the bourgeoisie republicans overturned feudal thrones, they did not recognize the rules of formal equality of monarchists. Since we here are concerned with the task of overthrowing the bourgeoisie, only fools or traitors will insist on the formal equality of the bourgeoisie. The right of free assemblage is not worth an iota to the workman and to the peasant when all better meeting places are in the hands of the bourgeoisie. Our Soviets have taken over all usable buildings in the cities and towns out of the hands of the rich and have placed them at the disposal of the workmen and peasants for meeting and organization purposes. That is how our right of assemblage looks—for the workers. That is the meaning and content of our Soviet, of our socialist constitution.

And for this reason we are all firmly convinced that the Soviet Republic, whatever misfortune may still lie in store for it, is unconquerable.

EXTRACTS FROM "THE CLASS STRUGGLE" NOVEMBER-DECEMBER 1917.

* * * * *

9. Shall a Constituent Assembly be called?

* * * * *

D. Yes, and as soon as possible. Yet, to be successful and to be really convoked, one condition is necessary: increase the number and strengthen the power of the Councils of W. S. and P. Delegates; organize and arm the masses. Only thus can the Assembly be assured.

10. Does the state need a police of the conventional type and a standing army?

* * * * *

D. Absolutely unnecessary. Immediately and unconditionally universal arming of the people shall be introduced so that they and the militia and the army shall be an integral whole. Capitalists must pay the workers for their days of service in the militia.

* * * * *

14. In favor of this war or against it?

* * * * *

D. Absolutely opposed to all imperialist wars, to all bourgeois governments which wage them, among them our own Provisional Government; absolutely opposed to "revolutionary defense" in Russia.

* * * * *

Until the revolutionary class in Russia shall have taken over the entire authority of the Government, our party will consistently support those proletarian parties and groups in foreign countries as are already, during the continuance of the war, fighting against their imperialist governments and their bourgeoisies. Particularly, the party will encourage any incipient fraternalization of masses of soldiers of all the belligerent countries, at the front, with the object of transforming this vague and instinctive expression of the solidarity of the oppressed into a class-conscious movement, with as much organization as is feasible, for the taking over of all the powers of government in all the belligerent countries by the revolutionary proletariat.

EXTRACT FROM "THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIALIST REVIEW" FOR JULY, 1917.

"The Russian working class has shattered Tsarism and secured a democratic republic, the introduction of popular government. And we? Should we continue to bear patiently the old misery, the exploitation, hunger and slaughter—the cause of all our wretchedness? No! A thousand times no!

"Leave your workshops and factories. Let work be at a standstill. Man of Labor: Awake and recognize your power.

"All wheels stand still when your strong arm wills it so. Down with the war. Down with the Government. Peace. Liberty. Bread."

EXTRACTS FROM "THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIALIST REVIEW" FOR AUGUST 1917.

THE NEW MORALITY.

The new morality says:

Damn interest!

Damn rent!

Damn profits!

Damn agreements!

* * * * *

The power must be taken out of the policeman's club!

How?

Anyhow!

Why?

Because it hurts our class and is therefore immoral.

The guns mustn't point our way if they aren't spiked, because they are liable to go off and hurt us and that would be immoral.

So we must spike the guns or turn them round. Anyhow, and because it hurts our class and is immoral.

If we go on strike we must strike quickly, sudden and certainly. Don't give the boss time to think or prepare plans. He might get the better of us and that would be bad for us and immoral.

Strike when he has a big order which he must fulfil. It will hurt him more and us less and that is moral.

Tie up the industries in town all the industries in all the towns, in the whole country, or in the whole world if necessary. The strike will end quicker and we will starve less and that's good for us, and therefore moral.

HOW TO WIN.

Don't let the strike eat up your funds. That's bad for you and immoral.

But let it cost the boss a bit. His power consists of the things he owns and if he owns less his power will be less. His weakness is your strength and is good for you—therefore moral.

A bolt taken out of a machine may be a big help in a strike, even if the bolt is buried in a hole six inches deep.

Innocence is sometimes a crime! See capitalist courts sentence innocent workingmen and discharge guilty capitalists.

To step out on strike and starve is foolish If you can strike on the job and eat. Striking on the job means, doing such a thing—i. e. anything—that will compel the boss to do what you think is the fair thing. If you win it's good for you and therefore moral, however many little things belonging to the boss disappears, or however little work you might do.

Pat from Erin's Isle got a job once to the surprise of his friend.

"So you're working Pat?" asked the friend.

"Hold yer whist, man" said Pat, "I'm just fooling the boss. Sure! I've bin carrying the same hod of bricks up and down the ladder all day, and the boss thinks I'm wurrrking."

Pat may have been working but he knew how to get one on the boss.

* * * * *

Don't strike for more than you have a right to demand.

You have a right to demand all you have power to enforce.

GENERAL STRIKE OR?

The profiteers have made millions out of the ships the workers built. Now they refuse these workers a living wage. They have forced thirty-thousand men to go on strike.

All the profiteering employers of Seattle are banded together in their Employers' Association. All have a common interest in driving the shipyard workers back to slave conditions and smashing their labor organization, The Metal Trades.

The allied bosses want to smash the shipyard workers now so that they can have a free hand to smash the rest of the union men of Seattle later on.

These profiteers hate all unionism. They hate the longshoremen, the street car men, the electrical workers, the men of the building trades, the restaurant workers and all others as much as they hate the Metal Trades organization that is conducting this strike.

They want to eat labor piece meal. First the shipyard workers, then the others. So they can make this an open shop town and cut wages.

Divide and conquer is the motto of the bosses.

But we have a better motto. It is together we win!

If sixty thousand union men and women of Seattle go out on a general strike the bosses will cry for mercy. Capital is helpless without labor. The business interests cannot afford a general strike. And we cannot afford to see our shipyard brothers beaten, because our turn would come next.

A million workers on the Pacific Coast are ready to fall in line behind Seattle. We will show them a magnificent example of solidarity.

All together in the general strike.

Together we win! By solidarity.

LEAFLET FROM "INTERNATIONAL WORKERS' DEFENSE LEAGUE", SEATTLE, WASH.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS!

You Workers who were loyal to the Nation and were selected as physically fit to wear the Uniform, Will You Be As Loyal To Yourselfs and to the other Workers when you come back into the ranks of Labor and don the overalls?

Will you who offered your bodies and your lives to put down Political Autocracy in Europe, line up with the Workers to put down Industrial Autocracy in America? Will you who were called from the ranks of the workers for a time to make the World safe for Democracy come back into the ranks of Labor and help make the United States safe for Tom Mooney and Billings and safe for all who work in the interest of the toiling masses.

Political Democracy is an empty dream unless we have economic security.

The Courts have failed to give Justice to Our fighters in the Industrial conflict. You who have been or are now Soldiers and Sailors, will you be with us when you become Workers again?

It took solidarity of the Nations to win the European War, it will take Solidarity of the Workers to win our Economic Freedom.

When we use our economic strength and go out on strike to secure Justice for our Champions or conditions for ourselves don't take a job until we all go back together. Line Up With Us For Industrial Democracy The One Thing Necessary To Make The World Safe For The Workers.

A CHALLENGE TO THE INTELLIGENCE OF THE WORKERS

has been expressed by the industrial barons of America in the incarceration of the workers in the jails, because they have stood up for the interests of the working class. What do you intend to do about it? Other countries have released their political prisoners.

"Germany has declared amnesty for all her political prisoners and Liebknecht is free; Austria has done the same for her political prisoners and Adler is no longer in jail. Bulgaria has declared political amnesty, and the man who was given life imprisonment for anti war work is now the head of the government. Will you see that this is done here?

This country more than any other has boasted of making the world safe for democracy and men and women are languishing in jail for no other reason than expressing their opinions and refusing submission.

Remember that the resentment to the yoke is the intelligent expression of thinking people. Are you going to stifle this expression of intelligence by being dumb and inactive, or will you work for your class?

"We demand that each soldier and sailor discharged from the service of the Nation for which they offered their lives be given at least $300 to rehabilitate themselves and that all incomes of $5000 and over from whatever source derived, be taxed to reimburse the Government.

INTERNATIONAL WORKERS' DEFENSE LEAGUE
P. O. Box 86, Seattle, Wash.

EXTRACT FROM LEAFLET HEADED "STRIKERS" (SEATTLE, WASH., 1/20/19).

You have built the ships for your boss. Why not build them for yourselves? Why not own and control, thru your unions, Your jobs and Your shipyards? Why not dictate yourselves the number of hours you should work, the conditions under which you work, the pay you should receive for your labor?

The workers of Russia did it. Why not you? They refused to be starved by the capitalist class and when the capitalists refused to meet their conditions they took over themselves the industries and operated and managed them in the interest not of the parasitical capitalists but of the workers.

You are the majority and the class conscious workers of America are with you. It is up to you.

The world for the workers!

YOUNG MEN

are you going to refuse to register for military service in a foreign country while the rich men who have brought on this war stay at home and get richer by gambling in food stuffs?

We would rather die, or be imprisoned, for the sake of justice, than kill our fellow men in this unjust war.

(Signed) YOUNG MEN'S ANTI-MILITARIST LEAGUE.

EXTRACT FROM LEAFLET HEADED "MEN OF THE ARMY FAREWELL!"

You were put in the army, it has been stated, to fight for "democracy and freedom." Don't you think it is time for you to realize the fact that you are not free and that it is up to you to line up with your class and help it to fight and win industrial freedom right here in the United States?

EXTRACT FROM LEAFLET "AMERICAN WORKERS."

If you workers do not want this, you must begin right now to organize for a general strike to tie up all industry. Then, if the capitalists persist, if they still refuse to listen to the voice of reason and will not permit the peaceful process of reorganization of industry upon the basis of common ownership and administration, use the clenched fist of Labor to strike them down. Truly Marx was right when he said, "Capitalism came into the world covered with blood and dirt and so will it go out."

Workingmen and workingwomen, organize—organize so as to have the power to stop capitalists reaction. Organize for the Social Revolution!! Down with Capitalism—long live the Industrial Commonwealth!!!

 NO CONSCRIPTION!

Conscription has now become a fact in this country. It took England fully 18 months after she engaged in the war to impose compulsory military service on her people. It was left for "free" America to pass a conscription bill six weeks after she declared war against Germany.

What becomes of the patriotic boast of America to have entered the European war in behalf of the principle of democracy? But that is not all. Every country in Europe has recognized the right of conscientious objectors—of men who refuse to engage in war on the ground that they are opposed to taking life. Yet this democratic country makes no such provision for those who will not commit murder at the behest of the war profiteers. Thus the "land of the free and the home of the brave" is ready to coerce free men into the military yoke.

No one to whom the fundamental principle of liberty and justice is more than an idle phrase, can help realize that the patriotic clap-trap now shouted by press, pulpit and the authorities, betrays a desperate effort of the ruling class in this country to throw sand in the eyes of the masses and to blind them to the real issue confronting them. That issue is the Prussianizing of America so as to destroy whatever few liberties the people have achieved through an incessant struggle of many years.

Already all labor protective laws have been abrogated, which means that while husbands, fathers and sons are butchered on the battlefield, the women and children will be exploited in our industrial bastiles to the heat's content of the American patriots for gain and power.

Freedom of speech, of press and assembly is about to be thrown upon the dungheap of political guarantees. But crime of all crimes, the flower of the country is to be forced into murder whether or not they believe in war or in the efficacy of saving democracy in Europe by the destruction of democracy at home.

Liberty of conscious is the most fundamental of all human rights, the pivot of all progress. No man may be deprived of it without losing every vestige of freedom of thought and action. In these days when every principles and conception of democracy and individual liberty is being cast overboard under the protest of democratizing Germany, it behooves every liberty-loving man and woman to insist on his or her right of individual choice in the ordering of his life and actions.

We oppose conscription because we are internationalists, anti-militarists, and opposed to all wars waged by capitalistic governments.

We will fight for what we choose to fight for; we will never fight simply because we are ordered to fight.

We believe that the militarization of America is an evil that far outweighs, in its anti-social and anti-lebertarian effects, any good that may come from America's participation in the war.

We will resist conscription by every means in our power, and we will sustain those who, for similar reasons, refuse to be conscripted.

Don't register. Organize meetings. Resist conscription.

We consider this campaign of the utmost importance at the present time. Amid hateful, cowardly silence, a powerful voice and an all-embracing love are necessary to make the living dead shiver.

THE WORKERS.

PORTLAND, ME., May 1917.

Feb. 3, 1919

The following is a copy of an Anarchistic poster which recently appeared simultaneously all over New England:

GO-HEAD!

The senil fossils ruling the United States see red!

Smelling their destruction, they have decided to check the storm by passing the Deportation law affecting all foreign radicals.

We, the American Anarchists, do not protest, for it is futile to waste any energy on feeble mided creatures led by His Majesty Phonograph Wilson.

Do not think that only foreigners are anarchists, we are a great number right here at home.

Deportation will not stop the storm from reaching these shores. The storm is within and very soon will leap and crash and annihilate you in blood and fire.

You have shown no pity to us! We will do likewise.

And deport us! We will dynamite you!

Either deport us or free all!

THE AMERICAN ANARCHISTS.

ORGANIZING OUR PROPAGANDA.

[The Industrial Union Bulletin, Seattle District (I. W. W.) November 29, 1918, issue.]

What methods can be used to reach an increasing mass of workers and to teach them the meaning of the social revolution and how to bring it about.

As to what methods have been tried and proved a success we may say the best has been the concentration of forces upon industry thru group and mass movements. * * *

To arouse this fighting spirit against capitalism, to get workers to show by their actions they understand that the "employing class and the working class have nothing in common" is of the greatest importance in the class war. Group and mass movements best do this. People in groups or masses feel more their strength, are emboldened to think and act more boldly.

Mainly thru the fighting groups to develop mass movements to start with localities and industries and to spread to the entire working class. * * *

The first thing is to secure recruits who will do the education and organization work.

As a means to the end of reaching the great mass of workers we suggest union schools to teach speakers, organizers and delegates. These can teach the history of the labor movement and also how to properly transact the business. * * *

Our propaganda needs to be organized to reach every job, every industrial plant, every labor union, the socialists, whole cities and the rural districts.

* * * We should take the lead in all struggles of the workers * * * pointing out to them the necessity of organizing themselves to take possession of the land and machinery of production.

Fellow workers, unless the writer is very badly mistaken, (he believes from observation of events, from what is passing thru the crowd) that big things are just ahead. Don't you think it is time for all rebels to get into line and equip our propaganda and throw our enthusiasm and knowledge into the problem of educating and organizing the workers for victory?

* * * * *

In a circular letter issued by Frederick A. Blossom, New York City, in which he solicits subscriptions to "The Labor Defender," an I. W. W. publication, published by the New York Defense Committee of the I. W. W. (of which Louis Ratnofsky is secretary), at #74 St. Marks Place, New York, N. Y., he uses the following language:

The "shock of peace" is coming. The end of the war will be the beginning of a bitter industrial conflict. * * * The workers, more awake than heretofore to their rights and their power, will resist to the utmost.

The struggle will be fierce and far-reaching.

ELORE, HUNGARIAN DAILY, NEW YORK CITY.

[Issue November 18, 1918.]

The latest events have brought to the working class the best opportunity to take the direction of the fate of the world into its own hands. * * *

However, rule and power of systems and classes have never been ended without fighting. * * *

In middle and Eastern Europe thrones are collapsing, countries fall apart, new formations and groups are brought forth, the revolutionary flag is waving from industrial headquarters of socialist Republics, peoples and countries come into the stream of a healthy, inspiring socialism, world-events occur every minute, but the working masses of the A. F. of L. and all those who, with one strong strike of the arm, could sweep away these corrupt and old-fashioned organizations of America, stand where they were standing before the war, still bowing down before hired agents (of capitalism) like meek scabs.

In Europe fights and revolutions go on, workers are liberated and new systems are instituted: in America the working class, with Gompers and his henchmen at its head, puts its hand upon the stomach and lays down to beg.

Are we really so far away from old Europe that these fattened lackeys and servants of capitalism can even hold back the breeze of revolution. We cannot believe it, as there are thousands of workers moving already and they will start a stronger movement as soon as larger masses can be convinced that there can be no peace between capital and labor, only fighting, until labor will win, like in the greater parts of Europe.

Comrade Beill and Pengaska * * * pointed out to the necessity of the revolutionary endeavors without compromise.

Comrade Becker spoke about the nearness of the revolution, what forces to be implied and sacrificing work.—They all agreed that the time of action has arrived, that we are on the threshold of the creation of a socialist society.

The struggle between the capitalist system and the liberation of the workers is started, we stand before terrible battles, but we must not stop in the fight until all over the world industrial freedom, the freedom of the working class is established, which is not only a liberty satisfied through words, but it is the real liberty of all humanity.

[Elore, Hungarian Daily, New York City, issue Nov. 11, 1918—National Edition.]

In the midst of Europe, in the very heart of the blood soaked old world, new lifegiving, magnificent fires are aflame and their glowing light sheds a new, red dawn upon the horizon of the desolate dark countries.

The revolution of peace reached the very spot which was the nest of the war. The revolution of peace murmurs upon the soil of Kiel, Hamburg, Berlin, Schleswig-Holstein and upon the shores of the Baltic Sea, and the German workers, sailors and soldiers will take care that this revolution realizes with the liberation of the German workers peace also. The earthquake beats already the waves of the sea which will call to action the groping millions of the workers everywhere where the double-minded autocrats hiding behind fake democracy are still ruling and want to keep their rule longer.

Peace! Mighty interests, gigantic powers, economies and influences are frightened by this short word. Revolutionary peace! Upon these words turn with a raging growl the classes anxious for their power and in despair of their very existence. Because for those who wish to extinguish the ghost hunting, flaring flame of the red torchlight by cutting off the muscular arm holding the torch, peace is not yet timely, they do not wish peace yet.

There will be peace, revolution will establish it.

THE REQUEST OF AN INTERNED HUNGARIAN.

The following letter arrived from Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., to the Editor of the Elore:

"Arriving here from Hot Springs, I inform you that there are several Hungarians here, among whom there are many of our comrades. These were greatly pleased when I handed them the paper, which we read now in common, and we thank you jointly for the same."

Typical reader?

LEADING THE PARADE.

Worker's Councils, composed of Socialists, trade unionists and industrial unionists have been formed in Butte, Duluth and many other cities. A Soldiers' and Workers' Council has been organized by the Metal Trades Section of Seattle unionists. Socialist Party locals are voicing their support of the Russian Socialist Soviet Republic by speech and pamphlet. Overflow meetings are being held in all large cities at which demands are made for amnesty for all political prisoners and for withdrawal of troops from Russia.

The Ohio Socialist, Official Organ of the Socialist parties of Ohio, Kentucky, Virginia, W. Virginia and New Mexico. Cleveland, Ohio, January 29, 1919, page 3, col. 1.

The following is a translation of a Hungarian Socialist circular recently distributed in the United States:

PROCLAMATION.

To the American-Hungarian workmen:

At the climax of civilization humanity has been covered with blood-shed through the 4½ years war. It seemed as if everything would go to pieces that humanity has built up by hard labor. It seemed that the cannon-roars was the mortal music of humanity. In despair we ask whether this is a reality or is it only a feverish dream? Will labor ever be cursed to shed either its sweat or blood for the overlords? Was the internationalism of labor only a dream? Now after many years of pain and suffering behold the oppressed rise, one after the other to break the chains and to take the world into their possession. The Internationalism of labor has come back to life with renewed force. The proletariat arose to open the way for the new civilization. What was only a desire yesterday becomes a fact today. From the ocean of blood victoriously arises the red flag of socialism. The laboring class has started to fulfill its historic mission.

SOCIALISM VS. CAPITALISM.

The history of mankind represents an unbroken chain of class-war. The patricians and plebeians of Rome, the aristocrats and serfs of feudal times, its guildmasters and apprentices, the capitalist and the wage-slaves of our own times in one word the great classes of oppressors and the oppressed have always, sometimes openly, and sometimes under cover stood as foes against each other. The class which was the owner of the tools necessary for the production of commodities was ever the lord and exploiter of the producers of commodities. The battle of the exploited was hopeless until they recognized the fact that the seizure of the means of production and making them common property will put an end to the division into classes to the battle among the classes; as long as they didn't recognize the fact that they could expect the accomplishment of the work of their liberation only from their own selves. This realization called the socialist movement into life which is the grandest revolutionary movement of all times.

The socialist aim is very simple as a matter of fact. Even capitalist society recognized the principal that every man is entitled to political right. This principal is complemented by the socialist movement to the effect that the laborers are entitled to the rights of industry. Just as it is proper that the Government of a people should be a government for the people and by the people so it is proper that the government of shops, factories and mines should be for the laborers and by the laborers. Still more simply; the socialist movement has for its aim to make workmen free on the scene of its labor; that the laborer should freely use the tools of his labor and enjoy its full fruit.

The capitalist class are afraid of the realization of these aims. As long as the capitalist owns the tools of production he may live in luxury without working and rule without strength. Socialism abolishes these privileges of the capitalists deprives them of their usurped power and stolen fortunes. The capitalists have therefore good cause to tremble before socialism. On the other hand workmen have reason to fight for socialism. And the inexorable laws of social development will yet force capitalism to dig its own grave.

The capitalists regardlessly exploit the workmen to sell the produced commodities as merchandise. They look for markets for their merchandise. They compete with each other for those markets and in the end they start wars. The sufferings caused by the war incite the flame of class struggle with increased force and while on one hand capitalistic production becomes ineffective on the other hand the laboring class rises to become the maker of its own future.

Thus it is not an accident that while owing to the development of production in all other countries the material conditions of socialism were present in a more ample degree, still the people of the most backward the most undeveloped country, Russia, the most horribly yoked, the most terribly tortured Russian people were the 1st to carry the flag of socialism to victory.

SOCIALISTIC SYSTEM IN RUSSIA.

The fall of Czarism is historic past by this time. For a moment it seemed as if after the fall of Czarism in Russia, Capitalistic development, and thereby a more modern more pleasing or just as merciless period of class regime and exploitation had begun. But socialistic agitation in Russia was not sterile. Socialistic agitation succeeded in making the millions of Russian laborers and peasants understand that if they had the strength of abolishing one form of class rule they have the strength to abolish all forms of class rule, for all times as well. Today Russia is the model of the purest and most perfect Democracy. In Russia Government reposes fully in the hands of the workers and is controlled by them. The government is one of the industries of the laboring classes in one word a government of production. It is the purpose of that government that by aid of human experiences and acquisitions labor should not be the purpose but should become the means of the well being of the people and the promoter of its peace.

THE EFFECT OF THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION IN EUROPE.

The effect of this grand revolutionary occurrence extended all over Europe. The revolutionary proletariat derived new strength and confidence from the rising of the Russian working people. And while in Russia the revolution has not even finished its great work as yet the peoples of Austria, Germany and Hungary have already risen, demolished the political institutions of capitalism and it is only a question of time and of very short time at that that they will overthrow capitalism itself. And not only in those countries but all over Europe the fire of revolution bursts into flame. Of revolution which don't put new masters, new exploiters into the place of old ones but make people free.

COUNTER REVOLUTION.

The Capitalists of the world dont look inactively upon these powerful efforts of the working class. The counter revolution is already on its way. The banished exploiters are soliciting an alliance with the exploiters that are still unbanished so that they may reacquire their mastery.

The capitalists of the world are preparing for one other combat against the socialists of the world.

Will the counter revolution be able to get the upper hand? Will it be possible to fetter the hands of those with chains of wage-slavery who have once shed them? Will it be possible to keep them on the arms of those who are preparing to shed them—This question will decide the fate of humanity on earth.

OUR TASKS.

We cant look at this titanic struggle inactively. We must render aid to our fighting brethren. Aid against their being attacked in the back and above all, that we secure their liberation, their freedom, by gaining our own liberation, our own freedom by struggle,—this is a task from which only such a workman may shrink in whom long servitude has killed the man. Hungarian Workmen of America! Understand that for the accomplishment of this great task you must unite and work in unity! Understand it that you stand before a revolutionary task the fulfillment of which you can by no means avoid! Dont be tardy! From the Council of Workmen in every place and on with the work which on the ruins of the Empire will build the realm of freedom.

With revolutionary greeting,

THE COUNCIL OF N. Y. WORKMEN.

PURPOSE OF THE COUNCIL OF WORKMEN.

Society is constituted of two classes in every country of industrial development. One is the class of the laborers of the exploited—the working class,—the other is the class of those who make them work—of the exploiters—the capitalistic class.

These two classes cannot have interests in common. While the capitalists who are not doing any useful work live in splendor, workmen in general live in the most abject misery.

The capitalistic class may do with the workmen as they please because the capitalists own the land and the means necessary for production. In consequence of which it is within their power to deny the workmen the opportunity to work at any time or to make them work under such conditions as will deprive them of the fruits of their labor.

While such conditions exist in economic life, while one may decide the lot of hundreds of thousands so long "Democracy," "Equality," and "Liberty" are empty notions.

The productive system of capitalism will collapse for the reason of the contradictions contained in itself. For that time the working class must arm itself with knowledge and organization so that it may fill its historic vocation: That is to take into its own possession the soil and the means of production to use them for the benefit of the commonwealth and thus to lay the foundation of such a society where not even a possibility exists for exploitation, and whose members are truly equal, truly free because they receive the full fruit of their labor and thus are economically independent.

The purpose of the council of workmen is to awake the consciousness of this vocation of the workmen and to make them fulfill same by aid of all the means at the disposal of the working class.

ZAJMY LIDU, CHICAGO, ILL. (Reported Dec. 16, 1918.)

In issue of December 10, p. 2, c. 3, 4, and 5, the postmaster at Chicago, Illinois, calls attention to the fact that no translation has been filed for an article under heading:

"THE GIANT IS GETTING UP—THE SPIRITS ARE TREMBLING."

[Translation]

That the capitalistic newspapers, representing the interests of their lords and using every wicked means to rob the workingman, is well known a long time to labor. That many times they have attempted by trickery to incline the workmen as their friends, is a general truth. That they even have the courage to act as judges of their own crimes by which they wish to punish their own victims, is not as frequent an occurrence as occurred in the past. However, sensational cases occur in which the workingman is punished for the crime of the capitalist, the capitalist escaping unpunished. Within the immediate past the actions of the capitalists have been so bold as to cause the lukewarm workingman to think. This is attributable to demagogical articles in the capitalistic newspapers. They aroused the solidarity among the organized workmen and thus aroused a powerful strength which is in the hands of organized labor. The workingman, as an individual realizes he is helpless in the organized labor movement; and, therefore, must unite with other workmen into a solid front in order to control general conditions and the workmen, as a whole, would not permit anything to block their aims in the economical and political field.

This is well known to the hired newspaper coolies and are using all of their energy to grasp the last straw to hold themselves above the water, to deceive the working men and to guide and keep them in the old capitalists' channel. They have many reasons to fear. For that reason the demagogical "friendship to the workmen" is hiding its fear, but so very awkwardly that every one at sight notices it. At the head of all stands the Chicago American, whose whole structure is filled with fear until it plans, begs and makes threats in the same breath.

The whole matter relates to Tom Mooney, who was to hang according to the holy desire of the capitalists, but whose sentence was commuted to an imprisonment for life. And because everything does not move along the desires of the capitalists, great fear is the result.

Workingmen, "diligent and patient," American workingmen of the American Federation of Labor, who up to the present time kissed the hand that dealt the strokes, have become rebellious—no one believed their changed attitude a possibility. The case of Mooney caused it all, and for that reason the capitalists are gnashing their teeth, because they could not send him to the gallows as easily as other workingmen were forced to die. The matter is becoming more serious for the capitalists day by day. A few years ago even a cock would not crow over them, but to-day the rebellious atmosphere and courage of the workingmen has reached the degree that even force can not cope with them. Other means must be devised in order to deceive them.

* * * * *

The capitalists are trembling, for the workingmen, today, after viewing the situation economically and politically, are crying: "You capitalists may go to the devil. Today we want to be masters."

In order to check this advance, the prostitutes are using every subterfuge by means of capitalistic newspapers to divide the workingmen. They lie on every side. Lie was never paid as dearly as now! Today lies are forced into the workingmen from every side.

But it is too late. Like a crystal spring it cannot even be stopped though it may become polluted, it will come to the top clear and with such force that it will crush those who have attempted to stop it. It is still possible for the capitalists to succeed in checking a concerted action on the part of the workingmen by giving Mooney his liberty. But Mooney's life is now subordinated. Now, the question is, what Mooney represents, the aims of the workingmen struggle between the classes, liberation of the workingman, for whom Mooney was to die a disgraceful death. The ravages of the capitalistic and mendacious coolies cannot stop the stream which is moving like an overflowed river.

SPRAVEDLNOST, CHICAGO, ILL. (Daily publication).

THE SOCIALISTS ARE OPENLY IN ACCORD WITH THE BOLSHEVIKS.

[November 18, p. 8, c. 1, 2 and 3, extract translation under headline.]

The following resolutions were adopted:

1. Extending a brotherly hand to the revolutionary workingman's classes in Europe; we endorse the efforts our comrades under the leadership of Karl Liebknecht and of our comrades in Finland, Austria, Bulgaria, Serbia, Holland and other nations to create a government according to the Russian form.

2. We demand that our government immediately recognize the Russian Socialist republic of the soviets.

3. That Wilson's administration may clear itself of the charges of hypocrisy and serious propaganda for the reconstruction of Russia by a mere publication of the remaining documents forwarded to the state department, along with the detrimental "Sisson's documents."

4. A demand to immediately return the American army from Europe excepting a sufficient number for necessary purposes.

5. We protest against the threatening punishment of Tom Mooney as a "just murder based upon perjured testimony."

6. The effect to place the burden of war as a duty upon the American people should be considered as a plan of American plutocracy to saddle the American masses into an uneven financial program of imperialism.

7. We condemn the official and unofficial campaign of terror against the restriction of the expression of public opinion.

8. We demand that all political persecutions be ended immediately and all court decisions against our leaders of the working class who were forced to face a trial and imprisoned under the pretense of a necessity of war.

9. We desire that the American Socialistic party be given a representation at the international peace table and a motion is made that the international socialistic and workingmen's congress be held simultaneously and at the same place as the peace conference.

10. A request is made that socialists in American express their sympathy for their comrades in Europe.

[November 23, p. 5, c. 1.]

Spravednost is advertising a pamphlet for sale, under the following title: "Message to the American Workingman, price 5 cents, mail 7 cents."

Comrade Kral has written an immortal pamphlet on the "Message to the American Workingman." Today everyone sees the power in the hands of the workingman, if they will only take control of the government into their hands, as was done by the workingmen in Russia. And if they will take into consideration that a laboring man has more advantages in America to educate himself, it is easily understood what power has the workingman, and that it is only necessary to convince him of his power, strength and necessity.

The pamphlet of comrade Kral solves all of the above facts, and may be purchased in our book store.

The following is a translation of a Spanish-Anarchistic Bolshevik pamphlet recently distributed in the United States:

TO THE WORKERS—"THE BOSSY ORDER AND PEACE"

The present moments are of great importance for the workers of the World, especially for those who do not agree with the present system of things, that is, the system of so much per cent of debits and credits.

After four long years of war, of a war without precedents, where the belligerents have abused their subjects, doing the most barbarous things, demanding in a thousand ways the sacrifice of their blood and of their money, abolishing all sentiment and love towards its fellow beings, miscarrying the object of Humanity, placing men face to face like wild animals of different families fighting with the only object of destroying themselves and they do it just to obey the representatives of the Bossy Government and of its ally (Newspapers), telling them about their country, the national honor, the flag and about all other objects they employ to cover all of their legal crimes.

Notice, workers, men of sentimentality, and see if you can find a flag that has enough cloth to cover the flesh of those who have been left naked in its name.

At last, we will have peace, a peace made by the Governments which is tyranny for today, cruelty for tomorrow, supposing that the winners (if there ever was anyone conquered) will continue and try to maintain their institutions with all their tyrannies and social inequality, and hoping for another opportunity to take their flock to another meat market.

Fortunately, the German, Russian and other workers have given the call to the world; they have given an example proving their incomformity with all that is "Higher up" rebelling against their Governments, who, after exploiting them without pity, had turned them into flesh cutting machines, placing them in front of their brothers from other peoples and continents, always slaves to defend interests that do not belong to them on the contrary belonging to their own oppressors.

The Workers must be prepared. We were not prepared to stop this War, but we will be prepared to defend the Revolution that is calling at our doors, and if we are not strong enough to defend it, we will not be instruments of war against those people who have already started the fight. Do not forget that the emancipation of the disheired is not from a determined point, but from Humanity, and there cannot be happiness while in another part of the World there are slaves.

Capitalism, with its servants, the Governments, and all those who live from the work of others will attempt to fight all those things that will come from those they have tricked so that they can prevent the call to Rebellion. We all agree on this not having as an obstacle the part of the planet in which Destiny had them born.

It will be expected that all Governments not directly affected by the Revolution, will start a campaign against it wherever it may start. For its destruction they will employ all their energies, money and violence and especially their so much talked about "Restoration of Order". Remember producers that the order they will start to establish is the unconditional obedience to the written law, to private property, and to all religions, and to all that which is obstacle to the big conceptions that we have of disappearing forever the exploitation of men for man. They are trying to sustain with the points of their bayonets (not with reasons because they have none) all that which for us is a recollection of privations and gives us the unhappiness of living.

When they came to us calling us to help restore order in a place where the Red Flag is waving, that flag which is the sign of those who have been robbed of their right to live, we will answer that all men of studies got to the capitalists and priests of all kinds, that we have had enough of their infamies. If we give our services to this call, which will come, it would be the most absolute denial to Human liberation.

It is not a question of hatred towards men that makes us speak in this language. We know that they can not act in any other way, because even if they try to conceal their real purpose in their manifestations, we could see that they were trying to make us fight each other against those things for which we had been looking for and had found. Because we know that there will be no reconciliation possible until such time as a change of system is made, which will abolish completely all privileges of a determined class over another.

The Social Revolution is in progress. It is not a war that leaves still more barbarous atrocities, because it did not defend the principles of justice. In war there is nothing but blind obedience towards the strongest or the most cunning through their so-much-talked about pretext of national love.

The revolution is something like a depurative applied to the human organism to purify it from all those bonds. They supposed they had converted us into Barbarians to sustain a War like the one we have just seen, which is a blasphemy against civilization and progress well understood.

When we address this to the workers, we don't do it with the view that they are the only ones who have a right to be freed. For us, this right belongs to everyone who feels he is a slave, but who produces everything and possesses nothing, and who are the immediate victims of the present system, which we want to destroy and for which you will be called to defend as far as possible.

Nature created us all the same, without classifying us into different classes and for this reason we all have the legitimate right to live this life like laboring brothers of the same family going to a promising future. He who opposes this end will get something not very sweet, because he is a defender of that which is old, and of death, well, we will give him death, but we will follow our course we are the defenders of life.

Let us suppose there were some who divided society into classes, we will be the Workers, the leaders, in destroying it, and in making humanity only one family of producers free from all governments.

To win this end, everything is in our will. We will make a heroic effort and we will say to the Lazy "If you want to eat, work."

The same way the popular Napoleon said that to win the war he needed three things which were. Money, money and money we will say in order that we can free ourselves from the system which is responsible for all human misery, we, too, need three things, that is Dignity, Solidity and Fraternity.

By the group.—

(Without name.)

The following is a translation of a circular in the Russian language recently distributed in the United States by the Bolsheviki element:

"Comrades! Workingmen!"

Rise, awake and reconsider. You are crushed everywhere and torn to the utmost for the most stupid bagetelle and why? Because you are defenceless.

Comrades! Workingmen!

Do you know that here exists a union of Russian workingmen and also a soviet of workers' deputies who offer their services to you free of charge, as all advice and counsel in all directions you may receive such in the soviet's business meetings, which takes place once a week every Thursday.

Comrades!

You all come. Do not feel backward. Should you have any complaints you may record them every evening in the complaint book, which may be found on the premises, and all these complaints will be inspected at the business meetings, where the quickest and most resolute measures for assistance will be taken.

Do not Forget Comrades

"The Soviet of Workers' Deputies."

The following is a translation of a Russian pamphlet recently circulated in the United States by anarchistic groups:

"FREE FEDERATION OF FREE COMMUNES—EVERYONE ACCORDING TO HIS ABILITY AND TO EVERYONE ACCORDING TO HIS WANTS."

The fundamental principles of all the social activities and evils are for instance, wars, pauperism, (division of society into the rich and poor), disposition and prostitution, etc. There are two fundamentals upon which the present day society is resting. These fundamentals are: executive and administrative government (i. e. the right to one class of people to rule by force, another class of people), and the right of property by means of production.

The government, in whatever form it may be; absolute monarchy or parliamentary republic, as per example in France, inevitably leads to an open or hidden imperialism (the administration of a few individuals, or oligarchy—administration of a group of people or a party), the destruction of a free initiative of the masses; the setting up of bureaucracy, which eludes from all the possibility of a nation wide control, intolerance to all the different kinds of autonomy, political, cultural and national; and what is most important, due to an impossibility of understanding by the Centrum (government) of all the interests of all the various districts, to an inevitable clash between the latter with the former.

A large, militaristic, politically centralized government, although a republic, can become and necessarily does become (due to the present day politics) an aggrandizing government, for to this point, it (the government) is inevitably brought by the capitalistic competitor and militaristic jealousy.

The governmental form of organization inevitably leads to a manifestation of imperialism (the endeavor to take up a large and influential position) and imperialism leads to corruption—to a moral decay of the voters and the representatives and to a state of demagoguery of the last mentioned ones.

The referendum and the initiative become only palliatives, i. e. means for a temporary softening of the existing laws.

The removal of all these negative sides of the government can be done only by removing the government itself.

The government will be substituted by federalism, i. e. a free union of free units.

We are endeavoring to change the old organization which from top to bottom rests on force, to a new organization which will not have any other foundations but a general interest of the people, no other principles but a free federation, union of individuals, citizens, into communes (country and town communes), these in turn will federate as districts, countries and national federations. A number of these will form the old Russian Confederation, which will have to become a part of the all-world confederation.

Under such an order of things, there will be no place for the bureaucracy, for all the public institutions will be under the wide control of the society.

Such an organization will insure the possibility of a free action, to the more progressive federations (unions) which will serve as an example to others for their progressivity.

Such an organization will insure the free development of a nation, or a cultural or territorial unit.

Such an organization will insure the annihilation of imperialism, or the endeavor to govern other nations or people's, for then no capitalistic organization can influence the Centrum government, without any control and there will be no government which will compel the people against their own will to take up arms and go to war.

And for this principle of government, we the Anarchists are fighting; and for an organization based upon the principle of a free union, we the Federalists are striving.

Liberty without economic freedom—such liberties is slavery; As long as the right of property will exist—as long as the smarter members of society will have a possibility to hold considerable wealth (including real property).

This order of things means that the greater part of society—the proletariat—is compelled to sell their labor to the holder's of wealth and thereby, still more increase such wealth and also the already existing and horrible pauperism—which destroys the present society.

It is true that the struggle between capital and labor and the farsightedness of the capitalists lead to a certain softening of contrasts in the way of the introduction of industrial laws, increases of wages, shortening of hours, etc. But the fundamental contradictory conditions are not done away with, but only more or less obliterated.

In order to free oneself forever from the division between the rich and the poor and forever to end the terrible spectre of pauperism, exploit and unemployment. We have to annihilate the right of property—production—wealth.

Only then, when the society without exception will become the master of all wealth, when everyone will take an active part in the production of all that is necessary for the existence of the present day society, then and only then, the days of division between capital and labor will never come back.

A simple review of things will reveal to us, that there is a heavier over-production (supply greater than demand), that there are many things produced that are of no usefulness, and of a detrimental to the people.

In the future society everyone will be able to choose his own profession, according to his tastes and ability, in the production of such articles of necessity and pleasure, as the demand will be. These problems are very exhaustively treated by P. A. Kropotkin's in his (Bread and Will) or The Winning of Bread.

But, this is only one-half of the economic liberation. Also the old form of compensation is exceedingly unjust. All those who will take part in the production of things, will not have to figure out exactly how much everyone should be compensated—all will be compensated alike.

How to compare the relationship of a civil engineer to that of an iron worker.

The present system is greatly unjust in it's relationship to women, old men, with people and the children. Are they to be blamed that by nature or circumstances, they became ill or feeble?

Upon this fact we have founded an equal right of all people, so that all people may equally and according to their needs, benefit by the production of the society, and also according to this motto:

"(Take) from everyone, according to his ability—and

"(Give) to everyone according to his needs."

COMMUNISM.

The realization of our ideal depends upon the understanding of interests between laboring masses and upon the strength of their revolutionary initiative.

In order to defend our right, no matter whether we live under an imperialistic system of government, or under a republic form of government, we have to resort to force, terrorism, revolution, etc.

At the present time, the laboring people of Russia are in their own, but our task is great, nevertheless, for we have to consider how to materialize our ideals.

We shall adopt force only when force will be adopted against us by the capitalistic class.

At the present time, there are no material or other obstacles, except ignorance and fear which could bar us from the materialization of our socialistic program. Our task is to conquer this ignorance and fear, and ignorance and fear can be conquered by a country-wide propaganda of our ideas, even though in small measures; a general enlightenment about the relationship existing between the laboring classes, the soldiers on the one hand, and the capital and land owners on the other hand. Also by organizing all of the laboring mass.

In order that the powers of the organization might always be relied upon, it must be non-partisan. This non-partisan organization will be the Universal Confederation of Labor, which after Social Revolution will mechanically become the all Russian Confederation.

The competency of this Universal Confederation of Labor and its component parts (professional unions, Labor or Trade Unions, the soldiers, etc.) will depend upon our endeavor and we shall be obliged to enlarge or increase it with all our power.

To them naturally pass the sovereignty—i. e. they will not be governed or ruled by anybody. They will have to become the organizers of their respective districts or regions. They will be obliged to take upon themselves, or shoulder, the responsibility of all the control of public institutions, the expropriation of capital, its exploitations—i. e. possession of wealth and its disorganization.

And, thus organizing a Universal Confederation of Labor, we, the Syndicalists present our program.

We, the Revolutionists depend upon the realization of our ideal by the revolutionary outbursts of all the laboring classes.

By the above we have also outlined our relationship to the workmen's and Soldier's Councils and their relationship to other Revolutionary parties. We endeavor to unite the workmen and Soldier's Council with real and non-partisan representation of Labor.

We shall uphold and support all these various revolutionary manifestations of Labor, which will lead to the complete destruction of all the existing political and economic relations, and the realization of our socialistic ideals.

Our relation to government and centralism, also concern our relation to the Institutional Congress (Labor Congress). We are not in accord with any such institution for it necessarily destroys all the revolutionary initiative of the masses.

REVOLUTION.

The program of the Anarchistic Communists of all the professional or trade unions, of the Universal Confederation of Labor, of the Workmen's Council, and Soldier's or Peasant's Council is to become a revolutionary element, the element of initiative, such as was adopted by the French Universal Confederation of Labor, such as was adopted to bring about the eight hour working day, the manifestation of the 1st of May, the Universal Strike, and an early Social Revolution.

Long Live the Universal Confederation of Labor!!!!

Long Live the Social Revolution!!!!

The following is a list of Russian newspapers:

1. "Golos Truzenika" (The Voice of the Laborer), published by the General Executive Board of the I. W. W., at 1001 West Madison St., Chicago, Ill.

2. "Rabochiy e Krestyanin" (The Workman and Peasant), a weekly newspaper, published by the Soviet of the Russian Workers Deputies, at 133 E. 15th St., New York. Editor, A. Brailovsky; secretary, W. Konstantinowich; business manager, S. A. Younshanoff. This is a paper teaching anarchial theories and is largely supported by the Union of Russian Workers Anarchists Communists.

3. "Novy Mir" (The New World), published by the Russian Socialist Publishing Society, 113 E. 10th St., New York. A. Stoklitsky, President; M. Mislig, treasurer; N. Hourwich, secretary. This paper is a bolshevik paper and supported by the Russian Socialists organizations.

4. "Russky Golos" (Russian Voice), a Russian daily newspaper, published at 233 E. 6th St., New York, and is somewhat of a radical paper, of minor importance.

5. "Narodnaya Gazeeta," a weekly Socialist paper and a recognized organ of the Russian Social-Democrats and Social Revolutionists. It is published at 133 Second Ave., New York. This organ is supported and maintained by the Mensheviks.

The following is a translation from the Industrialisti, an I. W. W. daily newspaper published in the Finnish language at 1001 West Madison Avenue, Chicago, Ill.; date of issue, December 30, 1918; page 3, columns 1 and 2:

The triumphal march of Bolshevism is paving the way in the larger industrial centers of the East. Particularly the liveliest harbor cities, such as New York and Boston, the latter to which I shall devote this article, appear to blaze the red trail, at any rate, in the revolutionary propaganda work. Mighty are beginning to develop the mass meetings particularly among the Russians and Irishmen. There is no longer a single Sunday or Holiday that crowds by the thousands do not rush vieing to hear and spread the seed of revolution.

On the 15th instant there was a big mass meeting by the Irishmen in which there was as speaker one of the best known English speakers, Jim Larkin. The occasion turned out to be festive and spurtive with fire of revolution, when this "fire-tongue" spoke with his thundering voice to a brimful audience at the Grand Opera House. It appeared that the nationalists for once were struck in the vein, since the great bourgeois newspapers could not refrain from giving an account of Larkin's speech, by means of which the truth only spread broad. He did not fear to say America more than he did others. He concluded his speech in the statement "that if the Irishmen wish to become free from their enslaver, they can do it in only one way, by organizing together with the international proletariat into the same battlefront. By organizing economically."

He particularly emphasized his last sentence, in which he says, the only form of unionism is the Industrial Union.

In this there would be a little for our yellow brothers to learn, but they do not stick their ears in such place where matters of this sort are discussed. It seems as if those brothers not only shun the I. W. W. league, but that they strive to tear themselves loose from even the radical political socialists.

Readers of the Industrialist residing in Boston and vicinity take notice! January 19th will turn out to be a gigantic propaganda occasion for the reason that the local defense committee of the political prisoners has arranged a big mass meeting for that day in the Grand Opera House, at 724 Washington Street. Speakers will be first-class, such as Scott Nearing, etc.—Therefore come along by the crowds.

(Signed) J. R.

The following is a translation from the Russian newspaper Golos Truzenika (the Voice of the Laborer), published by the General Executive Board of the I. W. W., at 1001 West Madison Street, Chicago, Ill., under the caption of the "All-Colonial Congress," issued January 26, 1919:

The second Russian All-Colonial Congress of the United States and Canada protests in the most determined manner against the breaking in with weapons of the allied armies into revolutionary Russia for the purpose of destroying the revolutionary victories of the Russian people, which is terrible and hateful to them; we ought and we will battle to the last drop of blood against all enemies who strive to crush the treasure of the world, the great social revolution. We express hope that the American and north European proletariat will all support us in it because a world revolution is not beyond the mountains and also in that (in the world revolution) lays the triumph of the Russian revolution.

We protest against such unfounded attacks of nonresponsible leaders of the working class and we say that this Congress is an anarchial bolshevik and we hope that sooner or later all workmen will realize what this gang of the false leaders of the working class mean and they will try to break away from them and take in their power the management of the workers' affairs, because the freedom of the workmen is up to the workmen, himself.

DELEGATE KH.

A FELSZABADULAS, I. W. W. WEEKLY, CHICAGO.

[January 25, 1919, Page 2, col. 2.—Editorial.]

DEMOCRACY OF LABOR.

Internationalism knows only one kind of democracy: that is Industrial Democracy.

Industrial Democracy was not fought out on the battlefields of Europe and can only be established through the international organization of the workers of the world.

The war of the internationalists is the continuous class-struggle in the mines, factories and smelters. Real democracy will come only when the arbitrary rule of the capitalist, which is nourished by exploitation, economic robbery and new wars, is stopped.

DEMOCRACY OF THE WORKERS.

To hell with that so-called democracy.—Forward with the class-struggle in order that misery, crime, anguish, suffering and bloodshed be stopped. All and everything that is in this world is the property of the employers. To hell with that system which creates American Huns, industrial Kaisers, and humiliates women and children.

[January 25, 1919, Page 3, Col. 4.]

THE DUTIES OF THE WORKING CLASS.

[By Jack Gaveel, Translated by F. V.]

The war of the capitalists is concluded. The capitalist ambition is satisfied with the enormous fortune the war has brought; new markets which will facilitate further accumulation of wealth; as to profits, more expansion of trade is in view. The merciless fetters of the capitalists wait for new and foreign people to tie them to the machines of profit. But whatever will happen in consequence of the bloody and merciless war which now is in its last hour, the word revolution sounds in our ear, shaking like thunder. * * *

It is a fact, that the war between the money-magnates (Kings) is ended, but class-struggle has only now started on its way. The red terror of revolution breaks its way throughout the entire world and looks into the eyes of the capitalist class with a grinning defiance. In Europe thrones are being crushed, tumbling into the dust; they hold trials over czars; Emperors hurry (flee) away dragging their dirty hide (body) to some hiding place where they are safe. The shameful flags of slavery are torn down and the flag of revolution which was hoisted in its place, waves lively in the fresh air of love of mankind. That was the first year in history of the world, when it was interesting to celebrate Christmas according to the doctrines of Christ. The capitalist doctrines are overthrown with an astounding rapidity all over Europe in order to make place for the new doctrine: "peace on earth and good will towards men." Just for that reason Christian capitalism, with a grimace of contempt, draws its lips together, its heart filled with hatred against the Bolsheviks because they announce that "there will be no peace and brotherhood on earth as long as the army of the workers will be under the yoke of capitalism.

Workers of America, the world has changed! The social system of a ramshackle State lies on its death-bed and the industrial democracy of a new world knocking at our door. They await the birth of democracy and we can not be quiet about the birth of our democracy. We must no longer be indifferent towards the trend of events but, whether we want or not, we have to face them under all circumstances. Every one will be forced to this by the industrial and financial crisis in this country, too, within a very short time.

Capitalism is driven out of certain parts of Europe and looks in America for a shelter.

While you American workers have shed your blood and sacrificed your lives over there for freedom and democracy your brothers who remained here were deprived of all that in the meanest manner. The yoke of slavery was wearing harder upon the necks of those who remained at home, than at any other time in history. The jails and prisons are filled with untold numbers of your fellow-workers; in these hell-holes they have to die a slow, merciless death and they were put there by the judges and executioners appointed through you. The workers of Russia, Finland, Germany, Sweden, Norway, Holland, France and England are fighting now in their own countries for such democracy which will be the democracy for all, men, women and children.

That is the kind of democracy for which you too have to fight against the industrial kaisers of America; that means nothing else than to enlighten your fellow-workers in the factories, mines and shops, to organize them into trade unions, so that the workers may dictate the conditions under which they are willing to work and continue production. You must do that if you do not want that the workers of the world point out towards you with their finger, at the time when the crisis will set in and you, who have sacrificed your lives for democracy, will have to stretch out your hand like a beggar for a miserable "job."

The capitalists of this country hold their hands tightly around the neck of their slaves to what they became entitled through the opportunities of the war and they will not let loose until they are forced to. Every worker in this country faces a dangerous situation; those who fought for democracy are already looking for work in the factories all over the country. And then the good news will come out that new labor-saving machines are employed everywhere.

These events will create the conditions of times when there is no sufficient work, that is low wages, longer working hours, and in its footsteps follow the result, as sickness, crime and prostitution; then the most doubtful eye will see already that they can not find here even a trace of that freedom for which they went to Europe to fight. We only need to look into the capitalist press and we can find that the returned soldiers who are looking for their old job do not get it at all; they also may find often that their job is held by women!

Workers of America! What do you think to do in this question? Do you perhaps have confidence in the wisdom of your masters and their conscience, that they will settle that question? Or will you perhaps curse the workers who are in the same condition as you?

We tell you, every one of you: rally all branches behind one big organization.

Why? Because the employer will not reduce your working hours in order that everybody can get work and he will not give you higher wages because in doing so he would act against his own interests. At present they have only one thing in their mind, that is how it could be possible to obtain a good, profitable contract which they lost now through the conclusion of the war. Realizing the fact that Europe will, for a long time, not be able to produce more than is absolutely necessary and knowing that America would like to place its goods at low prices in insolvent Europe, the first and main thing is to obtain cheap labor (working power) in order to be able to ship cheap goods. The patriotic tricks will start again to reduce the wages and increase the working hours.

Do not rely upon the industrial kaisers of America that they will settle your question. You can not help the case either if you blame the bad labor conditions upon the cursed immigrants. It would not help any if, out of mere selfishness, you would care only for yourself. All these things do not change the facts which are already upon the threshold. It would have no influence upon labor scarcity, either. It would not alleviate misery either, because as long as there will be thousands and thousands looking for work, the masters of industries will take advantage of the situation and exploit the workers more and more and the more there will be looking for work the more bitter will be the fate the workers will have to face.

You have to create a connection with the unemployed and the unemployed shall act with those who work who are employed. In such action only will there be any power and that will be the only remedy. That is the way you have to act; the eyes of the world are directed at you; because the capitalist beasts are trying to entrench themselves already that the attacks of the workers shall find them prepared. It depends upon you to keep up the traditions of this country; proclaim yourselves the international working-class and enter the fight for yourselves and for those, who are rotting in a hole (cell) of the jail for fighting in the interest of your class; who were thrown into prison by the autocrats and imperialists of America. Your fight must go on for better conditions and at the same time for their freedom; because as long as you can not free those men you will not be strong enough either to better your conditions or the lot of your wives and your children.

You workers, who gave up everything in this war shall have only that right left, to go back to the servant's position in which the war has found you. Or is it your only duty to sacrifice your lives in the interest of the greedy, money-hungry capitalistic class? * * *

The time of action is here. We have to show the working-class of Europe that we are with them just as they are with us in our common struggles, because that struggle is that of the world's workers against the blood-thirsty capitalist class.

In the publication Rabochily e Krestyanian (Workman and Peasant) of January 11, 1919, published in New York City, the following, here translated, appears on page 2 under the caption "From report of the second All-Colonial Congress of the Russian Workmen's Colonies of the United States and Canada":

Comrade Blankl, who represented at this Congress the Union of Russian Workers and Anarchists stated "By request of the Union of Russian Workers and Anarchists, I find it absolutely necessary to announce that we held ourselves back from voting upon the question of organizing the Soviet Government for the reason that we denounce any form of ruling or government."

Where Government begins, there ends revolution—and there where there is a revolution, there is no place for any government. But finding that unquestion-ably the Bolsheviks being the greater revolutionary part of the Russian Social-Democratic party, which follows the road towards a social revolution, we support them in their battle with a counter-revolution. The Bolsheviks who strive for communism find it unavoidable to wrest the government ruling and we find it possible to reach a non-government communism only through a social revolution.

TRANSLATION FROM GUERRA DI CLASSE, AN ITALIAN I. W. W. PAPER, PUBLISHED AT SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH, 1916.

FIRST OF MAY—WORKINGMEN: ALERT.

While in the old world the villainous war, the war of kings and of the military providers, the war of the two strongest Imperialisms, the English and the German, who are contending the step to better impose their brutal strength, the war, that for two years is being presented to us as democratic war when instead it is imperialistic; of freedom, when it is suicide for whoever does not bow its forehead in the presence of the majesty of the military régime:

According to all the sold and the renegades it is a war of civilization (as though there could be a "civil war") when it is not, as always, the exaltation of barbarism, of plunder, of brigantage, of the assassin, while in the old world I say, the war is sowing ruin, desolation, mourning, misery and death in frightful numbers; and while here in the new world the imperialism is getting gigantic (giving the lie to the lying phrases that the European war will be the last war because it will kill militarism) and under the usual lying cloak of honor, of the national defence attempting to walk on the same road as that of Europe, we have yet the courage, oh! workingmen, to call you on this May 1st of death; to life.

Workingmen: Alert!

This is our cry of revolutionists, of combatants, alert, we cry it strongly today before we are stopped; rifle in hand, to be able to cry later—alert oh! proletariat.

On this first of May sacred to human hopes, of all the overtired human beings, we would want that whoever is weighed under the yoke of the triple slavery, economical, political and religious, to follow with action our desperate cry.

We would want that the proletariat, our brothers, to awake from the lethargy in which they live, to despoil themselves of their prejudices of which they are imbued and run to us regenerated with the saintly intention to fight at our side the most hardest battles for liberty and justice.

Would want that this May 1st would be red as it was dreamed by the first internationalists, would want to be able to adopt the sword instead of the pen, would want to have arrived on this day to be able to avenge with our blood all our martyrs, those who before us were victims of the infamous actual regime.

We would want, oh proletariats to be able to raise the red flag on all the bourgeois ramparts and be able to say, at completed fact, "the revolution that was has transformed the world."

Workingmen, Alert; because all this is not yet but a realizable dream but the day that: "Other druse and humble cohorts, ready for battle, will come from the furrows and from the hovels to justice make."

Come then, on this day of May let it awaken in us the sleeping energies, let it renew the most generous enthusiasm. Nothing is dead of that that was and it is for us our patrimonial ideal.

All is alive around us. Not before, not now, that the workingmen are killing for a cause not theirs, not after, when the interests of the bourgeois in struggle will force the false peace that will generate more hate, other wars; nothing for us is, or will be dead.

We will yet be the slaves, the derided, the exhausted. The cross and the sword, increased in strength and audacity, will strike on us to impose as yesterday, as today all sorts of infamy. Know how to gather the challenge, oh proletariat.

Never better moment was there for us to prepare us for our war "war of classes" to overthrow that is, thrones and altars. Let then begin our preparations in the daily struggles against the common enemy.

To learn how to hate, hate, always. Hate "God" in whose name our blood is drained, hate the priest, the gnawing cancer of humanity, hate the "State" as the first great thief amongst thieves, hate the capitalism that is the father of the State. Hate, hate always—Hate for the enemy of our cause, the bourgeois Journalist, the disguised democrat. Hate for the politician who sells himself to the first offered—hate for all our false friends.

In the hate of all the opponents of our cause which is of liberty, of Justice, of love and common brotherhood, is found on this first of May of death, the strength to resurrect the life.

Life that has to serve us until the day that tight in strong embrace, we will ask on the barricades, together with the "poet" "No more bread, but blood blood one hour only of Joyous revenge."

Workingmen alert—May, our May of struggle and not of feast, of battle and not of vain bacchanals, it calls you to harvest.

Workingmen, Alert. He who is not with us is against us.

LUIGI PARENTI.

THE LATIN BRANCH, I. W. W.

WORKINGMEN!

The present modest sheet that we hurl in your midst, because reading it you can think, act, is fruit of our will, of our ardent revolutionary faith that inspires us, it spurs us, it conquers us.

We have called it "War of classes" because this is its mission, to make it so all workingmen understand that they must prepare for their war that they do not yet know how to fight.

The European slaughter and all the wars past and future wanted or sanctioned by dynasties, blessed always by capitalism and by priests, that in the war they know their interests, there was not and there never will be wars of people uniting for their total emancipation.

PROLETARIAT!

Truth so scalding will never be told to you by the Bourgeois sheets, written by all the delinquents in gentlemen's garb. They seek and know how to find all sorts of deceptions to make of you the servants of the Bourgeois class and priesthood.

"War of classes" let it be the cry of all the oppressed, "war of classes" resound in all the hovels of the proletariat, in all the offices, in the mines, on the transatlantics, in the agricultural camps, in all places that gives and produces riches for others. But more than the cry, that sometimes is innocuous, it is to prepare for "our war."

All the days the workingmen must adept themselves for the "war of classes" in the struggle that is fought between capital and labor by means of strikes, boycottage, and sabbotage well applied. The "War of Classes" it is to be prepared by the elevation that all laborers have to make through their own intellect, reflecting, studying, changing so.

On this 1st of May of workingmen's blood each slave of salary face then the nicest healthy bath for himself and for the common cause. The consciences be renovated, our souls be sharpened to the faith in ourselves, our strength be organized for the defence of today and for tomorrow's assault upon the Bourgeois world.

The cowards remain aside, the daring come forward ready for our "war of classes."

The bones of our martyrs, the bones of the proletariat dragged by living force increased by the war of Kings and of the mighty we will use them to strike on our drums calling the gathering armies of labor to the complete conquest of liberty and justice.

And so we shall do the day when closed in destructive avalanches moving with "torch and axe" against our enemies, the "State," the "church," the "Capitalism," with the terrible cry: "It is the Revolution that passes, it is the war of classes" that destroys a world of infamies to create the Social Justice.

Proletariat, to you!

The following is a translation of a Russian pamphlet called "Anarchism Communism," 1916, no author named, recently circulated by anarchists in the United States:

Give a proposal to present society about building new prisons, new asylums, make a proposition to hire new Pinkertons, to build new weapons of murder, and thousands will support you and use all their energy to bring to life your proposition. Should you try to convince society that human being are not wild animals and do not need chains or cages, tell them that we can exist without rulers or tyrants, without Pinkertons or weapons of murder, without barbaric laws and lawmakers, and they will take you for crazy, for a trespasser upon order, and if you should try to spread your convictions you will be thrown in prison or hanged. More yet, the very people who are suppressed and in whose interests you are fighting against their slavery and even the foremost element of this mass will look at you with foresight and thought and say to you, "Truly brother you are right. We are robbed, we are suppressed, but to get rid of these robbers and suppressors all at once it is impossible. We can change the chains for smaller chains, the blood drinkers for smaller blood drinkers, big barbaric laws for small barbaric laws, but to exist without a government, without any written laws, just a fool can demand that!"

Now, let's see. Must a man be crazy to look for liberation from all government, from all barbaric laws, or is it that all governments and all barbaric laws have their power at the present time just because most people in society are marked candidates for houses of demented! Those who desire liberation from all government in whatever the government may be and from all written laws whatever their condition may be, these people are called Anarchists. The word Anarchism means no-Government. It is that Anarchism strives for such society where one man will not rule over the other, where everybody will be equal in his human rights, what can be a more simple and natural desire than that the other man should not command over me and what can be more honest and better goal for such society where I shall not be in power to command over others? It is necessary yet to bring facts of learning to prove this—that to command others or to be under the power of somebody else is a terrible crime of human liberty and happiness?

More healthy will sound the arguments against no-government if we will show the birth and development of all rulers and governors. Vileness, ignorance and darkness is the mother of all government. Cruelty, slavery and mass-killing their children when humanity was still in infancy in the first steps of development and has still lived in so-called tribes for generations, as now the yellow Indians, and from them have come the first types of rulers and governors. They were those wild people who possessed physical power and have showed up in their battles with wild animals and in bloody wars against other wild tribes: sometimes for a woman and sometimes for the skin of an animal; or they have discharged their superiority by killing everybody who was in their way. From these bandits of the woods have come our rulers and our governments. And this is the iron from which for centuries they have forged chains for the supporting of humanity and they have choked on every step the free spirit of humanity.

It would take a long time to get acquainted with all the phases of development through which they went until they have reached the present standing of "civilized" governments. I shall only state how many and what forms they have accepted throughout the time of their existence, what names they have adopted and what masks they wore. But there is one conclusion, one absolute fact—ignorance, tyranny and robbery have remained the constant properties of all governments. Under the cloak of a republican government person is hidden the wild bandit of the woods who is ready to choke the first one who will stand up and protest against his lying, politics and despotism. The difference is just that the wild man is satisfied with the flesh of animals and the present rulers crave for human flesh and blood. We can say that government has never reached to such banditry as at the present time; together with religion which darkens the minds of the people, together with the robbers of the poor working people, the government stands now like iron rocks upon the back of the workingman. What person with a healthy mind, with a spark of honesty and human feeling will not with the price of his last drop of blood get rid and absolutely destroy all forms of government and rulers in human society. The ground upon which have and still stand the present governments which is flooded with innocent blood and where committed crimes are praised to Heaven, a thousand yearly corrupt and rottenest prostitutes have made their nest there. On such ground there is no place for anything that is human. This can not be reformed or cured. Such contagious disease must be destroyed, absolutely destroyed. The word government has no place in the dictionary of free people. Whatever name you may apply to the word power, government power, their problem will remain the same. Their suppression and their work are causes for forging new chains. These chains they call laws but in reality these schemes will remain for better exploitations and the unarmed and ignorant person. From everything that I have said until now it is clear that every healthy thinking man is morally bound to combat against any form of government, against the power of any written law, which seem not more than the weapon of the tyrants thrust against the poor and ignorant people. But (and this is a capital "but") political freedom is not freedom yet. In order to enjoy full liberty we must also be free economically, and therefore we are not only Anarchists but also Communists. We know the present history of Capitalism. We are convinced that private ownership is not more than the result of a thousand yearly robberies of the strong upon the weak. That the present so-called government is a gigantic bandit gang composed of ordinary thieves, parasites, lazy and political charlatans. With the assistance of priests of different beliefs who are assisted with hired blood-thirsty dogs with rifles and cannon that rob us. Whatever they find in everything that the working class produces with blood and sweat, this gang have grabbed in their power; all means of industry, machines, instruments, land and everything that is found upon the earth and in the earth belongs to them. This is their sacred ownership. A long period of robbery and murder have given them right by law to hang a lock upon all the prisons of nature, upon the fruits of someone else's labor, and now to have bread and means of existence we must sell our working power these bandits not to become a bandit ourselves if opportunity presents itself to become such. The working man at the present time finds himself under the iron foot of the capitalist. He has no assigned place to sleep in. He is not sure that he will have a piece of bread for dinner. He is a slave and possibly a more unfortunate slave in comparison with slavery that has been. I do not think that it is necessary to recount to you all bloody dramas of life which are played among the poor classes on account of barbaric slavery. Who does not know the sorrowful heartbreaking pictures of the working man's life? Whose heart can remain silent when you see that young innocent men, women and children in the prime of their lives must suffer in the cells of hired slavery? Who does not sadder at the thought that his brother may soon need to commit a terrible crime or that his sister may come to the shameful sale of herself in order to quiet their hunger!! Whose heart does not become full of sorrow by reading newspaper items that in another place in the shafts were buried alive several hundred miners leaving wives and children, who maybe will be compelled to ask charity or will be driven to become prostitutes and suicides? Who is responsible for the numberless victims of the capitalist tyranny, for the crushed life and for the corpse of the miners? Everything called for revenge, for revenge for the innocent human blood which is shed daily by the low-browed rulers of present society! What man, whose thinking apparatus is not impaired, whose human feelings have not died out entirely, will not adjudge to death such barbaric society? Who decides a coward or an idiot will refuse to stand in line with those who desire to overthrow the bloody thrones of a barbaric government? Capitalist society must be overthrown and this can only be accomplished by a social revolution. It is folly to think that with these bandits of the woods anything can be accomplished in a peaceful way. If it was really possible to end the present slavery system without shedding blood the Anarchists probably would be the first to try to join the blood seekers; but children only may think that the present capitalist society will turn over their privileges and all their robbed riches without a terrible bloody battle, an enormous war of the union workingman over the whole world against their robbers and suppressors is the only route to liberate the people and that day is not far when the war will check all the despotic thrones and will tear asunder the chains of slavery. The capitalist society must clear the place for a new communist society. All the production of industry and the riches of the world are produced by the working man and therefore it would be logic and right that all these riches should be used by those who have a part in creating them. We are not in accord with the Socialists who say that in the future society the strong will have it over the weak; they say "Everyone will receive pay in accordance with what he can produce and the one that is stronger will be able to earn more than I." This idea of the strong and weak is the route of capitalist society. In the free communist society everyone will work in accordance with his strength and receive what he needs. In the human family there can reign holy peace of happiness and brotherly love. Nature possesses enough riches for all its children, enough wheat and rye for all humanity. The supposition that human society is not ready for a new communist life has no foundation and is an absolute lie. Everyone agrees to change a prison for a palace, dry bread for sweet roasts, the whip of the slave merchant for a free family life. It is understood, if he has the opportunity to do so. The man at the present is cruel on account of his endless battle for existence which is on account of the bitter insults which he receives daily from his employers. Throw off from him the yoke of slavery, surround him with conditions of freedom and human life, give him opportunity to work three or four hours a day (more than that a person need not work for his existence in the future society) and to work not under the whip of a foreman but in society of free brothers and to have everything that is necessary to satisfy the necessities of a free man, then but a crazy person will be able to commit a crime against his equals. The terrible economic conditions are the cause of 99% of crimes in present society and for these causes present society more and more develops robbery, murder, prostitution and suicide. In a free communist society where everyone will have the opportunity to live a free happy life, all desires of the present capitalist system will be ruined and all prisons, gallows and asylums for feeble minded will disappear together with political society in which we live at the present time.

I think whatever I said is enough to convince a person who is not a fanatic that Anarchism Communism is not a fancy but an educational society system. The development of Capitalism from one side and the dying out of government and reverse fanaticism on the other hand will enable us to establish Anarchism Communism in the future society. Only society which is based upon the freedom and equality of brotherhood is enabled to reach the higher creed of physical and spiritual development. Political freedom without economical freedom if not freedom and economical freedom without equality is no freedom.

Anarchism Communism unites in itself political and economical freedom and also equality. It is therefore the higher ideal of liberty loving people. The ideal to reach which we can sacrifice everything is the ideal which will equalize those who will work for it and fight for it.

The following circular, printed in English in red ink, was recently distributed in the Eastern section of the United States:

WORKINGMAN!

You Must understand the fundamentals of Revolutionary Socialism if you are to free yourself from the yoke of Capitalism. You must do as your fellow workers in Russia and Germany have done, prepare yourselves for the final conflict with the master class.

And to prepare yourselves for the coming Revolution, you must understand the capitalist system, how it arose, how it developed, and why it must inevitably fall.

You must educate yourselves on the working class science revolutionary socialism. Do not fail to come to this lecture.

The following is a translation from a Lettish newspaper called "Atballs" (English "Echo"), published by the Lettish Publishing Co., 371 Willis Avenue, New York City, John P. Apsit, editor:

[From page 15.]

VICTORY DAY IN BOSTON.

A great Victory Day has been November 11th and there are two worlds rejoicing over it. One is the bloodthirsty imperialistic world and the other one is the new world of highest ideals. The proletarian Bolshevik world on one side, celebrating with the imperialistic group or the unorganized masses of labor, while on the other side is a small handful of well organized proletarians.

The proletarians are glad to see all these reactionary forces on the edge of their grave, while the imperialistic groups are swelled by their victories, while the red flags are hauled down from the castles of the Czars and Kaisers.

The 11th of November at Boston, the Lettish Organizations were united in a big mass meeting with speeches and music in the evening at the Dudley Street Opera House, which was filled to overflowing with an international audience. It was certainly one fine international night. It was on that night that the Socialistic progressive paper called "The Revolutionary Age" saw its birth with some of the ablest American writers, who are supporting the Bolshevik cause, as its editors.

[From page 7.]

PEACE CRIES.

You may shout all you want for peace but it is not peace. Our party is at war and we are fighting already on the field of battle * * * one side says the war is finished, while the other says we have just started. Congress of the U. S. is preparing for something by building more ships. Just now the American soldiers and sailors are murdering Russian peasants and workers. It is possible that the next day the American youths will be sent against the organized Bolshevik army which has not yet fully shown what it can do.

[From page 8.]

We are standing now at the door of a new civilization and the capitalists are thrusting their swords against this progress like a wall of steel but don't you let them fool you, Bolshevism is nothing else than working class government. That is why the capitalist press does not like the Bolsheviks. The Russian Soviet government is 95% made up of working people and it is the most democratic form of government in the world today. The proletarian dictatorship must conquer all the world of parasites and slave owners. This proletarian of the working class government is an enemy only for those who are standing in its way. * * * The war has started, the organized fight is to begin between capitalism and international Socialism. The workers of America do all you can to uphold your sons and brothers against those who want to hand industrial democracy and retard civilization of the world. We ask; why, if the white guards are murdering thousands of workers in Finland, why doesn't America and the other allied powers interfere to stop this butchering of the red guards. Why did the allies and America interfere when Czarism was against the principles of the civilized world, crushing the working class. Was this all paper talk? The invasion of Russia is only for the purpose of forcing the Russian nation to pay the interest on the money that the allies lent to the Russian government. Money, with which the government of the Car tried to enslave the Russian people.

Comrade: We cannot keep quiet and neglect to work at this fight, while our comrades in Europe are risking their lives to fight our battle, while they need all the organized help and our help to get control of the world by a proletarian dictatorship. We cannot accept the imperialism of America which is preparing to keep us in an economic situation that is in harmony with the capitalistic history of the past. Workers of America, including women, show our comrades in Europe you do not pay attention to what our capitalist tells you in favor of an invasion of Russia. You don't need to allow them to put you to sleep with the dream of peace when there is none. Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. The hour has sounded for the working class dictatorship and Bourgeoisie in America cannot stop it. All proletarians of all lands unite—you have nothing to lose but your chains and a world to gain.

[From page 16.]

Sunday November 17th there was a meeting arranged by the Lettish Bolshevik Organization of Greater Boston, with an attendance of more than 3000 and many hundreds who could not get into the hall. The speakers were our comrades the English speaking Bolshevik editors of some of our papers, MacAlpine, Fraina, Weinstein of "Novy Mir" and the Finnish Socialistic Republics representative Nuorteva. The applause was tremendous and resolutions were passed to support the revolution in Germany and in Russia.

[From page 6.]

The counter revolution is in a sad plight. The Czecho Slovaks can no longer massacre Bolsheviks. The Czecho Slovak Gen. Sirolijs has laid down his troubles in the New York Times, stating that the Czecho Slovaks must have help from the allies or they will give up the fight. It seems they want to go home. He said that the Allies did not help his troops very much and he has a front of about 750 miles to hold. At Ufa the Bolsheviks blocked their lines. It will be hard to hold the Bolsheviks back because they are mobilizing all of Russia. They are to have ready for next spring three to four million well trained Bolshevik soldiers with plenty of ammunition and with officers from the German, Austrian and Hungarian armies in Russia. The war only began.

The following is a list of secretaries of Socialist locals in the State of Georgia:

N. A. Craig, Pittsburg, Georgia.
 H. C. Harris, 217 Broadway, Macon, Georgia.
 M. C. Harwell, 113 Capitol Square, Atlanta, Georgia.
 Lewis Shapiro, 140 Capitol Square, Atlanta, Georgia.
 R. H. Heard, 1321 Emmett Street, Augusta, Georgia.
 S. Crovitz, 71 Reynolds Street, Waycross, Georgia.
 Harry Applebaum, 136 East Broad Street, Savannah, Georgia.
 J. T. Shackleford, Bremen, Georgia.
 J. P. Ligon, 1304 Broadway, Columbus, Georgia.
 V. H. deBrant, Route #3, Midland, Georgia.
 W. E. Johns, Tifton, Georgia.
 Willie J. Taylor, Route A, Donaldsonville, Georgia.
 Mary Hicks, 146 Evans Street, Bainbridge, Georgia.
 O. R. Larkin, Buchannon, Georgia.
 W. C. Holmes, Wildwood, Georgia.

Following are members at large, Socialists of Georgia:

Julius Davidson, Scotland, Georgia.
 William Raoul, 252 West Fifteenth Street, New York City.
 G. T. Harrison, Box 584, Fort Valley, Georgia.
 T. M. Abercrombie, Roopville, Georgia.
 R. G. Cox, Bonifay, Florida.
 Rueben Hoffman, 116 Cotton Avenue, Americus, Georgia.
 Aug Andrae and H. V. Haronis, Lakemont, Georgia.

Following are alleged to be Socialists in communication with Mrs. Mary Roual Millis, Atlanta, Ga.:

G. F. Willis, Route 1, Adairsville, Georgia.
 Mrs. Bertha H. Mailly, 7 East 15th Street, New York City.
 Miss M. L. McNorton, 527 Candler Building, Atlanta, Georgia.
 G. A. LaFayette, 1507 Grand Avenue, St. Louis, Missouri.
 Mrs. Thomas McWhinney, 101 Ponce de Leon Avenue, Atlanta, Ga.
 Harold Pratt, 168 West Wood Avenue, Akron, Ohio.
 Mrs. J. Frank Beck, 86 West 12th Street, New York City.

The following is a translation of an anarchistic circular in the Italian language recently distributed:

To the Italian journalists who came to America to observe? to study and to pray.

It is the refractory salute, and it is also the discordant voice in the interested chorus or unconscious of the praises and approval. It is above all the serene voice proud of truth that will never be spoken by the cynical editors of the weekly follies, nor by the illiterate scribblers of bankrupting newspapers nor by the vain cackle of the colonial puppets, nor by the triumphant skepticism of some sane pen, immune from illicit trading, and much less by the anaemic pens and haughty ignorance of your English speaking colleagues.

But why do we turn directly to you? Who have been called here to applaud the majestic portent of a nation, who in less than a year knows how to organize a powerful warlike machine and operate it with surprising regularity and precision? And we know that you are powerless and that even if you had power you would not dare to use it. You will come upon painful evidences that must be kept under silence and you will keep silence because you will not have the courage to face unpopularity among the bank's public, persecution and discomfort. But while speaking to you we are speaking to the people over the ocean, deceived by the high sounding exhibitions of Democracy of the great North American republic. Perhaps tomorrow we will go across the ocean, caressed by the audacious American liberties and we will tell to the people of Italy to the admiring and deceived people of Europe all about the praiseworthy democratic principle of the great western republic, as the thousand refugees of the Czars government have done when they reentered the people's Russia.

For the present we address ourselves to you, that is, to the friend and upholders of the coward acts of democracy, more as a matter of monition than as a hope that sound and free thoughts of straightforward truth will prevail in you.

Some of you know this land of heavy ignorance and shameless commercialism, unless in the young days of the confederation you passed through it sheepishly blind. Many of you have probably been deceived by the indulgent impression of Dario Papa. [Dario Papa was an eminent journalist who came to America back in 1882 and when he returned to Italy published his impressions of this country.—This is a note of the translator.]

Perhaps the observation of the spirit of enterprise, the ability for organization, the impetus of the will and action of the North American money class, will arouse your enthusiastic admiration and you will not investigate further and study of what pain and of what composition is the matter that forms the gigantic gear of the war machine.

But if it is the duty of journalists to go over the barriers of interestedly limited engagements and you will scrutinize into the institutions and the functions of these institutions that the democratic haughtiness desires to present to the world's people who are waiting for a panacea for their troubles, you will then come to truthful conclusions that will offend your enthusiasm for the classic republic, that the secular Italian thought presents to you on each page of able thinkers that will idolize and elevate life.

These truths will not be spoken by the interested voices surrounding you. These truths are withheld, by some for the love of the Fatherland, by others as a natural consequence of their habitual falsehoods.

We have no such pudicities.

We have objured the fatherland as poorly conceived by the dominant alagarthies, because we do not desire to be classed with the Cammorists representing a vulgar fatherland, with the thieving bankers, with the stained prominence, with the vien beautiful by the eradication contained in five cent pamphlets, with the people of Saint Rocco and her numerous madonnas festooned as so many servants on a holiday, it is an action that nauseates, causes wretching and humiliates.

We know of no frontiers although we dream of people, and first of all, because the nearest, the Italian people, we dream the serene joys that the poet of our race probably the most representative of the ideal of our people, sung across the two ages.

We have no such pudicities; nor any tremors of fear, as men, not shaken by the arrogant menace of the brutalized law, and not fooled by the interested flatteries of the ruffians in power, we will scorn the legend of liberty and democracy.

Although arrived last among the legislative tyranny, in less than six months the great Republic has been able to add to the "corpus juris" of the brutal persecution, a "trading with the enemy act" and a "sedition bill", a project of proscription against the anarchist and other series of minor administrative measures that form the delight of those who love the simple and holy ignorance of the inert mind.

This as to theory! The practical side is still more edifying! Even if observed during periods when not menaced by any enemy.

Tom Mooney has the hangman's noose at his throat, guilty of no misdeeds, except that of professing ideas that are damaging to the interests of the greedy rabble of San Francisco California plutocrats. And it is due to the timely and healthy echo that reperculated in Russia, if the hirelings of the Cræsus have not as yet cut off his last hopes of escaping with his life from their nails.

It is only a few years since and the enumeration would be too long—that the Ludlow matter happened, perpetrated by the will and for the defense of one of those monsters of "Gorkian" impression and capacious fauces that feeds the gold of their safes with the vermillion blood of the humble working people. And Bayonne, sinister with the brutal provocation; and the provocation and massacre of Milwaukee Mich and the pale flames of the race hatred of East St. Louis, Missouri and the insisting lynchings are singing the glorious songs of the democratic goodness of the great republic, not unworthy with remaining side by side with the monarchy of the cripple heir of perfidious Savoy and to attain the post of honor with the records of Czarism and the bestiality of its Cossacks.

It is also of yesterday the sinister sentence of the "Industrial Workers of the World", whose only guilt was that of remaining loyal to the economic exigencies of which they have unfurled the flag.

And if facing the red hot mob made idiotic by the pulpit or the newspapers, or by the cinematographs you will complacently smile and you will be delighted to see them hurl themselves against those who do not bend during the present tragic hours, that has also overturned you and you will find in all that a proof of the sovereignty of the people which does not admit of dissents and corrects the laws with lynching, with the noose around Frank Little's throat with mass tarring uprights the pudence of the law. Oh! do not imprecate at the Russian mobs, at the Russian soldiers, and shed tears on the Imperial carrion of Nicholas Romanoff, nor do get possess if the Japanese mobs forseeing privations find the superb manner of unloosing to revolt and impose on the regent souls a larger consideration of their own necessities. Do not imprecate at the sonorous voice of dynamite that lowers all boldness and has yet in safe keeping the last spark that will start the vast fire of reparation.

All the world is a country and the system of vile and bold domination remains, even if the form of it is changed. You may be proud of the statutory liberties reclaimed in the Italian land by the shots of Gaetano Bresci, but an ounce—if perchance sometime you are able to go over your usual sedateness and sordid calculation of unconfined thought—that no matter under what form domination is cloaked, it is always the surly guardian of the interests of the few to the detriment of the universal right of the poor people. And it is his German egoistic disposition that must be overthrown in each hemisphere and in all latitudes.

It is a task above your appointment, outside of your programme.

And you will have enough to occupy your time "drinking, belching and kneeling."

The solution of the problem is up to more lithe muscles, to better tensed nerves.

The blind deities and humanity's health are participating the spasmodic crisis, full of blood hatred and fury to an incoerceable violence.

For you nothing will remain but the dead pool of mediocrity and easy contentment.

Signed The Bandits of All Laws.

TRANSLATION OF ANARCHISTIC PAPER, PUBLISHED IN ITALIAN LANGUAGE.

[Cronaca Sovversiva (Subversive Chronicle), Lynn, Mass., May 26, 1917.]

1.—The proposed law for compulsory military service has secured, excepting some few formal amendments, the full approval of the House and the Senate, and the final consent of President Wilson, and is now the law of the land: one more benediction of most civilized warfare, one more shame of the great republic, which thereby destroys the last of its democratic traditions as well as the letter and spirit of its fundamental pact, if "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude . . . shall exist within the United States, or in any place subject to their jurisdiction; for there is not in the world any professor of constitutional law who would deny that military slavery is the most opprobrious and the most detestable of all forms of involuntary servitude.

The writer invites attention to the fact that the law applies only to citizens and those who have declared their intention to become citizens and then proceeds as follows:

2.—Who can tell what will happen tomorrow? Whether for the country of adoption or for that of origin, whether for civil, industrial or agricultural mobilization, may it not affect also the men not intended by the law for immediate military conscription?

And is it not a sagacious piece of politics, killing two birds with one stone, to have them all registered, all on hand, know where they come from, where they are, what they are good for, what they are thinking, and to be able on any occasion to require them to go to the docks, the arsenals, the railways, to make ammunitions, to till the soil, sweep the streets, exploit them, keep them on hand for Pincare, for George, to send them wherever the exigencies of the war require, to take the place of those who have died at the front, who are dying every day and who will die for months and years to come; to relegate the subjects of the Kaiser or of Mohammed in some trenches, to seize indocile subversives [i. e., anarchists], to drive them to prison—

The writer then indulges in invective against the indifferent, the unthinking, those lacking in will power and organization, and tells them it is their own fault if they are to be food for cannon, and continues:

3.—But, is there no escape left? Supposing we refuse to register, and, instead of rushing to the registration office on Tuesday June 5th, we were to take to the road, where there is plenty of good air, what could they do to us?

Then, he cites the penalty provided for by the law of May 17, 1917.

4.—From the frying pan on the live coal; what is your advice?

We are not giving any advice in this matter, my sons. Not to the subversives [i. e., anarchists] who know how to find their way, without a spiritual father, and to pursue it fearlessly without any other compass than his conscience, without any other itinerary than his intimate feeling of satisfaction, no advice is given to those others who would not have the courage and force to follow it, and who are these days knocking at the doors of the groups and of the subversive papers asking for advice and help.

5.—No advice, therefore, but an honest examination of what the new law means and the consequences of the different attitudes it suggests.

6.—Register? Then you begin to sanction arbitrary action.

The writer points out that the law of May 17 limits the President's power by specifying that it is applicable to citizens of certain ages, and that—

7.—Compulsory registration of such as are not American citizens and have not declared their intention to become naturalized is "inconsistent with the terms of the Act" of May 18th, 1917; it is therefore arbitrary. And you have the right, by the terms of that very law, to refuse to register.

The writer warns the readers that the registration in question is not for the purpose of learning their existence in the world, and that if the reason therefor is not given it is for fear of discouraging them, of causing them to rebel or take to the country.

8.—No sooner will they have you in hand than they will send you to the front among the first, to expiate for the three years of antipatriotic hiding.

They register you in order to dispose of your hides, to take you on the first occasion.

9.—Not register?

They will arrest you, if there are only a few dozen of you that refuse, for if you are a few thousand, many thousands—and judging by the wind that is blowing it appears that there will be dozens of thousands—they will have no desire to infuriate you nor enough prisons to lock you up.

They will arrest you and may condemn you to one day in prison, two weeks, three months, in a desperate case, to one year.

But still it is not your skin they are getting.

Yes, but don't they register you all the same?

We agree, perfectly, they register you at once, but with an experience; that they register you by force, that you are a rascal, refractory to arbitrary acts, refractory to military service, refractory to any tribute of industrial or political mobilization; they register you but with the certainty that, if they send you to the barracks, you will be the cause of scandal and indiscipline, that you will be the worst kind of warrior if they send you to the front, that you will waste the grain if they send you to harvest, that you will resort to sabotage on frame works, turner's wheels, roads, telephones, locomobiles, cotton, wool, forage, if they conscript you by force, against your will or inclination, in any class of the various mobilizations.

There are ninety chances out of a hundred that you will let you go as lost, or, at least, that you will be the last one they will look for.

Weigh the probable consequences of the various attitudes, and if you have the courage and backbone to resist odious usurpation, if you aim to devote your life to the most noble tasks and not to be a lasquet, a cutthroat, a pliveman, if you have ideals to which you devote most nobly your fervor, your abnegation, your bread, don't go to register.

In conclusion the writer declares that the old order of things is crumbling and ironically calls upon the slaves to run to its assistance.

10.—Engrave in the golden book of imminent conscription your name and your shame.

The following is a translation of an article from a Spanish anarchistic newspaper called Regeneracion, published at Los Angeles, Cal., issue of March 16, 1918, which reads as follows:

MANIFEST.

The assembly of Organization of the Mexican Liberal Party, to the members of the Party, the Anarchists of the whole World, and the Workingmen in General.

COMPANIONS: The clock of History will soon point with its hands inexorable the instant producing death to this society already agonizing.

The death of the old society is close at hand, it will not delay much longer and only those will deny the fact whom its continuation interests; those that profit by the injustice in which it is based, those that see with horror the approach of the Revolution for they know, that on the following day they will have to work side by side with their former slaves.

Everything indicates, with force of evidence that the death of the bourgeoisie society will come unexpectedly. The citizen with grim gaze looks at the Policeman whom only yesterday he considered his protector and support; the assiduous readers of the bourgeoisie Press shrugs the shoulders and drops with contempt the prostituted sheet in which appear the declarations of the Chiefs of State; the working man goes on strike not taking in account that by his action he injures the country's interests, conscious now that the country is not his property but is the property of the rich; in the street are seen faces which clearly show the interior torment of discontent, and there are arms that appear agitated to construct barricades; murmurs in the saloons, in the theatres, in the street cars, in each home, especially in our homes, in the homes of those below where is mourned the departure of a son called to the war, or hearts oppressed and eyes moistened when thinking that tomorrow, perhaps today even, the boy who is the joy of the hut, the youngster who with his frankness and gentility wraps in splendour the gloomy existence of the parents in senescence will be by force torn from the bosom of the family to face, gun in hand, another youngster who like himself was the enchantment of his home and whom he does not hate and can not hate for he even does not know him.

The flames of discontent revived by the blow of tyranny each time more enraged and cruel in every country and here and there everywhere and in all parts, the fists contract, the minds exalt, the hearts beat violently, and where they do not murmur they shout, all sighing for the moment in which the calloused hands during hundred centuries of labor, they must drop the ferocious tools, and grab the rifle which nervously awaits the caress of the hero.

Companions: The moment is solemn, it is the moment preceding the greatest political and social catastrophe that History registers; the insurrection of all people against existing conditions.

It will be surely a blind impulse of the masses which suffer, it will be without a doubt, the disorderly explosion of the fury restrained hardly by the revolver of the bailiff and the gallows of the hangman; it will be the overflow of all the indignation and all the sorrows and will produce the chaos, the chaos favourable to all who fish in turbid waters; chaos from which may sprout new oppressions and new tyrannies for in such cases, regularly, the charlatan is the leader.

It falls to our lot, the intellectual, to prepare the popular mentality until the moment arrives, and while not preparing the insurrection, since insurrection is born of tyranny.

Prepare the people not only to await with serenity the grand events which we see glimmer, but to enable them to see and not let themselves be dragged along by those who want to induce them, now over a flowery road, towards identic slavery and a similar tyranny as today we suffer.

To gain that the unconscious rebelliousness may not forgo with its own hands, a new chain that anew will enslave the people, it is precise, that all of us, all that do not believe in government, all that are convinced that Government whichever its form may be, and whoever may be the head, it is tyranny, because it is not an institution created for the protection of the weak, but to support the strong, we place ourselves at the height of circumstances and without fear propagate our holy anarchist ideal, the only just, the only human, the only true.

To not do it, is to betray knowingly the vague aspirations of the populace to a liberty without limits, unless it be the natural limits, that is, a liberty which does not endanger the conservation of the specie.

To not do it, is giving free hand to all those who desire to benefit merely their own personal ends through the sacrifice of the humble.

To not do it, is to affirm what our antagonists assure, that the time is still far away when our ideals will be adopted.

Activity, activity and more activity is the demand of the moment.

Let every man and every woman who loves the anarchist ideal propagate with tenacity, with inflexibility, without heeding sneer not measuring dangers, and without taking on account the consequences.

Ready for action and the future will be for our Ideal.

Land and Liberty

Given in Los Angeles, State of California, United States of America the 6th day of March—1918.

RICARDO FLORES MAGON, Librado Rivera.

NOTE:—Answers to this Manifest forward to Ricardo Flores Magon. P. O. Box 1236. Los Angeles, Cal. U. S. A.

DOCUMENTS SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD BY SENATOR STERLING.

Senator STERLING. I submit the following documentary matter relating to the activities of the I. W. W. and the Non-Partisan League.

First, an excerpt from Bulletin No. 42 of the Agricultural Workers' Organization of date May 27, 1917, and addressed to "Fellow workers":

A. W. O. CONVENTION.

The convention will convene at Kansas City, Mo., May 30, at 9 a. m. You should be there if possible. You will learn facts about internal affairs of the organization and be better able to protect the union against similar trouble in future. You will have your say in regards to the wage scale to be adopted this summer. Then there is the proposition of the farmer that will be called upon to consider. Arthur Leuer has been appointed by the farmers organization to come to our convention and tell us just what the farmers of N. Dak. think should be done so that much of the trouble that formerly existed between the farmers and the workers can be overcome.

* * * * *

Don't forget the Tom Mooney case. The law and order gang are now attempting to save their own miserable reputations at the expense of Rena Mooney. Labor must expose that gang of respectful murders, who would take the life of innocent workers, by means of a dirty frame up, simply for amusement.

(Signed)

FORREST EDWARDS, Sec'y Treas'r.
PETE DAILEY, Chairman Committee.

The "Arthur Leuer" referred to in the first excerpt above is evidently Arthur Le Sueur, to whom reference is made in other documents submitted.

I submit also the following copy of letter from Forrest Edwards to W. D. Haywood of date May 24, 1917, written on the letterhead of the Agricultural Workers' Organization of the I. W. W. No. 400, which letter, it appears, was a part of the evidence in the trial of W. D. Haywood and more than 90 other members of the I. W. W. at Chicago, Ill.:

[Agricultural Workers Organization of the I. W. W., No. 400. "In Organization is Strength." One Union. One Label. One Enemy. Forrest Edwards, Sec'y-Treas.; P. O. box 1776, Minneapolis, Minn. Office address, Room 602-604 Sykes Block, 256 Hennepin Avenue, Minneapolis, Minn. Telephone, N. W. Nicollet 5365. Organization committee: Pete Daily, Chairman; E. H. Groves, Ted Fraser, Pat Klicoyne, E. N. Osborne, J. J. McDonnell, G. J. Bourg. Branch offices: Kansas City, Mo.; Sioux City, Iowa; Spokane, Wash.; Sacramento, Cal.; Los Angeles, Cal.; Missoula, Mont.; North Yakima, Wash.; Augusta, Kans.; Omaha, Nebr.; Des Moines, Iowa; Duluth, Minn.; Fresno, Cal.; Bemidji, Minn.; Milwaukee, Wis.; St. Maries, Idaho; Tulsa, Okla.]

[From I. W. W., Chicago, Ill. J. D. O. 1/3/18.]

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., May 24, 1917.

W. D. HAYWOOD,

164 West Wash St., Chicago, Ill.

FELLOW WORKER: Received your letter dated May 19 and in reply will state that we will need at least 70 thousand membership cards to handle the business of the A. W. O. We will initiate fifty thousand members in the A. W. O. this season and we will need a few in stock and in the hands of Delegates.

With reference to Literature, we have enough in stock now to carry us over the season.

Enclosed you will find a Blank to be printed. With reference to our letter of the 14th inst we would like to know whether you can get those cards printed there without much delay as we need them in connection with the cards for supply accounts. Let us hear from you in this regard. With best wishes, I am

Yours for O. B. U.,

FORREST EDWARDS.

P. S.—Say Bill, how about those delegates credentials? We need them now. Better send us about 500 immediately.

I have before me a copy of the minutes of the fifth semiannual conference of the Agricultural Workers Industrial Union, No. 400, of the I. W. W., which conference, according to the minutes, was held at Kansas City, Mo., May 30, 1917, in the I. W. W. Hall. From the proceedings of the fifth day's session of the conference I submit the following excerpt:

M. & S. (moved and seconded) that we give floor to Arthur LeSueur to explain what the grounds are on which we can meet & come to an understanding with the Non-partisan League with regard to working conditions in the harvest fields of No. Dakota. Carried. LeSueur's statement that farmers of No. Dak. would be willing to pay a wage of $5.00 for a 10 hr. day. Also that if we can come to some understanding with the Non-Partisan League of No. Dakota it will mean the balance of power will be shifted from the state government to the Industrial Workers of the World & Non-Partisan League. M. & S. (moved and seconded) that we ask wage & demand Comm to make written report.

Further excerpts from these same minutes are as follows:

That this body elect delegations from this floor to meet delegation from Non-Partisan League to try to come to some understanding agreeable to both parties. Accepted.

* * * * *

M. & S. that we elect a delegation of five to meet with equal number from Non-Partisan League at Mpls. Minn.

* * * * *

Those elected were Forrest Edwards, Ted Fraser, J. J. McDonnell, Arthur Boose and Eddie Post.

* * * * *

M. & S. That we send telegrams of greetings to all victims of the class war who are behind prison bars.

Minutes of last day read, corrected and accepted.

(Signed)

E. W. LATCHER, Rec. Secy of Sessions.

From the documentary evidence submitted at the Chicago trial I submit the following:

Copy of letter of recommendation to Mr. Arthur LeSueur and signed "General Secretary-Treasurer," evidently Forrest Edwards, dated August 12, 1916.

Also the original letter of Arthur LeSueur of date August 17, written on the letterhead of the People's College, Fort Scott, Kans.

I submit also the photographic copy of the letter written by Arthur LeSueur to William D. Haywood, April 5, 1917. It will be observed that the letter is written on the letterhead of the People's College, and that on said letterhead Eugene V. Debs's name appears as the chancellor of said college and Arthur LeSueur as the president. Arthur LeSueur was recognized as the attorney and counsellor of the Nonpartisan League.

Also a photographic copy of the letter of William D. Haywood to Arthur LeSueur of date April 11, and in reply to the above letter of Haywood of date April 5, and calling particular attention to this one sentence in the letter:

We realize first of all that in the great class war the place where we are started is at the point of production.

Also a photographic copy of a letter from LeSueur to Haywood of date June 20, 1917, addressed to Haywood as "Dear Fellowworker" at Chicago, Ill. and largely relating to prospective resistance to the selective-service act on the Minnesota range.

Also copy of letter written by Forrest Edwards to Albert Barr, of Tulsa, Okla., on June 16, 1917, which letter relates to the effort to get Arthur LeSueur to go to Kansas City to see what he can do toward getting Francik free.

From the bulletin of the Agricultural Workers Industrial Union of the I. W. W. of date July 3, 1917, I submit the following excerpt:

There will be a large meeting of the Farmers of the Non-Partisan League in Minot N. D. July 11-1917 when it is expected that the tentative agreement reached between the Comm of the I. W. W. & the N-P. L. will be fully ratified. Already the Capitalistic press is trying to discredit both organizations, to prevent an agreement being reached.

And from the bulletin of July 13 the following excerpt:

The Tentative Agreement between the Non-Partisan League & the Agricultural Workers Industrial Union #400 was drafted by joint committees elected to represent both organizations. It is expected that this agreement will cover the harvest season. That it will establish for the first time in the harvest fields, a uniform wage scale.

You will notice one clause in the agreement scratched out. This change was agreed to while the Secy was at Minot.

The Railroads have turned down the proposition. We will be required to travel in the old way unless the Non-Partisan League is successful at a future meeting with the Railroad Co. & secure free transportation.

The agreement was adopted at the Minot meeting & a resolution recommending that the Farmers of N. Dakota adopt it was passed with 10 opposing votes.

It may be argued by some that the Tentative Agreement is un-constitutional. That is not true. The I. W. W. Constitution has to do with signed agreements that are considered final. It has nothing whatever to do with a tentative agreement which is nothing but a verbal agreement after all. If the constitution of the I. W. W. is interpreted otherwise, then members cannot meet the employers of labor & agree to any set of demands. Frequently we read in our papers an account of where our members have gained job-control. That is, they have made a tentative agreement with the boss. So much for the constitutinality of the agreement. If this agreement was in force in Kansas at this time, instead of $3.00 to $4.00 per day, we would be getting $5.00 to $6.00.

The crop conditions are very poor from Minot east on the Rugby line. North of Devils Lake the prospects for a fair crop are good. The southeastern part of N. Dakota has fair prospects.

And from the bulletin of July 17 the following excerpt:

The proposed tentative agreement between the Non-Partisan League & the A. W. I. U. was turned down by the farmers at Valley City & Devils Lake N. Daka. The farmers of Minot & Bismarck voted in favor with some dissenting votes. The result of the farmers meetings break all chances of any agreement between the N-P. L. farmers & the A. W. I. U. Its now up to all the members to fight harder than ever for a 10 hour day & $5.00 scale.

And from the bulletin of August 17 the following excerpt:

Men are plentiful in N. Dakota & farmers are hiring all men thru the Commercial Clubs of Mpls., Grand Forks & Fargo. Get on the job thru the Commercial Clubs & save a lot of time, money & hardship on the road.

A bunch of mental perverts are touring the country in a Ford Car, making patriotic speeches to the farmers of N. Dakota & accusing the I. W. W. of being very unpatriotic because our members refuse to work for scab wages. This outfit is financed by the N. Dakota Standard & is responsible for the formation of the Home Defense League, which acts in the same capacity as plug-uglys of that type do in all strike zones. They call this outfit the patriotic squadron. If they run across the "cat" there is no knowing what may happen. The I. W. W. is not responsible for accidents, they may have as a result of their attempt to cause a riot.

A group of members at Devils Lake North Dakota have passed the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That all members of the A. W. I. U. #400 will donate one days wages for the relief of the Striking Miners & Lumberjacks."

(We would like to hear from every member on this. Write in & let us know what you think of it.) The Miners & Lumberjacks are still on strike stronger than ever. Funds are badly needed, give all you can.

The letters above submitted are here printed in the record, as follows:

[From I. W. W., Chicago, Ill. J. D. O. 1/3/18.]

MAY 28TH, 1917.

FOREEST EDWARDS,

Union #400, Box 1776, Minneapolis, Minn.

FELLOW WORKER: Yours of the 24th instant, with enclosures, received.

Will make arrangements to have at least 70,000 membership books on hand to handle the business of #400. I take it that you will need 10,000 of each new pamphlet that will be issued.

Will have Walker C. Smith's "Sabotage" and Abner Woodruff's "Evolution of Industrial Democracy" off the press at an early date.

Will have 1,000 of these "Application for Credentials" printed, and sent to you, with bill, from the Publishing Bureau, as soon as possible.

With best wishes, I am

Yours for Industrial Freedom.

GENERAL SECRETARY-TREASURER.

DH-HLS.

P. S.—200 Delegate Credentials have already been sent you. Am sending 300 more today.

[The People's College. J. I. Sheppard, president; Eugene V. Debbs, chancellor; Arthur LeSuer, vice president. "To remain ignorant is to remain a slave."]

[From I. W. W., Chicago, Ill.]

FORT SCOTT, KANS., August 17.

DEAR COMBADE AND FELLOW WORKER: I leave here 6.25 for Duluth. I have the credentials you sent & I will do my best to make things move while there.

Fraternally,

ARTHUR LESUEUR.

[Copy.]

AGRICULTURAL WORKERS ORGANIZATION OF THE I. W. W.,
Minneapolis, Minn., June 16, 1917.

ALBERT BARR,
 #6 W. Brady St., Tulsa, Oak.

FELLOW WORKER: Received yours of the 14th, and in regard to the $14.31 turned over by Boose, we are charging same to you.

We are trying to get Arthur LaSuer to go to Kansas City to see what he can do toward getting Francik free. The Militia have the key to the hall and refuse to let Broug or anyone in the hall. Wouldn't be surprised if the "Kitty" put in an appearance in K. C. very shortly.

With best wishes, we remain

Yours for O. B. U.

(Signed) FORREST EDWARDS.

[From I. W. W., Chicago, Ill. R. H. L.]

GOVERNMENT EXHIBIT NO. 809.

[The People's College. Eugene V. Debbs, chancellor; Arthur LeSueur, president; Alva A. George, vice president; F. A. McClaren, treasurer; Laura L. Reeds, secretary; Marian Wharton, editor College News. "For the education of the workers by the workers."]

FORT SCOTT, KANS., April 5, 1917.

Mr. WM. D. HAYWOOD,
 164 W. Washington St., Chicago, Ill.

FELLOW WORKER: Have just returned from Des Moines, Iowa, and am very glad to be able to report that all of the cases there are disposed of favorably and the boys at liberty. I think the Defense Committee is satisfied with the handling of the case. Of course, it was not one in which any labor principle was involved, and, therefore, the fight was simply made to get the boys out.

My expenses for the trip were $34.30 and if you will send me check for that it will clean the matter up.

How are you coming with the Minnesota proposition. I hope you don't start anything until the year has expired. This damned war business is going to make it mighty hard to do good organization work or good radical work of any kind, but I think the fight should be now centered against spy bills and conscription.

Have you heard from Pennsylvania with Powers of Attorney?

Yours for industrial freedom,

ARTHUR LESUEUR.

AL:Y

[From I. W. W., Chicago, Ill. R. H. L.]

APRIL 11, 1917.

ARTHUR LESUEUR,
 The People's College, Fort Scott, Kansas.

FELLOW WORKER: Yours of the 5th inst. received.

Enclosed find check for $34.30 which settles the account in connection with the cases at Des Moines of Mosacker, Williams, and Post.

There is nothing whatever that we can do to prevent the spy bills or conscription methods. All of those things will be passed if the master class feel that they need them. We realize first of all that in the great class war the place where we are started is at the point of production. Our slogan is—organize on the job. Our efforts are bringing results in spite of everything else that is going on at the present time.

Ed Rowan writes me from Scranton, Pennsylvania, that he is not having much success in getting signers for the powers of attorney. The miners cannot understand why they are called upon to sign a second and third time.

The investigation is still on at Massachusetts, and can give you no definite word at this time.

With best wishes, I am

ES.

[From I. W. W., Chicago, Ill. R. H. L.]

JUNE 13, 1917.

ARTHUR LE SEUER,

Peoples College, Ft. Scott, Kansas.

DEAR LE SEUER: On June 5th between forty and fifty members of the I. W. W. with Socialists, numbering in all 135 refused to register at Rockford, Illinois. These men marched in a body to the jail and gave themselves up to the sheriff, saying they declined to register and had come to go to jail for the offense.

They were locked up. Later I understand a number were badly beaten by deputy sheriffs and jail guards.

I learned this morning from a Scandinavian Socialist here in Chicago that the cases are coming up on June the 19th. The Socialists have asked just to co-operate with them giving the men a defense, to which of course they are fully entitled to.

The man who telephoned me mentioned Stedman of Chicago as a possible lawyer. I told him that if we were going in on the case, I much preferred you to represent the interest of our boys, and I would write you to see if you would handle the case.

Will it be possible for you to look after the interests of these members, and what would be your fee?

As the case now stands, it is, I believe, merely a misdemeanor, though they have one man, George Cully, under arrest charged with conspiracy, and of course there is no telling how serious the other cases may develop.

Let me hear from you soon.

With best wishes, I am

Yours for Industrial Freedom,

GEN. SEC'Y-TREAS.

WDH: OEB.

[From I. W. W., Chicago, Ill. R. H. L. File.]

2282 COMMONWEALTH AVE.,
St. Paul, Minn., June 20, 1917.

W. D. HAYWOOD,

164 West Washington St., Chicago, Ill.

DEAR FELLOW-WORKER: Your letter written on the 13th of June caught me this minute at St. Paul. It was delayed in Fort Scott. I sure would have enjoyed taking a stick in those cases and I hope I have not thru failure to receive your letter, prevented the boys from having real counsel in the cases.

Of course other arrangements have been made by this time. I will be at the address given above. I have resigned from the school and will get mail addressed here more promptly.

I hope things are moving along well with you. I look for trouble on the Minnesota Range when they begin prosecutions of the Slackers as they call them, for there is a bunch of real scrappers there, many of them left their native land to escape military conscription and will not lightly forgo their personal liberty here.

Being interested in iron as much as it is interested in men the Government will be put up against a hard game to play in case of a strike, and there is no telling what would develop.

I hope that the Department of Justice will realize that having enough registered for all purpose it had better quit and aid the government in the prosecution of the war, rather than to make war at home on these workers, but they may decide to go thru. There is no power on earth so prone to blunder as ignorance in authority.

Fraternally,

ARTHUR LESUEUR.

[Copy.]

AGRICULTURAL WORKERS ORGANIZATION OF THE I. W. W.,
Minneapolis, Minn., June 16th, 1917.

ALBERT BARR,

#6 W. Brady St., Tulsa, Oak.

FELLOW WORKER: Received yours of the 14th, and in regard to the $14.31 turned over by Boose, we are charging same to you.

We are trying to get Arthur LaSuer to go to Kansas City to see what he can do toward getting Francik free. The Militia have the key to the hall and refuse to let Broug or anyone in the hall. Wouldn't be surprised if the "Kitty" put in an appearance in K. C. very shortly.

With best wishes, we remain

Yours for O. B. U.

(Signed)

FORREST EDWARDS.

[From I. W. W., Chicago, Ill.]

AUGUST 12, 1916.

To Whom It May Concern:

Mr. Arthur Le Sueur, bearer, of Fort Scott, Kansas, is a lawyer of the Industrial Workers of the World. Any assistance that members of the Organization, or friends and sympathizers can render him will be sincerely appreciated.

Yours very truly,

GENERAL SECRETARY-TREASURER.

WDH:HLS.

Senator STERLING. Mr. A. C. Townley, of St. Paul, Minn., is the president of the National Nonpartisan League. On June 9, 1917, he made an address at Jamestown, N. Dak. Later, and during the campaign of 1918, the Nonpartisan Leader, organ of the Nonpartisan League, issued a "special composite edition" of the Nonpartisan Leader. The issue was without date, but was devoted to the interests of the league political campaign. Included in this special composite edition was the speech of Mr. Townley referred to. After the printing of this edition, however, four pages, namely, pages 11, 12, 21, and 22 were torn out, and the edition thus mutilated was circulated for campaign purposes. I give simply one excerpt of Mr. Townley's speech which had been thus suppressed:

So we demand here and now and all the time and we will continue to demand from this platform; from this roadside; from the housetops, from the city, from the country, if need be, from the Federal penitentiary, or even from the gallows—we will demand that this Nation, or the rulers of this Nation, fearing now not so much for us and our country as for yourselves, you rulers of this Nation, using the war now to multiply your millions of profits; we demand of you, afraid of the autocracy of Germany, if you fear that autocracy, may come across the water and rob you of the power to rob us: if you are afraid and you want us to go to war and give our lives we say to you that you must, you must send proof to us that you are sincere.

Mr. Townley was an avowed Socialist and, prior to the election in North Dakota in 1914, registered as such. The following is a copy of his registration slip or card, signed by him; the fact that he so registered has not, to my knowledge, ever been denied:

TOWNLEY'S REGISTRATION AS A SOCIALIST—REGISTRATION BLANK.

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
County of Golden Valley, ss:

I, the undersigned elector, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that my name and signature as signed below is my true name and signature. If I have not personally signed it, it is because it was signed at my request by the attesting officer. My age is 33 years and occupation farmer; nativity, American born. Present residence is in Sec. —, Twp. —, Range —, Golden Valley County, North Dakota; (or if city or town) at No. 3 ward, — street, in the city of Beach. Postoffice address, Beach, N. D.

I belong to the Socialist party; that I have resided in this state for one year immediately preceding this election. In testimony whereof I sign my name two times.

1. A. C. TOWNLEY, Elector.

2. A. C. TOWNLEY, Elector.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 11th day of April, 1914.

THEO. SCHAEFER,

Assessor in and for City of Beach district, Golden Valley County, North Dakota.

During the years 1917 and 1918, Mr. Lewis J. Duncan was State organizer for the Nonpartisan League in South Dakota, with headquarters at Mitchell, S. Dak., where was published the Nonpartisan Leader, the official organ for the league in the State of South Dakota. Mr. Duncan had, before coming to South Dakota, been twice elected as the Socialist mayor of the city of Butte, Mont. During his second term there was much disorder and rioting in the city of Butte, participated in by members of the I. W. W. and radical Socialists. It appears that Mr. Duncan made no attempt to suppress the rioting and disorder, and proceedings were instituted to oust him from his office.

I have here a certified copy of the judgment and decree rendered against Mr. Duncan on the 5th day of October, A. D. 1914, by the District Court of the Second Judicial District of the State of Montana, after what appears to have been a full hearing and trial before the court, in which Mr. Duncan was represented by several attorneys appearing as his counsel. The proceedings were instituted by one Peter Breen, a resident and taxpayer of said city of Butte.

I think the matter material to the inquiry as it relates to the activities of I. W. W. and radical Socialist elements, and also as having an important bearing on the character of the leadership of the Nonpartisan League and its tendencies, and submit for the record that portion of the findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment in the case against Mr. Duncan, beginning with paragraph 2:

2. That the said defendant, Lewis J. Duncan, has refused and neglected to perform the official duties pertaining to his office as Mayor of the said City of Butte; and particularly has he refused and neglected to perform the official duties pertaining to his said office in that on the 23rd day of June, 1914, large numbers of persons, many of them bearing arms, were unlawfully and riotously assembled on Main Street in said City, and while so assembled were engaged in riotous conduct and were destroying property and discharging fire-arms, and as a result one man was killed and one man wounded, and that certain building known as the Butte Miners Union Hall, destroyed, and other property damaged, all of which was wrongful and unlawful, and all of which was done at the hands of the said riotous assembly, and that the said defendant, Lewis J. Duncan, as the Mayor and one of the governing officers of the said city of Butte, was advised of such riotous assembly and of the conduct of the same, as hereinbefore set forth, and refused and neglected to go among the persons assembled, or as near to them as possible, and command them in the name of the State to immediately disperse, and refused and neglected in any other way or at all to disperse said riotous assembly, although he, the said Lewis J. Duncan, as the Mayor and one of the governing officers of the said city of Butte, was in and about the city hall of the said city of Butte during all of the time the said riotous assembly was engaged in its riotous and unlawful conduct, as aforesaid, and that at said time he had the police force of the said city of Butte at his command and many of them assembled in and about the said city hall, and that he made no effort through the said policemen under his command, or otherwise, to quell and disperse the said riotous assembly, and that the said riotous assembly, by reason of the said defendant's inaction and failure to disperse them, continued in their unlawful destruction of property for several hours during the night of June 23rd and early morning of June 24th, 1914.

3. That on the 27th day of August, 1914, in the said city of Butte, a large number of persons were unlawfully and riotously assembled in the said city of Butte, and while so unlawfully and riotously assembled, did then and there by force take, seize, have and imprison, against their will, Pat Towry, Martin Harkins, and Martin Glackin, all residents of the said city of Butte, and by force and violence the said unlawful and riotous assembly did unlawfully and wrongfully detain and imprison said Towry, Harkins and Glackin and require them and each of them to march through the streets of the city of Butte and to a vacant lot within the limits of the said city, and near the center of said city, and there forcibly, unlawfully, wrongfully and against their will, and while they were so imprisoned and detained, publicly conduct an alleged trial of said Towry, Harkins and Glackin, and after the said trial forcibly, violently, wrongfully, unlawfully and against the will of the said Towry, Harkins and Glackin, drive and deport the said Towry, Harkins, and Glackin from the city of Butte, and then and there threaten the lives of them and each of them if they should ever return to the said city, and that during the time the wrongful and unlawful acts above mentioned were being perpetrated by the said riotous assembly against the said Towry, Harkins and Glackin, and against the peace and dignity of the said city of Butte and of the State of Montana, the said defendant, Lewis J. Duncan, as Mayor and one of the governing officers of the said city, was then and there advised of said unlawful and riotous assembly and of their forcible, unlawful and wrongful acts, and was at said time requested, as such officer, to rescue and assist the said Towry, Harkins and Glackin, who were then and there being wrongfully, unlawfully and against their will held and detained, and he, the said defendant, Lewis J. Duncan, as Mayor and one of the governing officers of said city of Butte failed, refused and neglected to rescue and assist the said Towry, Harkins and Glackin, and refused and neglected in any manner then and there to perform the official duties pertaining to his office as Mayor of the said city of Butte.

4. That at various times during the present incumbency of the said Lewis J. Duncan, as Mayor of the city of Butte, he has known of and permitted persons to assemble in mass meeting in and about the streets of the said city and advocate the destruction and confiscation of private property, and forcible resistance to legally constituted authority, and to defile and cast contempt upon the American flag, and permitted such mass meetings to block the streets and disturb the peace of the city of Butte.

5. And it appears to the court that all of the foregoing facts are proved against the defendant, Lewis J. Duncan, beyond a reasonable doubt, by evidence free and clear of all exceptions as to admissibility, competency and sufficiency, and it further appears to the court that the charges in Paragraphs 4, 5, 6, 8, 9 and 11 of the accusation on file herein are sustained and that the defendant, Lewis J. Duncan, is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt of refusing and neglecting to perform the official duties pertaining to his office as Mayor of the said city of Butte.

As conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, the Court now finds and decides:

That the defendant, Lewis J. Duncan, is guilty, beyond a reasonable doubt, of refusing and neglecting to perform the official duties pertaining to his office as Mayor of the said City of Butte, and that the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment, and that the court must enter a judgment, that the defendant, Lewis J. Duncan, be deprived of his office as Mayor of the said City of Butte, and that the said office of Mayor of the said City of Butte, be adjudged to be vacant, and for plaintiff's costs herein incurred.

Wherefore, by reason of the law and the refusal and neglect of the defendant, Lewis J. Duncan, to perform the official duties pertaining to his office as Mayor of the city of Butte, Montana, and of the premises, it is hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed, and the Court does now order, adjudge and decree that the said defendant, Lewis J. Duncan, be, and he is hereby deprived of his office of Mayor of the said city of Butte, and the said office of Mayor of the said City of Butte be, and is vacant, and that the plaintiff have and recover costs herein incurred.

Done in open court this 5th day of October, A. D. 1914.

ROY E. AYERS, Judge.

STATE OF MONTANA,

County of Silver Bow, ss:

I, Otis Lee, Clerk of the District Court of the Second Judicial District of the State of Montana, in and for the County of Silver Bow, hereby certify that the foregoing instrument, consisting of 5 pages, is a full, true and correct copy of the Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law and Judgment in Cause No. A-6334. The State of Montana, upon the accusation of Peter Breen, plaintiff, vs. Lewis J. Duncan, Mayor of the City of Butte, a Municipal corporation, defendant, as the same was filed herein on the 6th day of October, A. D. 1914, and recorded in Book of Judgments No. V, Page 494.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said Court this 29th day of January, A. D. 1919.

[SEAL.]

OTIS LEE, Clerk.
By THOS. FOX,
Deputy Clerk.

The following letter of transmittal and attached documents, ordered to be included in the record, are here printed in full as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 18, 1919.

HON. LEE S. OVERMAN,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your request, I am transmitting herewith a memorandum prepared in the office of the Solicitor relating to Bolshevist and kindred matter which has been found in the mails since the signing of the armistice.

Very truly yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

(Enclosure)

FEBRUARY 14, 1919.

Memorandum for Judge Lamar:

In response to your request of the 12th inst., I am transmitting herewith attached excerpts from various publications, showing the nature and extent of the revolutionary Bolsheviki propaganda which various publications are now attempting to circulate throughout the United States.

In preparing these excerpts, I have confined my examination chiefly to publications of the I. W. W., Anarchist, Radical Socialist and kindred organizations which have been deposited in various postoffices for transmission through the mails since the signing of the Armistice. These will readily convey to you the forceful activities of these organizations and the methods they advocate to accomplish the object of their purposes.

This propaganda is being conducted with such regularity, that its magnitude can be measured only by the bold and out-spoken statements contained in these publications and the efforts made therein to inaugurate a nation-wide reign of terror and overthrow the government.

In classifying these papers, they are submitted in their major or general class, as follows: I. W. W., Anarchistic, Radical Socialistic and Socialistic. It will be seen from these excerpts and it is indeed significant, that this is the first time in the history of the so-called radical movement in the United States, that these radical elements have found a common cause (Bolshevism) in which they can all unite. The I. W. W., Anarchists, Socialists; radical and otherwise, in fact all dissatisfied elements, particularly the foreign element, are perfecting an amalgamation with one object and one only in view, viz: the overthrow of the government of the United States by means of a bloody revolution and the establishment of a Bolsheviki republic.

The organization of the Industrial Workers of the World is perhaps most actively engaged in spreading this propaganda, and has, at its command, a large field force, known as recruiting agents, subscription agents, lecturers, etc., who work unceasingly in the furtherance of the "cause." This organization also publishes at least five newspapers in the English language and nine in foreign languages, as shown in the list given below. This list comprises only the official papers of the organization and does not take into consideration a large number of free lance papers, published in the interests of the above organization:

NEWSPAPERS PUBLISHED BY THE I. W. W.

The New Solidarity (English) Weekly, Chicago, Ill.
 One Big Union (Monthly) English, Chicago, Ill.
 The Industrial Unionist (Weekly) English, Seattle, Wash.
 California Defense Bulletin (Weekly) English, San Francisco, Cal.
 The Rebel Worker (Bi-monthly) English, New York, N. Y.
 La Nueva Solidaridad (Spanish) Weekly, Chicago, Ill.
 Golos Truzenka (Russian) Weekly, Chicago, Ill.
 Il Nuovo Proletario (Italian) Weekly, Chicago, Ill.
 Nya Varlden (Swedish) Weekly, Chicago, Ill.
 Der Industrialer Arbeiter (Jewish) Weekly, Chicago, Ill.
 Probuda (Bulgarian) Weekly, Chicago, Ill.
 A Felszabadulas (Hungarian) Weekly, Chicago, Ill.
 Loukkataistelu (Finnish) Monthly, 58 E. 123 St., New York.

It is the announced intention of this organization to publish their literature in practically every foreign language spoken in the United States; to change their monthly magazines into weeklies, their weeklies into dailies.

In a recent issue of one of these publications there appears a notice to the effect that beginning in March, a publication in the Chinese language will be published in New York City, in the interest of the Chinese I. W. W., who have been recently organized.

It will be seen from the foregoing, that this organization will be able, by this method, to reach every foreign element in the United States and by means of its propaganda weld them into one big "revolutionary" unit.

It also appears that the Socialists have joined the Bolsheviki movement and are using the party organization to further the cause, and as will be seen from various excerpts from Socialistic publications.

The Anarchistic class already outside the pale of the law, are to be found among the staunchest supporters of Bolshevism and have eagerly seized this opportunity to join forces with other radicals and overthrow the government.

The program of the Bolsheviks is strikingly set out in a recent issue of a Swedish newspaper, published in the United States. The concluding paragraph of which reads as follows:

[Nordstjernan, New York City, Issue of January 3, 1919.]

BOLSHEVISM.

"The Bolsheviks are convinced that they must create a world revolution according to Russian example. It is therefore that the Bolshevik propaganda is driven so energetically all over the world. Money is distributed in masses all over Europe to keep the kettles of discontent boiling. Inflammable means exist in superfluity. Famine, misery, despair, a misdirected idealism, which blind the words of liberty, are such inflammable means. The foremost means used, however, is the enticement of colossal gains, against which the wartime profiteering appear as small sums indeed."

The excerpts attached are merely typical of the matter of this kind found in the mails since the signing of the Armistice and down to the present time, but does not include all such matter found in the mails during this period.

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES A. HORTON,
Assistant Attorney.

EXCERPTS FROM VARIOUS PUBLICATIONS SHOWING THE NATURE AND EXTENT OF BOLSHEVIKI PROPAGANDA, PUBLISHED SINCE THE SIGNING OF THE ARMISTICE,
 NOVEMBER 11, 1918.

[The Labor Defender, I. W. W., New York, N. Y., Nov. 15, 1918, Page 12, C. 1.]

A PAINFUL ALTERNATIVE.

Every day brings fresh evidence that the international capitalists are alarmed at the spread of Bolshevism and the prospect of a repetition of "the tragedy of Russia" in other countries on both sides of the firing line.

[The Labor Defender, I. W. W., New York, N. Y., Dec. 1, 1918, Page 12, c. 1.]

THE MASTER'S NIGHTMARE.

The Bolsheviks are Coming!

[The Labor Defender, I. W. W., New York, N. Y., Dec. 15, 1918, Page 4, c. 1.]

Every strike is a small revolution and a dress rehearsal for the big one.

[Golos Truzenika, I. W. W., Chicago, Ill., Jan. 18, 1919, P. 2, c. 3-4.]

OUR AIMS AND PROBLEMS.

The Industrial Workers of the World—an international revolutionary organization, which exists not only in the United States, but also in Australia and, one might safely say, in every country of the globe. The aim and problem of this organization is the destruction of slavery and the overthrow of the present capitalistic society in all its form and aspects. * * * The I. W. W. strives to establish one big labor organization in general One Big Union of the Industrial Workingmen of the World. By the establishing of revolutionary syndicates and uniting all workingmen, this organization signs the death verdict for the ruling bourgeoisie, for capitalism and its power throughout the world.

[Il Nuovo Proletario, I. W. W., Chicago, Ill., Dec. 28, 1918, page 4, cols. 2-3.]

THIS IS YOUR TASK WORKINGMAN.

First: Defend the Russian labor revolution wherever you can, as it is the first true revolution of the proletariat ever accomplished in the history of humanity, defend this revolution against the conspiracy of the forces of the internal capitalist coalition and against politicians.

Defend the Russian revolution, comrade, defend the I. W. W. and all victims of the reaction and you will solve the historical problem which belongs today to every conscientious workingman. Contribute in the most speedy and efficient manner to the triumph of the common cause.

[International Weekly (Socialist), the world for the workers, Seattle, Wash., January 31, 1919, vol. 1, No. 12.]

Soviets take control in England. Why not here? Class war is now on.

[Industrial Unionist, I. W. W., Seattle, Wash., January 18, 1919.]

Page 1, Col. 2:

Our system of government must be changed. The sooner it changes the better. I would that it could change without bloodshed, but if not, the less bloodshed the better.

[International Weekly (Socialist), Seattle, Wash., Issue of Jan. 24, 1919. Page 4, col. 1.]

THE WORKERS' COUNCIL.

It is high time for all the forces opposed to capitalism to get together on the common ground of revolutionary aim, agitating their special tactics thru their own organizations but spreading the revolutionary propaganda for the overthrow of the present industrial and political system thru this central revolutionary propaganda organization, the Workers' Council.

[A Felszabadulas, Chicago, Ill., Issue of Jan. 18, 1919, p. 2, c. 2.]

The capitalistic class with its prisons can no more hold up the revolution than the legendary old woman was able to sweep back the waves of the sea with her broom.

When the masses shall be inoculated with the spirit of class-solidarity, only then, when unshakable faith in their own strength arises only then, can they hope to pluck the fruits of the great revolutionary struggles, of which they were the creators.

[A Felszabadulas, Chicago, Ill., Feb. 1, 1919.]

CHINESE WORKERS IN THE I. W. W.

P. 1, col. 3:

A Chinese workers' recruiting organization was formed in New York with sixty-five members. The I. W. W. preamble has been translated into Chinese and a number of pamphlets are also being prepared for translation.

A REVOLUTION IS NEEDED.

P. 2, col. 1:

* * * Slaves of America, awake! Things will hereafter change no matter whether the American huns, the industrial Kaisers, their associates and hirelings like it or not. * * * We greeted the Russian revolution with joy and hope to hear very soon of the getting into power of the German bolsheviks and also in those countries that surround Russia and Germany. No matter what measures the Allies may take to break down the revolution, it will drag in its wake the drastic economical action of the sindacalists in England.

Page 2, co. 2:

Extract.

Every institution of the social system is a result of economical conditions. A change of economical conditions brings about a change in the political up-building. The consequence of the capitalistic economic system, the capitalistic social relations and social institutions are the Supreme Court, President, Senate, Congress, Mayoralities, Police, Sheriffs and landed proprietors; these institutions independent of the will of individuals are protecting the capitalistic social system, i. e., robbery and theft. They can not do otherwise since they owe their existence to the capitalistic economical system of robbery and thievery.

* * *

[A Felszabadulas, Chicago, Ill., January 25, 1919, p. 3, c. 4.]

THE DUTIES OF THE WORKING CLASS.

The war of the capitalists is concluded * * *

It is a fact, that the war between the money-magnates (Kings) is ended but class-struggle has only now started on its way. The red terror of revolution breaks its way throughout the entire world and looks into the eyes of the capitalist class with a grinning defiance * * *. The capitalist doctrines are overthrown with an astonishing rapidity all over Europe in order to be replaced by the new doctrine:

Workers of America, the world has changed! The social system of a ramshackle State lies on its deathbed and the industrial democracy of a new world knocks at the door. They await the birth of democracy and we cannot be quite about the birth of OUR democracy. We must no longer be indifferent, towards the trend of events but, whether we want or not, we have to face them under all circumstances. Everyone will be forced to this by the industrial and financial crisis in this country, too, within a very short time.

[A Felszabadulas, Chicago, Ill., January 25, 1919, p. 2, c. 2.]

DEMOCRACY OF LABOR.

The war of the internationalists is the continuous class-struggle in the mines, factories and smelters. Real democracy will come only when the arbitrary rule of the capitalist, which is nourished by exploitation, economic robbery and new wars, is stopped. To Hell with that so-called democracy. Forward with the class-struggle in order that misery, crime, anguish, suffering and bloodshed be stopped. All and everything that is in this world is the property of the employers. To Hell with that system which creates American Huns, industrial Kaisers and humiliates women and children.

[The Defense Bulletin, Seattle, Washington, Issue of December 1, 1918.]

THE WAR IS DEAD: LONG LIVE THE REVOLUTION!

The above slogan is published on every page of this issue—the December 1, 1918, issue of "The Defense Bulletin," published by the Seattle District Defense Committee of the I. W. W., Seattle, Washington.

[Industrial Union Bulletin, Issue of Nov. 29, 1918.]

To arouse this fighting spirit against capitalism, to get workers to show by their actions they understand that the "employing class and the working class have nothing in common" is of the greatest importance in the class war. Group and mass movements best do this. People in groups or masses feel more their strength, are emboldened to think and act more boldly against their oppressors.

[Il Diritto, New York City, N. Y., Issue of Jan. 25, 1919, p. 2, c. 2-3. Italian, Anarchistic.]

WORKERS.

Comrades in labor, it is time to end it. Our freedom will never come through the action of the Governments, but we must attain it by every means at our command. Capitalism will not cease to despoil us as long as we permit ourselves to be despoiled.

Must we always be the eternal cinder-wenchers? Let us cast out once for all the burden of all vexations against this shameless rabble which in the name of humanity crushes humanity in the name of liberty, kill liberty, these Kaisers of wealth who are bursting with indigestion let us tell them once for all, that we are disposed to obtain our liberty at the price of their adorable stinking carcasses. That we are determined to obtain our liberty appearing in the night in their sanctuaries as livid spectres because of the centuries of starvation and chains, with a dagger between our teeth tight because of wrath; and with dynamite we will bring down the roof of their dwellings where infamy, dishonor and slavery is perpetrated.

Protest against intervention in Russia, reclaim liberty for all political victims; let us act to hasten the day of the social revolution of the world. This is the duty which is incumbent upon us to-day. Let us elevate ourselves to the dignity of men, oh, comrade proletarians, and the end of the Bourgeoisie will be an accomplished fact.

War on the Bourgeoisie. Freedom to the political victims. Down with intervention in Russia.

OTELMA.

[Il Diritto, New York City, N. Y., Jan. 25, 1919, p. 2, col. 3, 4, 5.]

WILL THEY BE DEPORTED?

They are afraid and hope to inspire in us part of their fears.

They wish to bar the way to Bolshevism and find no better way of relieving themselves of the troublesome, they issue a decree of deportation; from the moment that these people without a country do not bow to nor understand Americanism which is all obsequious and servile to law.

I do not wish to say more, in order not to repeat what our newspapers have always said that it is little decorous for anarchists to trust themselves to that law which they theoretically do not recognize and against which they have launched their sharpest darts.

[L'Avanti! (Socialist), Chicago, Ills., November 1, 1918, page 1, col. 1.]

After the war, the struggle between the classes will increase with the arrival of peace. The war between the nations will end, but the war between the classes will restart in the world in all the nations more violently.

And certainly America will not be the privileged country where the working-men and bourgeoisie class shall live in peace and harmony.

The harmony of classes is not possible in America. The A. F. of L. and capitalism are not able to conclude a peace.

The workers should have the land, the industries, the railways, etc. The workers can't be really free unless they own the means of production. The laborers of America should possess their country.

[Workman and Peasant, New York City, Russian Weekly, Official organ in New York City of Soviet of Russian Workers Deputies—Issue of Nov. 13, 1918, complete issue herewith.]

There is no place for doubts. We are standing at the threshold of the Universal revolution. * * * Crisis is ripe. All the future of Russian revolution is at stake. All the future of the International Social revolution is at stake. Crisis is ripe.

Here before the Red Staff Building where our comrades Gruzshchiki were slain, we swear by these red coffins that hold them, by their wives and children that weep for them, by the red banners which float over them, that the Soviet for which they died shall be the thing for which we live, or if need be—like them, die. Henceforth the return of the Soviet shall be the goal of all our sacrifice and devotion. To that end we shall fight with every means. The bayonets have been wrested from our hands but when the day comes and we have no guns we shall fight with sticks and clubs, and when these are gone then with bare fists and bodies. * * * The Soviet is dead. Long live the Soviet.

(NOTE.—This matter has appeared quite generally in Anarchistic and Bolshevik papers. It is entitled "The Red Funeral of Vladivostok.")

[Novy Mir, New York City, N. Y., Issue of Feb. 1, 1919.]

FRIENDS QUARREL.

And, if we are to remember, that all these commercial wars always and invariably resulted in an armed clash between the capitalist powers, resulted in bloody wars, the most finished example being the just ended (wholly or only temporarily?) world war—then it will become clear that the capitalist governments already now, under the accompaniment of peace speeches and in the course of the peace negotiations, are preparing and sowing the seeds for new, and perhaps, more bloody wars.

The way out of this is only one: The matter of peace is not in trustworthy hands—and it will remain in these untrustworthy hands until the people themselves—the workmen's masses will take it into their own hands.

[A Munkas (Radical Socialist), New York, N. Y., Feb. 1, 1919.]

UNIFICATION.

We all are enthusiastic over the work of our revolutionary comrades in Russia and Germany; so why should we ourselves not come to an agreement?
* * *

* * * Let us think of the outbreak of the storm in which we have to take our stand.

* * * Nothing is more dreadful to the capitalist class that the unification of the workers of America in the fight for a future society.

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y., Issue of Jan. 30, 1919, "4" of Pub. Trans.]

FRANKLY SAID.

Lenine, and all those who are behind him, are fighting for the establishment of the socialist society throughout the entire world; but as real statesmen they know that this can be accomplished only through revolutionary methods. And therefore, they appeal to the workers of all countries to revolt, to an organized destruction of the pillars on which the modern bourgeois society supports itself.

This is understood by the proletariat of Russia and Germany. This is beginning to be understood by the proletariat of France and England. And there is hope that soon also the American workingmen will come to understand that simple truth about which the world frankly speaks today and which the corrupters of the American proletariat are trying carefully to camouflage. And once the American proletariat would come to the understanding of this truth he will act accordingly.

[Novy Mir, New York City, N. Y., issue of Jan. 29, 1919, "2" of Pub. Trans.]

STRIKE MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

The world war has produced a number of social-economic problems which the capitalist world is not capable of grappling with. These problems are of the same trend and deal with the transformation of the modern structure of society into a socialist society. The great work to realize this task can be undertaken only by the proletariat and only through one channel—the Bolshevik one.

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y., Issue of January 28, 1919, "1" of Pub. Trans.]

BANKRUPTS.

The bankrupt diplomats know that the "League of Nations" even in that perfectly harmless to them form in which it came out of the pen of Wilson cannot be realized under the circumstances of incessant quarreling which is going on among the States. They are too well aware of the fact that the house of cards they mean to build will fall to pieces as soon as the Bolshevik hand of the worker will touch it, the hand which sweeps away thrones and takes the ground away on which as schemed by the Parisian "benefactors" should be built the house of "equality and higher justice." And they exert all their efforts to stave off that hand from their child.

[Novy Mir, New York City, N. Y., February 7, 1919.]

REVOLUTIONARY STRIKE MOVEMENT.

The American bourgeoisie is listening to the thundering peals of the coming storm, and, obeying the instinct of self-preservation, resorts to the arsenal of old measures in hope to crush the movement. She is very strong and well organized, while the American working class has not yet learned to act harmoniously in masses. Its demonstration of power assume so far an isolated character.

But the revolutionary strike wave extending more and more over the world is raising the working class of the United States and will teach him the European methods of struggle. His role is yet to come.

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y., January 1, 1919, "2" of Pub. Trans.]

THE JUDGMENT DAY IS NEAR.

Revolution—is the very judge which the history, made now by the people's masses, has brought forth. Severe and impartial it reads its verdicts.

In Russia its verdict has already been carried into execution. In Central Europe it is about to be enforced.

In other countries the criminals still at large attempt by all means at their disposal to stay off the day of judgment. Now by violence, now by cunning, they try to postpone the hour of judgment. But they cannot flee from it as they cannot flee from the fully deserved punishment.

The contemporary state of society existing by virtue of oppression and violence is doomed to die. The revolutionary sword hangs already over its head. And let its representatives and adherents in their blindness try to protect and strengthen it with all powers at their disposal. Their efforts are doomed to fail.

The past year has clearly demonstrated it. The mightiest of machines ever created by the contemporary society is destroyed and lies prostrated in the dust. Its pillars in all countries are decaying and crumble down. And the hour is near when this structure, degenerated and withered, will finally fall apart and be transformed into dust.

[Novy Mir, New York City, N. Y., Dec. 23, 1918, "1" of Pub. Trans.]

BETWEEN TWO FIRES.

But to make an end of the Bolshevik "menace" is an undertaking incomparable harder than a victory over German armies. Besides, the fact that here in this case it is necessary to fight the whole people who is struggling for the realization of the greatest principles, which have ever enthused the mankind, one comes across something indefinite yet, but which might at any moment become intelligible, it is resistance everywhere wherever lives and suffers the worker. The Bolshevik ideas are trickling through into all countries, despite all prohibitions and barriers. And these ideas awaken and arouse the tolling masses, bringing resolution into their hearts to help the struggling proletarians of Russia and Germany and at the same time to attain their own emancipation.

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y., Issue of Jan. 11, 1919.]

FROM PROGRAMME OF COMMUNIST PARTY (BOLSHEVIKI).

A war breaks out. People are perishing by the million. Oceans of blood are being shed. It is necessary an explanation for this phenomenon. Those who do not believe in God, know the reason why. They see, that the war was started by czars and presidents, by the large bourgeoisie and land owners. They see that it is not conducted for plundering and dirty aims. Therefore they say to the workers of all countries: "To arms, against your oppressors, depose capitalism from its thrones."

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y., January 20, 1919, p. 2, c. 1-7.]

FROM PROGRAMME OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY. (BOLSHEVIKI.)

The party of the proletariat so decided the question concerning proletarians of different nations living within the borders of the country. A greater problem than this is before our party and that is its international problem. Here the way is clear. This way is universal support to the international revolution, support to revolutionary propaganda, strikes and uprising in imperialistic countries, support to the sedition and insurrection in the colonies of those countries. The position of the Soviet Republic is an exceptional one. It is the only proletarian State organization in the world among predatory organizations of the bourgeoisie. Therefore only it has a right for protection. It must be looked at as an instrument of the world's proletariat struggle against the world's bourgeoisie. The slogan of this struggle is clear. The international slogan of this struggle is—"the international Soviet Republic."

The overthrow of imperialistic governments through an armed uprising and the organization of an international republic of Soviets is the way leading toward the international dictatorship of the working class.

[Novy Mir, New York, N.-Y., December 13, 1918.]

INTERNATIONAL IS DEAD—LONG LIVE THE INTERNATIONAL!

* * * What an awakening will it be for the bourgeoisie when the time comes when the International throws all its weight and power into the balance to realize the program of the working class.

Editorial Note. * * * the newspaper is right when it says that the socialist International, as such, is immortal. Because it is the bearer of the immortal socialist idea of international solidarity of the working class, the personification of the great watch word: "Proletarians of all countries unite!" And in place of the old, left the stage Internationals, comes now a new, really revolutionary, real Red-Third International!

Populaire, the organ of the French socialist "Center" * * * "Long live the Soviet Republic!"

Populaire, of October 15, * * * Those men are wrong, who still believe that a political change can take place in the world without being accompanied by a social upheaval.

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y., Dec. 12, 1918, issue.]

Liebkecht tries to become a competitor of Lenine * * * The only war he is interested in is the class struggle of the proletariat against the bourgeoisie.

* * * The army can easily finish up with Liebkecht and his red followers. Should this not be done Germany will be occupied by Foch troops and that will spell an end to Bolshevism.

This same cynical tone is being manifested in the greater part of the American capitalist press.

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y., issue of Dec. 14, 1918.]

Already last year the leader of the proletarian democracy in Russia—comrade Lenine—pointed out that the great mission of the Russian revolution will have been realized only when it assume an international character * * *

On the banner of Liebkecht, like on the banner of the Russian Soviet Government, is inscribed the slogan: "Long live the internationalist socialist revolution!" Only under this slogan are possible an actual victory and full realization of the great mission of the German revolution, as the mighty factor of international revolution * * * only in this case the proletariat of Russia and of Germany might be able to create a united forceful revolutionary front against the united front of international imperialists.

The proletarians of all countries are on the threshold of a great battle.

[Naye Welt, issue of December 13, 1918.]

ASIATIC POLICIES OF THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT.

Socialistic Russia on the first day of the October Revolution (Bolshevist) announced to the oriental countries that it renounced all its rights in their countries and territories.

The fact that in Russia a socialistic government could maintain itself for eight months convinced them that they too must introduce a similar social system. It then alludes to the revolution-labor rising—in Tokio, which it says was inspired by the success of the Bolshevik revolution and Soviet government and it calls on Japan to rise in revolution and to defeat the capitalistic classes, etc. and it claims that the Lenine Trotsky regime is in communication with the laboring classes in Japan and that it is at work fomenting this revolution.

Socialist Russia on the first day of the Oct. revolution announced to the oriental countries that it renounces all its rights in their countries and territories.

The Soviet Government recalled the Russian soldiers of Persia, renounced the czar's booty in Mongolia and told China that the East Siberian which cost so much the Chinese and Russian people would be common property.

In China the party which made the revolution Russian was called the party of most radical rumanism, in Persia, which is so torn asunder that she has no strength to fight for independence a movement arose which sees the only deliverance from the foreign yoke in the creation of democratic institutions similar to the Soviets. In Southern China an open revolution is on.

Great is also the influence which the revolution in Russia had on the capitalist system in the oriental countries.

Already in Feb. the labor masses rose in Tokio. * * * A strong opposition exists there toward intervention plans of the government."

A revolution * * * often maims the good, often brings to the top the bad. This is incidental, but this does not hinder the general course of the stream or the deafening roar of the stream, and that roar is always about great things.

I do not know, he continues, what is better, the red rooster (villages aflame, arbitrary courts) of the police or the oppressive disharmony.

I speak to the intelligenzie and not to the bourgeoisie. The latter never dreams of any music except the piano. The Bourgeoise has a definite foundation under his feet as the hog has his mud.

But comes the revolution in its present stage and says that the time of privileges of all kinds is past.

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y., Issue of Nov. 8, 1918].

A revolution is not merely a palace revolution, a plot of single individuals, knows no nationalistic bounds. Revolutionism is not a distinguishing specific feature of this or that people. A revolution, if she is made by masses—is international in character, in her substance.

The Russian revolution has not limited herself with national bounds or geographical confines. Her sparks flew over to other countries. And there, enough combustible material was found, to change them into a bright fire. Bulgaria, Austro-Hungary and Germany have followed Russia. Who is next now?

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y., Issue of Nov. 11, 1918.]

AND THIS COINCIDENCE IS DEEPLY SYMBOLICAL.

It looks as though it reveals the true—international—character of the proletarian uprising in Russia, it emphasizes that that was not a specific Russian national revolution, but merely one of the links in the world socialist revolution in the period of which we have just entered.

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y., Issue of Nov. 9, 1918.]

We, revolutionary socialists, ought not to be alarmed over that the poison of Italian social patriotism may penetrate into the American Socialist movement.

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y., Issue of Nov. 6, 1918.]

Imperialists of all countries and peoples are hastily concluding peace in order to begin a new struggle; this time already a struggle with combined forces against the rising proletariat. "War against Bolshevism"—such is the watchword put forth by the defenders of the contemporary capitalist society. And there can be no doubt that the question of this war about the mobilization and unification of forces for the campaign will be one of the chief problems which will be discussed by the diplomats and statesmen and generals at the coming "peace conference."

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y.—Issue of Dec. 18, 1918.]

A shiver runs through the body at the very thought of the awakening of the tortured and befooled proletariat, at the thought of the coming people's judgment.

At this hour of a possible world revolution they are busy with petty bargaining attempting to get a few ministerial seats, and because of it they stand ready to save the situation for the imperialistic bourgeoisie.

Our task consists precisely in that we must destroy this agreement at the expense of the proletariat and the future of socialism.

Forward with the banner of socialism and long live the revolution of the international proletariat!

Now the hour has come to act. Now the English and French workmen might follow the signal given by the German workers. This signal must be given. Forward, German workers, soldiers, male and female! Forward to the battle for freedom, for an immediate peace and socialism! Forward towards brotherhood of all peoples under the banner of free labor! Down with class rule of the bourgeoisie! Whole power to the proletariat! Long live the German republic! Long live the international revolution of the proletariat!

[Novy Mir, New York, N. Y.—Dec. 10, 1918.]

Bolshevism penetrates into all parts of the former German Empire. The Cologne Gazette reports that the Spartacus party manifests great activity. Its agitators are active in each factory and in each plant. Their class propaganda spreads over larger and larger parts of the population. New and new spheres are being drawn in it. In Munich, the Bavarian capitol, the Bolsheviks forced the Minister of Foreign Affairs—Auer—to resign. Hamburg and Bremen had already come under the Bolshevik control. The influence of Bolshevism is being strongly felt in the Rhenish provinces. In Mainz the Bolsheviks have already established their own daily newspapers. Even the capitalist press is forced to acknowledge these facts. Small wonder that the imperialists begin seriously to contemplate in adopting resolute dictatorial measures to fight the influence and activity of the revolutionary socialists. The German bourgeoisie and the German social patriots in this respect will undoubtedly act in harmony with the international imperialism.

[Workman and Peasant, New York, N. Y., Issue of December 13, 1918.]

RED FLAG.

The larger part of Europe today is under the Red Flag.

The larger part of Europe is endeavoring today to bury forever the injustice and extortions of a bloody and full of tears world, and to establish a new world full of light, justice and all good. In the larger part of Europe the thrones already crumbled, Kaisers and extortionists were thrown out.

It became very fearful to all sorts of American owls.

In their fear and foolishness they came to the conclusion that all things happened in Europe because they are making attempts to forbid the use of the red flag. It is forbidden in New York, forbidden in Chicago, and expects to be forbidden throughout America. And what do they attain by that?

Suppose the red flag does not appear on the streets and at the meeting? Does that disappear, what does the red flag mean? On the contrary, it spreads out more and more. In the workmen's hearts, more and more commencing to palpitate, although is not seen, is more dangerous than the red flag. If it will remain locked up in the hearts of the workman by all kinds of mayors, precepts. The more powerful explosion will occur some day.

Mayors and aldermen forbidding the use of the red flag are playing with fire.

[Workman and Peasant, New York, N. Y.—Issue of December 13, 1918.]

Well, then, overthrow these robbers and enslavers of your countries. Now, when the war and disorder are shaking the dreams of the old world, when the entire world is aflame with dissatisfaction against imperialist-acquisitioners, when every spark of confusion turns into a powerful flame of revolution, when even the Indian Mahometans, exiled and tortured by the yoke of foreign lands, are arising against their enslavers—we must not be quiet. Lose no time and overthrow these acquisitioners of your lands! etc.

America is facing a terrible economic crisis accompanied by a no less terrible fellow traveler-idleness.

It is impossible to avoid this crisis, otherwise it would be necessary to reconstruct the entire public order of things. And thus the rich classes are worried more and more: what if the approaching crisis will create a sail for the Red Disease of Europe?

[L'Avanti, Chicago, Ill. Issue of Dec. 15, 1918.]

The red flag is flying over more than two-thirds of Europe while others are getting ready to follow, and their cathedrals, their bastiles of capitalism day after day are falling down in front of the unresistable advance of the red arms.

* * * the articles of the Imperial Socialist "American," and the entire world is threatened with Bolshevism.

The Bolshevik group "Spartaco" headed by Carl Liebknecht and Rosa Luxemburg in their official organ "Die Rote Falene" (The Red Flag) sends an appeal to all workers of the world inviting them to put an end to the capitalistic oppression as soon as possible with a general revolution. It says:

"Dispatches from the Bourgeoisie from announce a Bolshevik advance near Estonia and Finland. The Russ Bolsheviks are in continuous communication with German Bolsheviks, and certain New York papers publish dispatches that show a certain correspondence between Russ and Italian Bolsheviks. It is also said that Anjelica Balakanoff is sent to Italy by the Soviet with 11 thousand ruble to start a revolution in Savoia.

ENGLAND.

The Bolsheviks of the Labor party in their election program for the coming English election demand

Immediate withdrawal of the soldiers from Russia. The reconstitution of international socialism, complete abolishment of the obligatory conscription and a number of social and political reforms.

The most barbarous, the most capitalistic, the most autocratic nation in the world, England, is threatened with Bolshevism.

[Yiddish Leaflet.]

APPEAL TO ALL WORKERS MEN AND WOMEN!

The Jewish Branch 4th Socialistic Party, Bronx, call you to join the Socialist Party.

The world burns with revolution. * * *

We Socialists must be the first.

But for this struggle we must have a strong, fast, large organization.

WORKING MASSES NOW IS THE TIME!

"Now is the time to join the Socialistic movement, who have joined together with the Revolutionary Proletariat of the world, in a decisive battle against the black crows of the world, who endeavor to force new chains upon the working masses of all countries."

Together with our brethren of Europe, who have loudly proclaimed the realization of Socialism, and to build a power.

The Socialist movement in America, enters into a period of active battle, of active propaganda to spread the theory of Socialism.

Jewish Branch 4th Socialist Party. We meet every Monday evening, 647 Prospect Avenue, Bronx.

[The Day, New York, N. Y., January 28, 1919, p. 2, col. 5, 6, 7.]

"BOLSHEVISM EXISTS THROUGH THE MASSES," SAYS JEWISH MINISTER OF LITAN.

The true power of Bolshevism lies in the fact that it became the theory of the masses. The non-possessing masses received a free hand, and they are using their power over the possessing classes. When terror exists, it is the terror of the majority "non-possessing" against the minority "possessing," or the terror of the convinced Bolsheviki against the unconvinced anti-Bolsheviki.

[Leaflet (Socialist).]

MANIFESTO!

Men may Cry Peace! Peace! But There Is NO Peace. The War is Actually Begun! * * * Our Brethren Are Already in the Field!

* * * It is a call to the working class of the world! It comes to us in America from our comrades in Russia and from our comrades everywhere in Europe. * * *

Shall the workingmen of America hear this agonized cry for freedom and remain silent while the world power of capitalism at this moment turns its guns against those in the vanguard of the struggle for industrial liberty?

* * * The call to freedom today is the call to working class dominance in government and industry!

Workingmen of America! The Russian Revolution is your revolution. Fit it is Russian only in name; it is universal in substance and effect. * * * Today, by the rapid spread of proletarian revolt from one end of Europe to the other, the world character of this movement asserts itself.

THE WAR HAS ENDED! THE WAR HAS BEGUN!

* * * It is the fight of international capitalism against international socialism, the life and death class struggle of property and privilege against the higher aspirations of the proletariat.

* * * The world is witnessing the birth throes of a new civilization—and capitalism is girding itself to battle against its sure destruction!

Be not deceived. Bolshevism is the name only of the rule of the working class. That is why it is detested by our capitalist press, whether it triumphs in Russia or elsewhere.

* * * International capitalism is vitally interested in crushing the Bolshevik party in Russia, and the party of international socialism in all countries, because it needs but a spark of enlightenment to give to the workers of the world control of their own destiny.

The war has begun! The open warfare between international capitalism and international socialism!

Workingmen of America! Use all your power to resist the use of your sons and brothers to throttle the new birth of industrial freedom.

We must not be silent in this hour and desert our comrades in Europe in the international struggle of the working class. The class-conscious workers of America must join with the revolutionary forces of Europe in the demand for world dictatorship of the proletariat. We must not surrender ourselves to the mastership of an American imperialism which promises to run a course of economic exploitation surpassing anything that has ever gone before.

Workingmen of America! Stand by our comrades in Europe! * * * Be not lulled by the siren song of peace—when there is no peace!

"Workingmen of the world unite! You have nothing to lose but your chains! You have the world to gain!"

[Anarchistic Leaflet.]

GO—HEAD.

The senile fossils ruling the United States see red!

Smelling their destruction, they have decided to check the storm by passing the Deportation law affecting all foreign radicals.

We, the American Anarchists, do not protest, for it is futile to waste any energy on feeble minded creatures led by His Majesty Phonograph Wilson.

Do not think that only foreigners are anarchists, we are a great number right here at home.

Deportation will not stop the storm from reaching these shores. The storm is within and very soon will leap and crash and annihilate you in blood and fire.

You have shown no pity to us! We will do likewise.
And deport you! We will dynamite you!
Either deport us or free all!

THE AMERICAN ANARCHISTS.

[Spravedlnost, Chicago, Ill. Issue of January 6th. Reported January 13, 1919.]

"HURRAH FOR THE BOLSHEVIKI!"

This shout echoed in the coliseum yesterday afternoon from the mouths of more than 6,000 present at every mention of the Russian revolution. It was the first meeting of the Socialists during the major's campaign.

Collins discussed the new Workingmen's party. Collins said: "Now they have given us a new name; they call us Bolsheviki!" Immediately a great shout was heard. His speech was interrupted for several minutes by shouts for the Bolsheviki. He foretold successes for the German Bolsheviki and that the movement will spread into England, France, Italy and America.

Comrade O'Hara spoke in behalf of the imprisoned men and women, who "possessed the heart, principles, conviction and courage to openly commit the terrible crime." Comrade Bloor explained Bolshevism to those present as an inclination and sympathy for the industrial revolution in Russia and Germany as well as its efforts and actions. Robin said that the fundamental question of the socialists is the determination of the laboring class to get control of the Government and dictatorship of the proletariat. Three hundred government agents and detectives were present.

[Robitnyk, New York, N. Y. Issue of Jan. 24, 1919, p. 2, c. 1.]

"OUR HARVEST."

And we will get rid of them today or tomorrow. Only more work, more courage! Our fate is being made here,—Our own and that of our children. We are not going to struggle for "democracy," we are struggling for bread, for a warm corner in a house! We struggle in order to be able to use the fruits of our labor. We want to get rid of the yoke which was put upon us during last five centuries. We want to get rid of that slavery of the soul which was imposed upon us during the last 20 centuries. We want bread, freedom, and right! The present civilization does not give them to us. This civilization we have to overthrow, to root it out. It gives us nothing but hard work, sweat, cold and tears. On the ruins of capitalist civilization we will build our civilization. It will be our harvest.

[The Ohio Socialist, official organ of the Socialist Parties of Ohio, Kentucky, Virginia, West Virginia, and New Mexico. Wednesday, February 5, 1919.]

RESOLUTION ON THE PROPOSED LABOR PARTY.

Page 1, col. 5:

* * * Revolution in the sense of capture of the governmental power by the workers and the use of this power for the complete overthrow of the capitalist control of industry and the substitution of the workers control and industrial democracy—is the only effective weapon in the workers' struggle.

DEBS GIVEN OVATION AT YOUNGSTOWN.

Page 1, cols 3-4:

Predicts Labor Revolution.—Margaret Prevey of Akron preceded Debs and defined Bolsheviki as Socialists, and said the capitalists didn't like it under a new name any better than under the old name. * * * "You are going to solve your future, your destiny in this country either peacefully or by a great revolution."

[Blore (Socialist), New York, N. Y. Issue of Feb. 10-11, 1919. Page 2, col. 5.]

CENSORSHIP OF THE PRESS WILL REMAIN.

And the Senate voted. Naturally those who had a clearer head admitted that the more they suppress the socialist and bolsheviki ideals the more they spread and therefore, naturally a minority voted in favor of the bill of Senator Borah, while the majority rejected it. So the postal censorship will remain and they will continue to prevent the expansion of the radical and socialist papers. Poor Senate. They want to hinder the avalanche which is on its way, with a particle of dust. The Avalanche will sweep away the obstacles and will sweep away the Senate out of its road.

[Elore, New York, N. Y., January 24-25, 1919, "3" of Pub. Trans.]

THE RECOGNITION OF THE SOVIETS.

And when there is a question of recognizing the Russian Soviets, we believe that shortly the Russian Soviet Republic will be recognized by a much higher forum: by the revolutionary workers of the world.

[Elore, New York, N. Y., Issues of January 28-29, 1919, "2" of Pub. Trans.]

ATTEMPT AGAINST THE WORKERS.

The hour of deeds arrived. The international socialists must leave their reserved attitude and must step out upon the field of action, the opportunity for action is here. The International Communist Congress of Moscow will call together the Internationale and will decide when the new revolutionary congress shall be called. This congress has accepted the program of the Soviet government and the Spartacus group, consequently it does not hedge around. This program proclaims clearly and decidedly the pure and unadulterated class struggle and demands that private wealth be expropriated immediately.

The workers of the world stand at the cross-roads. The question is whether they wish that the economical edifice of the crumbling society be patched up furthermore, or, whether they wish to erect an entirely new building upon the ruins of the old?

The foundations of the building are tumbling down, it is impossible to patch them up. Therefore, the world's workers may choose only one way, and that is, the complete overthrow of the present social structure and erection of a new edifice, and for this only the Internationals planned by the Bolshevik government may give an opportunity, and not the Berne "Socialist" conference.

The Socialist Party and its members have only one duty, and this is, to oppose most decidedly all movements which purpose to weaken the Bolshevik Internationale.

[Elore, New York, N. Y., February 7-8, 1919, p. 3, col. 1.]

LET US ANSWER.

We live in historical times. Socialism is approaching its final goal with gigantic steps. All Europe was scorched by the flames of the social revolution. The worn out pillars of the old world have collapsed and are being replaced by the people with new and stronger ones. Every power has proved to be weak in face of the conquering tide of socialism. The class conscious socialist workers gave the power to start the revolutions because they have a certain aim they have an organized army in every country.

[Elore, New York City, N. Y., February 7-8, 1919. No. 1 Editorial.]

WORN OUT IDEALS.

This game with mottoes shows that the American workers class arrived to the stage where they have to choose for themselves their own purposes and ideals which they wish to obtain. The old ideas are worn out and new ideas knock at the door. We must receive them, because irresistibly they will break in the strongest door. Vainly hasten forward the old ideas from the winter of age, the emiritous fighters of capitalism, it is impossible to fight with the young Hercules' who have no respect for anything, and upon whose shoulders, the future world of work rests. The revolutionary spirit, the flaring idea cannot be extirpated, it might be suppressed for a while, its disciples might be persecuted, but they cannot be killed finally!

[Arbeiter-Zeitung, St. Louis, Mo., January 18, 1919, p. 1, c. 2, 3.]

BOLSHEVISM—A WORLD POWER.

Every fool feels at liberty just now to deride the Russian Soviet government and among these fools are statesmen and prominent politicians who know as much about Bolshiwism as a rhinoceros knows about playing the clarinet. . . .

Bolsheewism is to blame, they tell us! But the Bolshiwic movement in Russia is nothing else than the movement of the Russian laboring class. Russia for the Russians—the Russian laborers! The discovery of Russia by the Russian laboring class! Russia's resurrection under the rule of the laboring class! And what is true here of Russia may be applied to every other nation, the whole world 'round!

[Stradhneeks, Boston, Mass., Issue of Dec. 31, 1918. No. 9 of Trans.]

THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION.

So far, the elementary internal strength of the Russian Revolution has successfully repulsed every onslaught of the reaction. Over a year the darkest powers of the world have been thrust against the revolution. Might, falsehood and horrid lies have been used against it but the revolution is still alive.

The Czecho-Slovaks are beaten to a standstill, and the progress of the Czarist general counter-revolutionary movements have been checked everywhere. The revolution is growing strong militarily, financially and morally. The revolutionary proletariat of Germany will respond. So will the proletariat of other countries.

Not fearing the all mighty world imperialism threatening and damnation, the Russian proletariat marches on fearless and cautious that the future belongs to the working class.

[Arbetaren, New York City, Swedish Socialist organ. Issue November 21, 1918.]

The right to live is decided by the right to the means of production and with this at their disposition the capitalist class makes every reform into a "scrap of paper," without value to the working classes.

Evolution is ready for the next step; let us be prepared for the revolution.

[New York Call, Socialist daily, New York City, Dec. 1, 1918.]

The soldiers coming back from Europe have the spirit of Bolshevism. Influenza was brought to America in ships, and the same ships will carry back the soldiers, who will carry a more dangerous disease to the capitalists of America.

[Elore, Hungarian daily, New York City. Issue of Nov. 22, 1918.]

Do not misconstrue my words. We do not use the statement "democracy is spreading" as a mockery. The European events, the Russian, Austrian, German, Bulgarian workers' revolutionary movements have proved that abroad they clearly know what democracy means, that abroad the workers really spread democracy with all means in their power. The triumph of democracy means the cessation of the class rule and the social system of today. This is not feared anywhere as much as it is dreaded here in America, and justly so.

Because the social order and the ruling class was nowhere with such great results and profit than in America. In Europe, it seems that the events of the war brought ruin to capitalism and there it is impossible any more to uphold the triumph of the workers. But here in America, where the war has been felt only lightly, capitalism is in full power yet. American capitalism fears that the spreading of democracy will cause its fall and will compel America to give up its plans of world conquest and economical exploitation. American capitalism do everything in their power to throttle democracy under the pretext of fighting for democracy.

[Elore, Hungarian I. W. W. daily, New York City, issue of November 11, 1918.]

The war . . . was but the terrible coping of the interests which serve the privileged class. The socialist press has never forgotten to emphasize this fact. Today, when it is only a question of hours when the world war will end, a daily increasing number of events proves with a steadily growing conviction how true the above statement is, and daily more and more signs show that the preparation for our war is now going on.

Another bourgeoisie paper admits with a voice trembling of anxiety that Lenin's and Trotzky's threat that they will not rest until their dogmas are spread all over the world, is becoming to be a reality. This paper acknowledges the fact that the Bolshevik spirit is master in Budapest, Vienna, Sofia, and asks the question whether it will reach Berlin also, and if so, whether it will stop there? We hold this last question the most important among the present day problems.

[Naujenos, Chicago, Ill., Lithuanian daily, issue of November 26, 1918.]

Aside, intelligents! . . . Let's stir up, friends! We, extra Bolsheviki, absolutely lose nothing, except the chains with which (understood tongues) continuously they knock at our heads; learn, learn . . . In a word, this is a socialist patriots play.

[Robitnyk, New York City, Feb. 10, 1919, p. 2, cols. 4-5.]

The Am. workers are not backward. A strong left wing was formed in the Am. Soc. Party, based upon international revolutionary socialism, represented by the Russian Bolsheviki and German Spartacans. Such wing exists in the "Soc. Labor Party." There are also many workers not belonging to any party, who are ready to follow us.

To break off all relations with the dying corpse and organize all American workers into one Communist Party, which should include us and the comrades of the S. R. P. and of the I. W. W.—will be the first step forward.

[The Labor Defender. Vol. I, No. 17. November 15, 1918. 5 cents.]

THE WAR IS DEAD LONG LIVE THE REVOLUTION.

A copy of No. 20 (October, 1918) of the War Information Series published by the United States Committee on Public Information at Washington, D. C. (up to and including Document No. 53 on the twenty-fifth of its 30 pages), was ordered inserted in the record and is as follows:

[War Information Series, No. 20—October, 1918. Issued by the Committee on Public Information, George Creel, Chairman.]

THE GERMAN-BOLSHEVIK CONSPIRACY.

INTRODUCTION.

The Committee on Public Information publishes herewith a series of communications between the German Imperial Government and the Russian Bolshevik Government, and between the Bolsheviks themselves, and also the report thereon made to George Creel by Edgar Sisson, the committee's special representative in Russia during the winter of 1917-18. There is also included, in Part II, a report by a committee appointed by the National Board for Historical Service to examine into the genuineness of these documents.

The documents show that the present heads of the Bolshevik Government—Lenin and Trotsky and their associates—are German agents.

They show that the Bolshevik revolution was arranged for by the German Great General Staff, and financed by the German Imperial Bank and other German financial institutions.

They show that the treaty of Brest-Litovsk was a betrayal of the Russian people by the German agents, Lenin and Trotsky; that a German-picked commander was chosen to "defend" Petrograd against the Germans; that German officers have been secretly received by the Bolshevik Government as military advisers, as spies upon the embassies of Russia's allies, as officers in the Russian army, and as directors of the Bolshevik military, foreign, and domestic policy. They show, in short, that the present Bolshevik Government is not a Russian government at all, but a German government acting solely in the interests of Germany and betraying the Russian people, as it betrays Russia's natural allies, for the benefit of the Imperial German Government alone.

RUSSIAN WORKMEN BETRAYED.

And they show also that the Bolshevik leaders, for the same German Imperial ends, have equally betrayed the working classes of Russia whom they pretend to represent.

The documents are some 70 in number. Many are originals, annotated by Bolshevik officials. The balance of the others are photographs of originals, showing annotations. And they corroborate a third set of typewritten circulars (see Appendix later) of which only two originals are possessed in any form, but all of which fit into the whole pattern of German intrigue and German guilt.

The first document is a photograph of a report made to the Bolshevik leaders by two of their assistants, informing them that, in accordance with their instructions, there had been removed from the archives of the Russian Ministry of Justice, the order of the German Imperial Bank "allowing money to Comrades Lenin, Trotsky, 'and others' for the propaganda of peace in Russia"; and that, at the same time, "all the books" of a bank in Stockholm had been "audited" to conceal the payment of money to Lenin, Trotsky, and their associates, by order of the German Imperial Bank.

This report is indorsed, in Lenin's initials, "V. U." [Vladimir Ulianoff, his real name], for deposit in "the secret department" of the Bolshevik files. And the authenticity of the report is supported by Document No. 2, which is the original of a report sent by a German General Staff representative to the Bolshevik leaders, warning them that he has just arrested an agent who had in his possession the original order of the German Imperial Bank referred to in Document No. 1, and pointing out that evidently "at the proper time steps were not taken to destroy the above-mentioned documents."

PROTOCOL SIGNED BY LEADERS.

Document No. 3 is the original protocol signed by several Bolshevik leaders and dated November 2, 1917 (Russian calendar), showing that "on instructions of the representatives of the German General Staff in Petrograd" and "with the consent of the Council of People's Commissars," of which Trotsky and Lenin were the heads, two incriminating German circulars had also been "taken from the Department of Counter Espionage of the Petrograd district" and given to the Intelligence Bureau of the German General Staff in Petrograd. On the bottom of the protocol the German adjutant acknowledges receipt of the two incriminating circulars with his cipher signature.

These two circulars apparently had been obtained early in the war by some Russian agent in Germany and transmitted to Russia. The German General Staff evidently wished to get them back in order to remove evidence. By the order of the German General Staff and with the "consent" of Lenin and Trotsky they are turned over to the Germans. Why? Because they fit in with other information of Germany's war plans and preparations before August, 1914. Indeed, several weeks before the assassination of the Austrian Archduke, which was made the pretext for war.

And Lenin and Trotsky surrender them in conformity with a working agreement between the Bolshevik leaders and the German General Staff, of which agreement a photograph is included in the series as Document No. 5.

This is dated October 25, 1917. It is from a division of the German General Staff. It is addressed to the Government of the People's Commissars, of which Lenin and Trotsky were the heads. It begins: "In accordance with the agreement which took place in Kronstadt, in July of the present year, between officials of our General Staff and leaders of the Russian revolutionary army and democracy, Messrs. Lenin and Trotsky, Raskolnikov, and Dybenko, the Russian Division of our General Staff operating in Finland is ordering to Petrograd officers for the disposal of the Intelligence Bureau of the staff." Among the officers named are Maj. Luberts and Lieut. Hartwig, whose cipher signature, Henrich, is given as it appears on the receipt for the two circulars accompanying Document No. 3. And an indorsement on this letter (No. 5) from the German General Staff records that the German officers assigned to Petrograd had appeared "before the military revolutionary committee" and had "agreed on conditions with regard to their mutual activities."

MUTUAL ACTIVITIES SHOWN.

What their "mutual activities" were to be is sufficiently indicated by Document No. 7, which is a photograph of a letter signed in cipher by this Maj. Luberts and his adjutant, Lieut. Hartwig. They notify the Bolshevik leaders, on January 12, 1918 (Russian calendar), that "by order of the German General Staff" the German Intelligence Bureau "has reported the names and the characteristics of the main candidates for reelection" to the Russian Bolshevik "Central Executive Committee," and "the General Staff orders us to insist on the election of the following persons." They add a list of Russian leaders satisfactory to the German General Staff. The list is headed by Trotsky and Lenin. They were elected, and the rest of the present Bolshevik executive committee were chosen from the same German list.

Document No. 8 gives evidence of the quid pro quo. It is a photograph of a letter from the representative of the German Imperial Bank to the Bolshevik Commissar of Foreign Affairs. It is marked "Very secret" and dated January 8, 1918. It says:

"Notification has today been received by me from Stockholm that 50,000,000 roubles of gold has been transferred to be put at the disposal of the People's Commissars," which is the title of the Bolshevik leaders. "This credit," the letter continues, "has been supplied to the Russian Government in order to cover the cost of the keep of the Red Guards [the Bolshevik revolutionary troops] and agitators in the country. The Imperial Government considers it appropriate to remind the Council of People's Commissars of the necessity of increasing their propaganda in the country, as the antagonistic attitude of the south of Russia and Siberia to the existing Government in Russia is troubling the German Government."

WAR MATERIALS AT VLADIVOSTOK

Four days later the same representative of the German Imperial Bank sent another 5,000,000 roubles to the same address to provide for the sending of a Russian revolutionary leader to Vladivostok, to get possession of the "Japanese and American war materials" at that port, and if necessary to destroy them. A photograph of his letter is given as Document No. 9.

There were earlier payments, but probably none later than these. None was necessary. By this time the loot of an empire lay open to the Bolsheviks—and to the Germans.

Most significant of all are two photographs of further communications from the German Imperial Bank, given as Documents Nos. 10 and 11. One is a letter addressed to the Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars, and the other is the "resolution of a conference of representatives of the German commercial banks" received by the Chairman of the Bolshevik Central Executive Committee and indorsed by his secretary. Together they give a complete synopsis of the terms on which Germany intends to have control of all Russian industries.

For five years from the signing of peace, English, French, and American capital in Russia is to be "banished" and "not to be allowed in the following industries: coal, metallurgical, machine building, oil, chemical, and pharmaceutical." These industries are to be developed under the control of a "supreme advisory organ consisting of 10 Russian specialists, 10 from the German industrial organizations and the German and Austrian banks." Germany and Austria are to "enjoy the unlimited privilege of sending into Russia mechanics and qualified workmen." "Other foreign mechanics and workmen * * * are not to be allowed to enter at all" for five years after the conclusion of peace between Russia and Germany. "Private banks in Russia arise only with the consent" of the Union of German and Austrian banks. And so forth.

CONSPIRACY IS INDORSED

And this conspiracy between German Imperial capitalism and the pretended Russian Reds is indorsed by a Bolshevik leader, with the recommendation that it should be "taken under advisement" and "the ground prepared in the Council of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies, in case the Council of People's Commissars will not accept these requests."

Various details of the conspiracy between the Bolshevik leaders and the German General Staff are exposed in Documents Nos. 16 to 29. These are photographs of letters which passed between the Bolshevik leaders and the German General Staff, or the German officers in Russia. Document No. 21 shows that on November 1, 1917, when Russia was still regarded as an ally of Great Britain, France, and America, the German General Staff was having "the honor to request" the Bolshevik leaders to inform it "at the earliest possible moment" concerning "the quantity and storage place of the supplies which have been received from America, England, and France, and also the units which are keeping guard over the military stores."

Document 18 shows the German General Staff requiring the Bolshevik leaders to send "agitators to the camps of the Russian prisoners of war in Germany," in order that they might procure spies to work among the English and French troops and to further "peace propaganda." And this is proposed by the German General Staff as being "according to the negotiations between the Russian and German peace delegations at Brest-Litovsk."

In Document 22 the Bolshevik leaders and the Germans are arranging to send "agents-agitators, and agents-destructors" out of Vladivostok "to ports of the United States, Japan, and British colonies in Eastern Asia."

PASSPORTS FOR GERMANS

In Document 16 Trotsky is providing fraudulent passports for German officers who are going to England, France, and America, as spies and enemy agents. And Document 17 shows Trotsky indorsing a similar proposal: "To be urgently executed. L. T."

Three German submarines are to be sent to the Pacific on the trans-Siberian railway by orders of the German High Command in Document No. 23. Lists of German and Russian spies watching the British, French, and American embassies in Petrograd are given in Document No. 25. And, finally, in Document No. 15 the Bolshevik leaders are warned that information concerning "the connection of the German Government with the Bolshevik workers" has leaked out and that Russian troops are hearing of it.

Letters are given to show how the Bolshevik leaders and the German officers arranged for the assassination of Russian Nationalist leaders (Documents 35, 39, and 52), for the destruction of the Polish legionaries in the Russian army (Documents 40 to 42), for the disorganization of the Roumanian army and the deposing of the Roumanian king (Document No. 37), for the substitution of officers satisfactory to Germany in command of Russian troops instead of patriotic Russian generals (Documents 31 and 32), for the suppression of patriotic agitation among the Russian soldiers (Documents 13 and 14), for an attack upon the Italian ambassador in Petrograd and the theft of his papers (Documents 26 and 27), and for the employment of German soldiers in Russian uniforms against the Russian national armies in the South (Document 35).

Several of the letters are indorsed by Trotsky. Even standing alone, they are complete proof that the Bolshevik leaders were ruling as German agents in Russia, and obeying German orders to act against all Germany's enemies and even against Russia itself.

ACTED AS GERMAN AGENTS

Moreover, these Bolshevik leaders acted as German agents by suppressing their own socialist revolution in the Russian provinces where their doctrines interfered with German plans of annexation. Document 46 is the original letter from the Petrograd Intelligence Bureau of the German General Staff addressed to the Bolshevik Commissar of Foreign Affairs. It reads: "According to instructions of the representative of our General Staff, I have the honor once more to insist that you recall from Esthonia, Lithuania, and Courland all agitators of the Central Executive Committee of the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies." And in Document 47 the General Staff orders the Bolsheviks to cease the agitation in Esthonia which had "finally led to the local German landlords being declared outlawed," and to "take immediate steps for the restoring the rights of the above-mentioned German landlords."

Another group of letters (Nos. 33 to 36) shows how the Germans cheated the Bolshevik leaders in their dealings with the Ukraine and made a separate German peace with the anti-Bolshevik leaders in that Russian province. And another group shows the Germans assisting both sides of the civil war in Finland (Documents 38, 43, and 53).

The documents, as they follow, are given in the main in the report form in which they were transmitted by Mr. Sisson to Mr. Creel, chairman of the committee, with some later data added and carefully indicated. For instance, Mr. Sisson did not learn until several weeks after he had left Russia that the German order (which he possessed) naming the Russian who was to "defend" Petrograd had been obeyed.

In preparing this material for publication as a pamphlet advantage has been taken of the opportunity to improve in some mooted points the form in which the documents and translations are presented.

PART I.—THE GERMAN-BOLSHEVIK CONSPIRACY.

[A report by Edgar Sisson, special representative in Russia of the Committee on Public Information in the winter of 1917-18.]

CHAPTER I.

THE BASIC CONSPIRACY.

Three groups of documents are subjected to internal analysis in the material that follows. One group consists of originals, one group consists of photographs of documents believed still to be in the file rooms of the Russian Bolshevik, and the third (Appendix I) of typewritten circulars that have not been traced to their originals except perhaps in the case of two of the number. The chief importance of the third group is that its appearance inspired the efforts that led to the uncovering of the other groups. And they fit into the fabric of the whole.

The first set of these appendix circulars came into my hands on February 2, in Petrograd. An additional set appeared the following day at an office where I frequently called. A third appeared in another quarter a day afterwards. One set was in Russian and two in English. On February 5 I held all three sets. A possible explanation for their appearance at this time and their intent is given in Appendix I.

By themselves they were plausible but not substantiated. Having first performed the obvious duty of analyzing them for surface values and transmitting them and the analyses to Washington, I turned, therefore, to the task of further investigations.

It is not yet possible to name those who helped, but in three weeks' time the judgment of facts became apparent.

The text of the documents discloses both the methods and the effects of the German conspiracy not alone against Russia, but the world. With each document is the indication of whether it is an original or photograph. With each document is an interpretative note.

DOCUMENT No. 1.

People's Commissary for Foreign Affairs.

(Very Secret)

Petrograd. November 16, 1917.

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

In accordance with the resolution passed by the conference of People's Commissars, Comrades Lenin, Trotsky, Podvoisky, Dybenko, and Volodarsky, the following has been executed by us:

1. In the archives of the Ministry of Justice from the dossier re "treason" of Comrades Lenin, Zinovieff, Koslovsky, Kollontai and others, has been removed the order of the German Imperial Bank, No. 7433, of the second of March, 1917, for allowing money to Comrades Lenin, Zinovieff, Kameneff, Trotsky, Sumenson, Koslovsky and others for the propaganda of peace in Russia.

2. There have been audited all the books of the Nia Bank at Stockholm containing the accounts of Comrades Lenin, Trotsky, Zinovieff, and others, which were opened by the order of the German Imperial Bank No. 2754. These books have been delivered to Comrade Müller, who was sent from Berlin.

Authorized by the Commissar for Foreign Affairs.

E. POLIVANOFF,
F. ZALKIND.

NOTE.—The Russian Council of People's Commissars was dominated by the president, Vladimir Ulianov (Lenin); the then foreign minister, Leon Trotsky, now war minister; and the ambassador to Germany, A. Joffe. The marginal indorsement in writing is: "To the secret department. B. U." This is the fashion in which Lenin is accustomed to initial himself. The English equivalent would be V. U., for Vladimir Ulianov. So, even if there existed no further record of German Imperial Bank order No. 7433, here would be the proof of its contents, and here is the link connecting Lenin directly with his action and his guilt. The content matter of the circular exists, however, and herewith follows:

Order of the 2d of March, 1917, of the Imperial Bank for the representatives of all German banks in Sweden:

Notice is hereby given that requisition for money for the purpose of peace propaganda in Russia will be received through Finland. These requisitions will emanate from the following: Lenin, Zinovieff, Kameneff, Trotsky, Sumenson, Koslovsky, Kollontai, Sivers, and Merkalin, accounts for whom have been opened in accordance with our order No. 2754 in the agencies of private German businesses in Sweden, Norway, and Switzerland. All these requests should bear one of the two following signatures: Dirshau or Milkenberg. With either of these signatures the requests of the above-mentioned persons should be complied with without delay.—7433, IMPERIAL BANK.

I have not a copy of this circular nor a photograph of it, but Document No. 2, next in order, proves its authenticity at once curiously and absolutely. Particular interest attaches to this circular because of Bolshevik public denial of its existence. It was one of several German circulars published in Paris in the "Petit Parisien" last winter. The Petrograd Bolshevik papers proclaimed it a falsehood. Zalkind, whose signature appears not only here but on the protocol (Document No. 3), was an assistant foreign minister. He was sent in February on a mission outside of Russia. He was in Christiania in April when I was there.

Have photograph of the letter.

DOCUMENT NO. 2.

G[reat] G[eneral] S[taff], Intelligence [Nachrichten] Bureau, Section A, No. 292.

(Secret)

February 12, 1918.

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

The Intelligence Bureau has the honor to inform you that there were found on the arrested Capt. Konshin two German documents with notations and stamps of the Petersburg secret police [Okhrana] which show themselves to be the original orders of the Imperial Bank, No. 7433, March 2, 1917, concerning the opening of accounts for Messrs. Lenin, Sumenson, Koslovsky, Trotsky, and other active workers on the peace propaganda, by order No. 2754 of the Imperial Bank.

These discoveries show that at the proper time steps were not taken to destroy the above-mentioned documents.

For the head of the Bureau:

R. BAUER.
BUKHOLM.

Adjutant:

NOTE.—Observe the thoughtfulness with which Bauer, a careful man, set down exactly what was in the document, thereby permitting the contents to rise again from the ashes to which perhaps he committed the damaging paper. He admits that the documents found were truthful originals. The world will thank him and Germany will not.

I have the original letter. It bears marginal indorsements: "Referred to the Commission for Combating Counter Revolution. Demanded documents. M. Skripnik"; and an illegible comment by N. Gorbunoff, Lenin's other Government secretary. The letter is directed to Lenin. Did Skripnik get the documents? I do not know.

The letter is remarkable otherwise, for the arrested Capt. Konshin mentioned is a German officer, Lieut. Otto, who appears elsewhere as an agent in the German double-crossing intrigue in the Ukraine. What was behind the mystery of his arrest? What was his fate?

NOTE (Oct. 1, 1918).—The order of the second of March, 1917, as pointed out in the note to Document 1, has had publicity since last winter, and naturally has been subject to the attack of the defenders of Lenin and Trotsky. The effort at confusion, however, is of the straw-man variety. If this date were in the Western European calendar, it would precede the March Revolution. So the defenders of Lenin and Trotsky have argued against the letter that it must have been written by a Counter-Revolutionary Russian who forgot the 13 days' difference in time between the Russian and the European Calendar. Curiously, the persons who make this contention overlook the reverse of such an argument—that the order was written by a German who KNEW AND USED the Russian calendar. He ought in common sense to have used it, as the letter was written to state when orders for money from Russians would be honored.

The Germans who maneuvered in Russia were letter perfect in Russian form (See Document 5, "who use the Russian language perfectly and who are acquainted with Russian conditions.")

But the date, March 2, may be either German or Russian, for any important bearing it has on the documents. If German, it was written before the March Revolution, but in preparation for getting into it as soon as it started. Many persons, both in Russia and in Germany, knew of an impending effort at Revolution. What more natural on Berlin's part than to desire to get its "agents-disturbers" there? And if they were at that moment widely scattered over the world, the more reason to begin quickly to call them in.

DOCUMENT No. 3.

V. K. [Military Commissariat] D. No. 323—two inclosures.

PROTOCOL

This protocol, drawn up by us on the 2d of November, 1917, in duplicate, declares that we have taken with the consent of the Council of People's Commissars from the papers of the Department of Counter Espionage of the Petrograd district and the former Department of Police [Okhrana], on instructions of the representatives of the German General Staff in Petrograd:

1. Circular of the German General Staff No. 421, dated June 9, 1914, concerning the immediate mobilization of all industrial enterprises in Germany, and
2. Circular No. 93, dated November 28, 1914, of the General Staff of the High Sea Fleet, concerning the sending into enemy countries of special agents for the destruction of war supplies and materials.

The above noted circulars were given over under signed receipt into the Intelligence Bureau of the German Staff in Petrograd.

Authorized by the Council of People's Commissars.

F. ZALKIND.

E. POLIVANOFF.

(Illegible, but may be Mekhanoshin.)

A. JOFFE.

The Circulars No. 421 and No. 93 mentioned in this protocol and also one copy of this protocol were received on the 3d of November, 1917, by the Intelligence Bureau of the G[reat] G[eneral] S[taff] in Petersburg.

Adjutant:

HEINRICH.

NOTE.—The circulars inclosed are printed in German, and are as follows:

Gr[eat] General Staff, Central Division, Section M, No. —, Berlin.

CIRCULAR OF JUNE 9, 1914, TO DISTRICT COMMANDERS:

Within 24 hours of the receipt of this circular you are to inform all industrial concerns by wire that the documents with industrial mobilization plans and with registration forms be opened, such as are referred to in the circular of the Commission of Count Waldersee and Caprivi, of June 27, 1887.

No. 421, Mobilization Division.

G[eneral] S[taff] of the High Sea Fleet, No. 93.

CIRCULAR OF NOVEMBER 28, 1914, TO MARINE AGENCIES AND NAVAL SOCIETIES:

You are ordered to mobilize immediately all destruction agents and observers in those commercial and military ports where munitions are being loaded on ships going to England, France, Canada, the United States of North America, and Russia, where there are storehouses of such munitions, and where fighting units are stationed. It is necessary to hire through third parties who stand in no relation to the official representatives of Germany agents for arranging explosions on ships bound for enemy countries, and for arranging delays, embroilments, and difficulties during the loading, dispatching, and unloading of ships. For this purpose we are especially recommending to your attention loaders' gangs, among whom there are many anarchists and escaped criminals, and that you get in touch with German and neutral shipping offices as a means of observing agents of enemy countries who are receiving and shipping munitions.

Funds required for the hiring and bribing of persons necessary for the designated purpose will be placed at your disposal at your request.

Intelligence Bureau of the General Staff of the High Sea Fleet.

KOENIG.

NOTE.—Both the circulars bear the penciled notation that "one copy has been given to the German Intelligence Bureau" at Petrograd. The German intent here was to remove from the records of the old Russian Government the evidence, first, that Germany was beginning in June, 1914, its active preparations for the war that surprised the world in August, 1914, and second, to remove the evidence of its responsibility for incendiarism and explosions in the United States, a country with which Germany was then at peace. The result was to give new evidence of the truth of the charges. The evident mixture of bad and good German in these circulars seems to me evidence of an attempt to provide an alibi against the almost inevitable day when the circulars would be revealed. (See also page 30.)

Have original of protocol and have the printed circulars.

DOCUMENT No. 4.

G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 35.

January 17, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSARIAT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

The Bureau has received exact information that the leaders of the socialist party now ruling in Russia, through Messrs. Fuerstenberg and Radek, are in correspondence with Messrs. Scheidemann and Parvus regarding the destruction of the traces of the business relations of the party with the Imperial Government. We also know that this correspondence was caused by the demand of leading groups of German socialists, who saw in the said communications a danger to the cause of world socialism. By order of the staff, I have the honor to request the submitting of this question to special discussion in the presence of the representative of our staff and Mr. von Schoenemann.

For the head of the department:

Adjutant:

R. BAUER.
[Illegible.]

NOTE.—The world penalty, therefore, was apparent to some Germans. Of the personalities named in the letter, Scheidemann, the leader of the German Government-supporting wing of the Socialist party is the most notable. Once before he has been named in relation to the "business relations" of the Russian Bolsheviki with the Imperial Government, writing a letter from Copenhagen in 1917, to a "Mr. Olberg" in which he stated that 150,000 kroners had been placed at Olberg's disposal at Fuerstenberg's office through the Nia Bank. (See Appendix, later.) Now Fuerstenberg by this time, January, in Petrograd at Smolny, is trying to help Scheidemann in covering up old trails. Radek is a clever Polish-Austrian Jew who came from Switzerland with Lenin. He and Trotsky between them staged the public play-acting at Brest-Litovsk. Von Schoenemann was the accredited German representative to the Bolshevik foreign office. He is named later in Document No. 5. Parvus is a handler of German propaganda money, with headquarters at Copenhagen, and is credited with being the directing force behind Joffe. (For Parvus, see "New Europe," January 31, 1918, pp. 94-95.)

Have photograph of this letter.

DOCUMENT NO. 5.

Gr[eat] General Staff, Central Division, Section M, No. (blank), Berlin.

October 25, 1917.

TO THE GOVERNMENT OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

In accordance with the agreement which took place in Kronstadt, in July of the present year, between officials of our General Staff and leaders of the Russian revolutionary army and democracy, Messrs. Lenin, Trotsky, Raskolnikov, and Dybenko, the Russian Division of our General Staff operating in Finland is ordering to Petrograd officers for the disposal of the Intelligence Bureau of the staff. At the head of the Petrograd Bureau will be the following officers, who use the Russian language perfectly and who are acquainted with Russian conditions:

Maj. Luberts, cipher signature Agasfer.
Maj. von Boelke, cipher signature Schott.
Maj. Bayermeister, cipher signature Ber.
Lieut. Hartwig, cipher signature Henrich.

The Intelligence Bureau, in accordance with the agreement with Messrs. Lenin, Trotsky, and Zinovieff, will have the surveillance of the foreign embassies and military missions and of the counter revolutionary movement, and also will perform the espionage and counter espionage work on the internal fronts, for which purpose agents will be assigned to the various cities.

Coincidentally, it is announced that at the disposal of the Government of People's Commissars are assigned consultants to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Mr. von Schoenemann, and to the Ministry of Finance, Mr. von Toll.

Chief of the Russian Division, German General Staff:

O. RAUSCH.

Adjutant:

U. WOLFF.

(And below on the same letters)

TO THE COMMISSARIAT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

The officers indicated in this paper have been before the military revolutionary committee and have agreed on conditions with Muravieff, Boie, and Danishevski with regard to their mutual activities. They have all come under the direction of the committee. The consultants will appear as called for.

Chairman Military Revolutionary Committee, Council of Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies:

A. JOFFE.

Secretary:

P. KRUSHAVITCH.

October 27, 1917.

NOTE.—Here is the working compact. If Rausch was then in Berlin he presumably came immediately afterwards to Petrograd. It is more probable that the letter was written in Finland than Berlin. In some other letterheads on which Berlin is printed the word is run through with a pen. Stationery was hard to get in Petrograd. Maj. Luberts became the head of the Intelligence Bureau (Nachrichten Bureau). Kronstadt was the midsummer headquarters of Lenin. Raskolnikoff will be referred to in connection with the project to sell the Russian fleet to German. Dybenko was the commissar of the fleet, the naval minister, a driving man and keen witted. Zinovieff is the president of the Petrograd Soviet, during the winter the most powerful of the local bodies of the Russian Soviets. He is Jewish and well educated. Joffe, in the letter of Bolshevik acceptance of the German compact, again stands forth for what he is, the spokesman, after Lenin, in all matters of supreme importance to Germany.

Have photograph of joint letter.

DOCUMENT No. 6.

[Gr[eat] General Staff, Central Division, No. 813.

November 19, 1917.

TO THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

This is to advise you that the following persons have been put at the disposal of the Russian Government as military advisers: Maj. Erich, Maj. Bode, Maj. Sass, Maj. Zimmerman, Maj. Anders, Lieut. Haase, Lieut. Klein, Lieut. Breitz.

These officers will choose a cadre of the most suitable officers from the list of our prisoners, who will likewise be at the disposal of the Russian Government, as was agreed at the conference in Stockholm when Lenin, Zinovieff, and others were traveling through to Russia.

Head of the Russian Section, German General Staff:

O. RAUSCH.

Adjutant:

U. WOLFF.

NOTE.—Maj. Anders took the Russian name Rubakov and Maj. Erich the Russian name Egorov. Lenin and Zinovieff passed through Germany and Stockholm together.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 7.

[G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 27.]

(Confidential.)

January 12, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

By the order of the local department of the German General Staff, the Intelligence Department has reported the names and the characteristics of the main candidates for the reelection of the Central Executive Committee. The General Staff orders us to insist on the election of the following persons: Trotsky, Lenin, Zinovieff, Kameneff, Joffe, Sverdlov, Lunacharsky, Kollontai, Fabrizius, Martov, Steklov, Golman, Frunze, Lander, Milk, Preobrajenski, Sollers, Studer, Golberg, Avanesoy, Volodarsky, Raskolnikov, Stuchka, Peters, and Neubut. Please inform the president of the council of the General Staff's wish.

Head of the Bureau:

Adjutant:

AGASFER.
HENRICH.

NOTE.—The indorsements are: "Copy handed to chairman Council Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies, No. 956." "Deliver to Comrade Zinovieff and to secret department. M. O.—(?)" January 12 (Russian calendar) fell in the week of the All-Russian Soviet convention in Petrograd, the week after the forcible dissolution of the Constituent Assembly. The election came at the end of the week and was a perfunctory re-election of practically the whole former executive committee of commissars. Lacking the exact list, I nevertheless can state that the present executive committee was drafted from this group. The name there surprising to me is that of Martov, the head of a supposedly separate faction.

Martov is an able writer, was associated with Trotsky in his Paris journalistic venture, but was supposed to have split with him in Russia. The evidence that he is still agreeable to Germany is pertinent. Madame Kollontai, the only woman on this list, was the Commissar of Public Welfare. She was sent abroad for foreign propaganda in February, but did not get beyond Scandinavia and later returned to Russia. Kameneff, who went out of Russia with Kollontai, also sought to return, but was arrested by the Finnish White Guards (not the Germans) on the Aland Islands, and his release was the subject of negotiations. He is Trotsky's brother-in-law. Sverdlov was temporary chairman of the All-Russian Soviet. Lunacharsky is Commissar of Education.

Steklov is editor of the official paper "Izvestia." Volodarsky, who has lived in the United States, was in close confidence with Lenin. He was killed in Moscow the last week in June. Agasfer, who delivered the order in behalf of Rausch, is Maj. Luberts.

Have photograph of letter.

CHAPTER II.

RÔLE OF THE REICHSBANK.

The following documents show in detail how the German Government financed the Russian Bolshevik revolution through the German Imperial Bank.

They show what rewards the German financial and industrial interests demanded in return for the German support of the Bolsheviks. And they show how the Bolshevik leaders betrayed their own followers and abandoned the preaching of their social revolution wherever the Germans ordered that it should be abandoned.

DOCUMENT No. 8.

Imperial Bank [Reichsbank], No. 2.

(Very Secret)

January 8, 1918.

TO THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

Notification has to-day been received by me from Stockholm that 50,000,000 roubles of gold has been transferred to be put at the disposal of the representatives of the People's Commissars. This credit has been supplied to the Russian Government in order to cover the cost of the keep of the Red Guards and agitators in the country. The Imperial Government considers it appropriate to remind the Council of People's Commissars of the necessity of increasing their propaganda in the country, as the antagonistic attitude of the south of Russia and Siberia to the existing Government in Russia is troubling the German Government. It is of great importance to send experienced men everywhere in order to set up a uniform government.

Representative of the Imperial Bank:

G. VON SCHANZ.

NOTE.—Members of the Red Guard were paid from 12 to 16 roubles a day, whereas soldiers were paid hardly that number of kopecks. This letter shows where the money came from. The Bolshevik Government also required factory owners to pay regular wages to their workers while the latter served in the Red Guard. The notation on letter indicates that it was referred to Menshinski, the financial minister, whose expert councillor was the German, von Toll. Menshinski personally conducted the wrecking of the Russian banks, a maneuver that deprived all opponents of Bolshevism of their financial means of warfare. It was a classic job of destruction, done in the name of reconstruction.

Have photograph of this letter.

DOCUMENT No. 9.

Imperial Bank, No. 8, Berlin.

(Very Secret)

January 12, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

I am instructed to convey the agreement of the Imperial Bank to the issue out of the credit of the General Staff of 5,000,000 roubles for the dispatch of the assistant naval commissar, Kudriashoff, to the Far East.

On arrival at Vladivostok he should visit the retired officer of the Russian Fleet, Mr. Panoff, and instruct Bittenhoff and Stauffer, who are known to Panoff, to come to see him. Both the mentioned agents will bring with them Messrs. Edward Shindler, William Keberlein, and Paul Diese [or Deze]. With these persons it is necessary to think out a plan for carrying out the Japanese and American war materials from Vladivostok to the west. If this is not possible then they must instruct Diese [or Deze] and his agents to destroy the stores. Shindler must acquaint Kudriashoff with the Chinese agents at Nikol'sk. These persons should receive the agreed amounts and should be dispatched to China to carry on an agitation against Japan.

Representative of the Imperial Bank:

G. VON SCHANZ.

NOTE.—If this plan was developed to a climax it was not by Kudriashoff. He was killed on his passage through Siberia two or three weeks later and it was reported that a great sum of money was taken from his body by his murderers, who were said to be two Cossacks. Most of the German agents named in this letter were still active in Siberia in the spring, as shown by Document No. 29.

Have photograph of this letter.

DOCUMENT No. 10.

Imperial Bank, No. 5.

January 11, 1918.

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

My Dear Mr. Chairman: The industrial and commercial organizations in Germany interested in trade relations with Russia have addressed themselves to me in a letter, including several guiding indications. Permit me to bring them to your attention.

1. The conflict of the Russian revolution with the Russian capitalists absolutely does not interest German manufacturing circles, in so far as the question does not concern industry as such. You can destroy the Russian capitalists as far as you please, but it would by no means be possible to permit the destruction of Russian enterprises. Such a situation would produce a constant ferment in the country, supported by famine of materials and, in consequence of that, of products also. The English, American, and French capitalists take advantage of this disorder and understand how to establish here corps of their commercial agents. It is necessary to remember that German industry in the first years after the general peace will not be in a position to satisfy the purchasing demand of the Russian market, having broad similar parallel tasks in the Near East, in Persia, in China, and in Africa.

2. It is essential, therefore, to conduct a canvass and gather statistical information with regard to the condition of industry, and, in view of the absence of money in Russia, to address in business conversations whichever is desired of the groups of German commercial banks.

3. Trade with Germany may be in the first period almost exclusively exchange for wheat and for any remaining products to receive household necessities. Everything which exceeds the limits of such trade should be paid for in advance to the amount of 75 per cent of the market value, with the payment of the remaining quarter in a six months' period. In place of such an arrangement, probably, it would seem to be possible to permit, privately, the taking of German dividend shares on the Russian financial market, or solidly guaranteed industrial and railroad loans.

In view of the indicated interest of German manufacturers and merchants to trade relations in Russia, I cordially beg you, Mr. Chairman, to inform me of the views of the Government regarding the questions touched upon, and to receive the assurances of my sincere respect.

Representative of the Imperial Bank and Stock Exchange in Berlin:

G. VON SCHANZ.

NOTE.—The engaging attitude of the German manufacturers toward Russian capitalists is the feature of this letter, apart from the cordial and evidently understanding expressions of the representative of the German Imperial Bank to that opposed enemy of the capitalists of all nations, Lenin. The letter was sent to the secret department by Secretary Skripnik. Perhaps some day von Schanz will disclose Lenin's answer.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 11.

Imperial Bank, No. 12378. [Printed circular in Russian] of a conference of representatives of the German commercial banks convened on proposal of the German delegation at Petrograd by the management of the Imperial Bank, to discuss the resolutions of the Rhine-Westphalian Industrial Syndicate and Handelstag.

RESOLUTION

Berlin, December 28, 1917.

1. All loans are canceled the bonds of which are in the hands of German, Austrian, Bulgarian, and Turkish holders, but payment must be realized by the Russian treasury in the course of a 12-months' term after the conclusion of separate peace.

2. The purchase is permitted of all Russian securities and dividend-bearing paper by the representatives of the German banks at the rate of the day on the open market.

3. After the conclusion of separate peace, on the expiration of 90 days, there are reestablished all the shares of private railway companies, metallurgical industries, oil companies, and chemical pharmaceutical works.

NOTE.—The rating of such papers will be made by the German and Austrian stock exchanges.

4. There are banished and for five years from date of signing peace are not to be allowed English, French, and American capitals in the following industries: Coal, metallurgical, machine building, oil, chemical, and pharmaceutical.

5. In the question of development in Russia of coal, oil, and metallurgical branches of industry there is to be established a supreme advisory organ consisting of 10 Russian specialists, 10 from the German industrial organizations and the German and Austrian banks.

6. The Russian Government must not interfere in the region of questions connected with the transfer to the benefit of Germany of two mining districts in Poland—Dombroski and Olkiskiski—and to Austria of the oil region in Galicia. The transfer of the latter will be only in the form of limitations of the right of making claims, land allotments, and application of capital for the production and refining of oil.

7. Germany and Austria enjoy the unlimited privilege of sending into Russia mechanics and qualified workmen.

8. Other foreign mechanics and workmen during five years after the conclusion of peace between Russia and Germany are not to be allowed to enter at all.

9. The statistical department of producing and manufacturing industries with the corresponding Government organ must be controlled by German specialists.

10. Private banks in Russia arise only with the consent and according to the plan of the Union of German and Austrian Banks, whereby the rating of the stocks of the banks on all exchanges of the New and Old World will be handled by the group of the Deutsche Bank.

11. At the ports of Petrograd, Archangel, Odessa, Vladivostok, and Batum will be established, under the leadership of specialists from Germany, special statistical economic committees.

As regards the tariff, railway and shipping rate policies to regulate the Russo-German-Austrian trade relations, this part of the economical treaty will be discussed by the special Tariff Council of the Handelstag.

Signed :

Chairman: VON GRENNER.
Secretary: BERENBLUET.

NOTE.—The penned indorsement on the photographed copy of the resolution is: "Chairman of the Central Executive Committee: Commissar Menshinsky requests that this resolution should be taken under advisement, and to prepare the ground in the Council of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies, in case the Council of People's Commissars will not accept these requests. Secretary D. Khaskin." Menshinsky is Minister of Finance. All of these terms, wholly punitive to American, English, and French capital, could lurk in the secret section in the present German-Russian treaty. I do not know the fate of the resolution on this, its early winter appearance.

Have besides the notated photograph a printed copy of this circular.

DOCUMENT No. 12.

G[reat] G[eneral] S[taff], Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 780.

FEB. 25, 1918.

(Secret)

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS :

After conferring with the People's Commissar Trotsky, I have the honor to ask you urgently to inform the directors of the Counter Espionage at Army Headquarters [Stafka], Commissars Feierabend and Kalmanovich, that they should work as formerly in complete independence and without the knowledge of the official staff at Army Headquarters and the General Staff in Petersburg, and particularly Gen. Bonch-Bruевич and the secret service of the northern front, communicating only with the People's Commissar Lieut. Krilenko.

For the head of the Bureau :

Adjutant :

R. BAUER.
BUKHOLM.

NOTE.—Across the letter is written: "Inform Mosholov. N. G." (Gorbunoff's initials). In the margin is written: "Passed on to the Commissar of War, M. Skripnik." The significance of this letter is that it is to Lenin; that the two chief secretaries of himself and the council passed it on for action; and that Trotsky and Lenin on February 27 were continuing to hamper the Russian commander at a moment when the German army was threatening Petrograd. Mosholov was one of the commissars on the staff of Krilenko, the commissar representing the Council of Commissars in the command of the Russian military forces. His achievements as a disorganizer were notable. This letter indicates that he had the confidence of Germany.

Have original letter.

DOCUMENT No. 13.

G[reat] G[eneral] S[taff], Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 733.

February 25, 1918.

(Very Secret)

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS :

According to reports of our secret agency in the detachments operating against the German troops and against the Austrian Ukrainian corps, there has ben observed propaganda for a national rising and a struggle with the Germans and their allies, the Ukrainians. I ask you to inform me what has been done by the Government to stop this harmful agitation.

For the head of the Bureau:

R. BAUER.
HENRICH.

Adjutant:

NOTE.—Across the top is written: "Urgent. To the Commissars of War and Special Staff. M. Skripnik." The last sentence is underseored, and in the margin appears a question mark, initialed "L. T." The first is Lenin's order through the secretary, and the second may possibly be taken as Trotsky's opposition to any action. The loss of the Ukraine by counter German intrigue was a sore point in prestige with him. But his essential obedience to Germany was not lessened.

Have original letter.

DOCUMENT No. 14.

G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 278/611.

TO THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

February 7, 1918.

According to information of the Intelligence Bureau it has been ascertained that the promise given personally by you, Mr. Commissar, in Brest-Litovsk, not to circulate socialistic agitational literature among the German troops is not being fulfilled. I ask you to inform me what steps will be taken in this matter.

For the head of the Bureau:

R. BAUER.
HENRICH.

Adjutant:

NOTE.—Brusque words to the foreign minister of the Soviet Government of Workmen, Soldiers, and Sailors of the Russian Republic, delivered not by an equal in official rank, but by the deputy of a German major at the head of an intelligence department of the German Government. Did Trotsky resent or deny the imputation? Instead he wrote with his own hand in the margin: "I ask to discuss it. L. T." Thus he admits that he did give the promise at Brest-Litovsk. The question raised concerns only the measure of obedience to be required.

Have original letter.

DOCUMENT No. 15.

Counter Espionage at Army Headquarters [Stavka], No. 311, special section.

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

January 29, 1918.

The Counter Espionage at the Army Headquarters advises that at the frone is being spread by unknown agitators the following counter revolutionary literature:

1. The text of circulars of various German Government institutions with proofs of the connection of the German Government with the Bolshevik workers before the passing of the Government into their hands. These leaflets have reached also the German commanders.

The Supreme Commander has received a demand from Gen. Hoffman to stop this dangerous agitation by all means possible.

2. A stenographic report of the conversation of Gen. Hoffman with Comrade Trotsky, whereby it was supposedly proposed to the latter to make peace on conditions of considerable concessions on the part of the Central Empires, but on the obligation of the Russian delegation to stop the socialization of the life of the state. Comrade Trotsky supposedly offered the termination of war without peace and the demobilization of our army. When Gen. Hoffman announced that the Germans would continue the advance, Trotsky supposedly replied: "Then under the pressure of force we shall be forced to make peace and fulfill all demands."

This document has created indignation among the troops. Against the Council of People's Commissars are heard cruel accusations.

Commissar:

S. KALMANOVICH.

NOTE.—This letter is a warning of the slow rising but coming storm that will sweep these boldest pirates of history from the country they have temporarily stolen. To get a real understanding of the meaning of the second, and important, section of the letter, it must be pointed out that until February 1, the Russian calendar was 13 days behind the Western European calendar. The real date of this letter, therefore, is February 10. This is the date Trotsky's "No peace; no war" pronouncement was made at Brest-Litovsk. The news of it did not reach even Petrograd until the next day. Yet on that day printed circulars were being distributed at the front stating that Trotsky had agreed to do the very thing he did do, and giving an augury of events that did take place a week later when Germany did begin its advance and when the Bolsheviks did fulfill all demands. The fact is that simple truth was being told. Nor is the means by which it was secured at all obscure. A few daring and skillful Russians had found a means to get information from Brest-Litovsk.

The circulars referred to in the first paragraph are of course those already familiar to Washington from February dispatches.

The following native comment adds to the attractiveness of the letter: "The Committee for Combating the Counter Revolution states that these circulars were sent from the Don, and the stenographic report was seized in transmission from Kieff. Its origin is undoubtedly Austrian or from the Rada.—M. Skripnik."

Have photograph of letter.

CHAPTER III.

THE GERMAN-BOLSHEVIK PLOT AGAINST THE ALLIES

The following documents, with Mr. Sisson's interpretative notes, expose the German-Bolshevik plot against the Allies.

DOCUMENT No. 16.

Counter Espionage at Army Headquarters, No. 215.

January 21, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSARIAT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

We hereby advise you of the arrival in Mogilev of the following German officers, who are being ordered to England, France, and America:

Zanwald, von Weine, Pabst, Mayer, Gruenwaldt, and Baron Schilling. They have been granted passports, sent here by Commissar Trotsky.

Von Weine, with a Danish passport in the name of Hansen, a merchant of Copenhagen, is to proceed to England.

Baron Schilling is ordered to the United States of America with a Norwegian passport in the name of Dr. Joseph Brun.

Gruenwaldt has instructions to proceed to France with a Russian passport in the name of the Lett, Ivan Kalnin.

The remaining persons are to make a journey through Finland and Sweden, supplied with papers from the German staff, in order to follow up the counter revolutionary work of countries allied to us.

Chief of Counter Espionage:

Commissar:

FEIERABEND.
VUZNETORFF.

NOTE.—A young German who said he was a deserting officer and that his name was Mayer, sought the aid of the Embassy, the military mission, and myself in getting to America. He was a good-looking young Prussian, had lived in New York, spoke English with very little accent, and claimed to have been converted to the President's views on peace requisites. He said he had walked across the lines as a deserter because he could stand no more of German war, and that he wanted to go to the United States to talk and write against Germany. I was not receptive. He said he was a lieutenant. There is no record at our military control office in Christiania of a passport to Dr. Joseph Brun.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 17.

Commissar for Combating the Counter Revolution and Pogroms, No. 32. Petrograd.

January 5, 1918.

TO THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSARIAT FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

The plenipotentiary Commissar for Combating the Counter Revolution, Comrade Antonoff, requests the commissariat for foreign affairs to issue passports for going to Denmark to the following comrades, who are going to the allied countries to conduct peace propaganda:

To England are going: Comrades Adolf Pavlovich Ribba, Ilia Julievich Uritski, Vladislav Antonovich Dashkevich.

To France: Rimma Lvovna Orlova, Vladimir Konstantinovich Schneur.

To America: Isai Borisovich Kahn, Mark Vlasievich Gritsker, Sofia Arturovna Mack.

All the named comrades will visit at Copenhagen the premises of the staff, where they will receive neutral passports for the trip to the named countries. At the disposal of the dispatched will be placed the necessary means for combating in the press with the imperialists of England, France, and the United States. Their confidential addresses will be transmitted to you later on the arrival of the named comrades at the places of their destination.

Authorized commissars:

A. SHILINSKI.
F. ZUBERT.

NOTE.—Trotsky indorsed this note: "To be urgently executed. L. T."

The plan of peace propaganda campaign in the allied countries is plainly outlined. These Bolsherik-German agents will preach international Bolsherism and will charge the countries at war with Germany with the very imperialistic offenses of which Germany is guilty. This also was the method used in Russia by the Bolsherik-German press in attacking the United States, England, and France. In the formula of the propaganda, imperialism relates not only to territory but to business enterprise. The agents listed above likely sought entrance under different names. They and the centers from which they work should be recognized, however, by their words and their works. The commissars who sign are members of the commission for Combating the Counter Revolution.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 18.

G[reat] General Staff, Central Division, Section M, No. 951.

December 20, 1917.

TO THE COMMISSARIAT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

According to the negotiations between the Russian and German peace delegations at Brest-Litovsk, the Russian Division of the German General Staff have the honor to request the hastening of the departure of agitators to the camps of Russian prisoners of war in Germany, for the recruiting of volunteers who will be sent to the English and French troops for the purpose of observation and peace propaganda.

Simultaneously, the staff requests the following sailors to be sent to Germany: Shishko, Kirshu, Matviev, and Dratchuk. They will receive special instructions when traveling through Brest-Litovsk.

Chief of the Russian Division, German General Staff:

O. RAUSCH.
U. WOLFF.

Adjutant:

NOTE.—This request was referred to the Commissariats on Military and Naval Affairs.

A marginal question asked by E. P. (probably Polivanoff): "[Is] Dratchuk at Black Sea?" He was at Sevastopol and may not have been sent. The others went, visited the camps for war prisoners in Germany, and then returned to Russia. Shishko in February was Commissar of the Naval College in Petrograd.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 19.

Counter Espionage at Army Headquarters, No. —.

January 16, 1918.

TO THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

I hereby bring to the notice of the Council of People's Commissaries that through our front, on the personal permission of the Supreme Commander, have passed 100 German officers, 250 non-commissioned officers, who proceeded to our internal fronts; part of the German officers have gone to the front in the Don region, part to the front against Dutoff, and part to Eastern Siberia and the Trans-Baikal for the surveillance, and if it shall be possible, to oppose the Japanese occupational detachment and the counter revolutionary Trans-Baikal Cossack officers.

Counter Espionage Official :

P. ARKHIPOV.

NOTE.—An odd comment gives interest to this letter. It is this: "An accusation or a silly accusal for personal benefit? Communicate [to] Comrade Krilenko," signed "N. G."

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 20.

Counter Espionage at Army Headquarters, No. 52.

Jan. 8, 1918.

TO THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS :

The Supreme Commander Krilenko has received an offer from the Supreme Commander of the German army to send to the disposal of the German staff ten reliable officers of the revolutionary army. The said persons must arrive at Warsaw, where they will receive their further instructions. The aim of the trip is to visit the camps of our prisoners of war on the propaganda of peace ideas. The staff points out the desirability of sending Dzevaltovsky, Simashko, Saharoff, and Volodarsky.

For the Chief of the Counter Espionage :

S. KALMANOVICH.

For the Commissar :

ALEXIEFF.

NOTE.—Dzevaltovsky was an officer of the Life Guards Grenadier Regiment, and an agitator who aroused the soldiers at the time of the ill-fated June advance. Volodarsky has been referred to previously. He was assassinated in late June at Moscow. Kalmanovich was a Commissar on the staff of Krilenko, the talking man who was assigned to disorganize the army. In actual army rank Krilenko was a sublieutenant.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 21.

Gr. General Staff, Central Division, Section M, No. 750.

Berlin, November 1, 1917.

TO THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS :

In accordance with an inquiry from the German General Headquarters I have the honor to request you to inform me at the earliest possible moment the exact quantity of ammunition at the following places: Petrograd, Archangel, Kazan, Tiflis.

It is necessary also to state the quantity and storage place of the supplies which have been received from America, England, and France, and also the units which are keeping guard over the military stores.

Head of Division :

O. RAUSCH.

Adjutant :

U. WOLFF.

NOTE.—This is a request made upon a country which America, England, and France still regarded at that date as an ally.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 22.

G[eneral] S[taff] of the High Sea Fleet, No. 79.

Jan. 10, 1918.

(Very Secret)

TO THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS :

The Petersburg representative of the Supreme Sea Command has received by wireless from Kiel orders to propose to the Council of People's Commissars to place at the disposal of our agents at Vladivostok—Buttenhof, Staufacher, and Franz Walden—several steamships. On these ships must be loaded the goods indicated by our named agents and also persons indicated by them, and be sent as directed to ports of the United States, Japan, and British colonies in Eastern Asia. In case of absence of free tonnage in Pacific ports, it is necessary to charter ships sailing under a foreign flag. The object of sending the ships is to carry to enemy countries agents-agitators, and agents-destructors. All the expenses and risk the Petrograd agency of the Supreme Naval Command takes for account of the naval operations fund.

Capt. Lieut. RUDOLPH MILLER.

NOTE.—The indorsement of Lenine's secretary Skripnik is: "Reported." The active Vladivostok agents have been referred to previously. The threat of the arrival of German agents through Pacific ports is apparent.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 23.

G[eneral] S[taff] of the High Sea Fleet, No. 85.

Jan. 14, 1918.

(Very Secret)

TO THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

According to instructions of the German High Sea Command, transmitted to-day to me by radio A, I apply to the Russian Government with a proposal to take measures to deliver to the Pacific by railway three of our submarines, disassembled. On the conclusion of peace negotiations and the conclusion of peace between Russia and Germany this transporting must be begun immediately, whereby on the conclusion of the war the transported vessels will remain at the disposal of the Russian Government.

Capt. Lieut. : RUD. MILLER.

NOTE.—The letter is indorsed: "Reported. Secretary Skripnik." The transporting, according to the categorical demand, was to begin immediately after peace was signed. These are the only two communications of Capt. Miller that appear.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 24.

Commissar for Combating the Counter Revolution and Programs, No. 445/63.

Petrograd, Jan. 21, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSAR OF WAR, SKLIANSKY:

Our agency on the Furhstatskaya informs us that two people not seen before have been noticed to visit the American Embassy three times.

Maj. Luberts begs to point out to Commissioner Podvoisky the necessity of keeping a watch over the movements of these two persons. I ask your instructions.

Commissar : A. KOZMIN.

NOTE.—Maj. Luberts believed in identifying visitors to the American Embassy. Podvoisky was the Minister of War.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No 25.

G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 168.

Dec. 17, 1917.

(Very Secret)

TO THE COMMISSAR ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

At the request of the Commission on Combating the Counter Revolution of December 17, the Intelligence Bureau has the honor to forward a list of men watching the missions of the countries allied to Russia:

The British Embassy is watched by German scouts Luze, Telman, Possel, Franz, and Gezel; Russian agents Ovisannikov, Gluschenko, and Baliasin.

The French Embassy is watched by German scouts Silvester, Butz, Folhagen; Russian agents Balashev, Turin, Gavrillov, and Shilo.

The U. S. A. Embassy is watched by German scouts Strom, Buchholtz, Fasnacht, Todner; Russian agents Spitzberg, Sokolnizky, Turasov, and Vavilov.

The Roumanian mission is watched by German scouts Suttner, Balder, Wolf; Russian agents Kuhl, Nikitin, Zolotov, and Arkipov.

The Italian Embassy is watched by Austrian scouts Kuhler, von Geze, Goin, and Burmeister; Russian agents Salov, Alekseyevsky, and Kuzmin.

These agents must fulfill all instructions of the Commission for Combating the Counter Revolution, Sabotage, Looting, etc.

Head of Bureau:

AGASFER.

Adjutant:

E. RANTZ.

NOTE.—The German Maj. Luberts (Agasfer, see Document No. 5), therefore was the keeper of Ambassadorial hostages of the allied countries in Russia throughout the winter. The names listed above were unidentifiable in the establishments of at least the British and the American Embassies. All may have been outside watchers. The method of outside surveillance is shown in Document No. 27.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 26.

G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 715.

(Personal)

Feb. 23, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

According to my personal conversation with the chairman of the Council of People's Commissars, it has been decided to delay the departure of the Italian Embassy from Petersburg and as far as possible, to search the Embassy baggage. Of this decision I count it my duty to inform you.

For the head of the Bureau:

R. BAUER.

HENRICH.

Adjutant:

NOTE.—Across the top of letter is written by Trotsky, "Instruct," and signed with the initials, L. T. It is here set forth laconically that a German Officer of the General Staff and Lenin in conference ordered the search of the baggage of the ambassador of a country friendly to Russia and at war with Germany; and that Trotsky gave the instruction for carrying out the order. A clerk's note at the bottom is additionally specific: "To be given to Blagonravoff." The last named was the Commissar of Martial Law in Petrograd. The Italian Embassy train was delayed for more than 24 hours when it sought to depart, some days later. Petroff, assistant foreign minister, told me on March 2 with a great show of indignation, that "The Italians had given a diplomatic passport to the embassy cook." So, he said, it was right to search the train. If they had better luck than they did when they held up and searched the Italian ambassador in his automobile almost in front of the Hotel Europe, I did not hear of it. Document 27 tells of that robbery.

Have original letter, No. 26.

DOCUMENT No. 27.

Commissar on Combating the Counter Revolution and Pogroms, No. 71.

PETROGRAD, Feb. 24, 1918.

(Specially Secret—Personal)

TO THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSAR ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

Our agents investigating the Italian Embassy, I. E. Maerov, Imenitski, and Urov, followed up the ambassador and conducted a search of him in the street, with a confiscation. Documents regarding relations with German diplomats and the special papers of the ambassador to the allied ambassadors, mentioned by you, were not found. In order to mask the attack several articles listed in the protocol furnished by Comrade Imenitski were taken from the ambassador.

The watch on the British and American ambassadors and the Serbian minister has been intensified. The supplementary observation point on the British Embassy has been established in the Marble Palace—Lieut. Bekker and a member of the central executive committee of the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies, Frunze.

On the French Embassy, on the French Quay, house No. 8. Comrade Peters, member of the central executive committee of the council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies, supplementary.

On the North American Embassy observation has been established at Furhstaskaya Street, house No. 23, apartments Nos. 1 and 4. In the latter Comrades Goldberg and Spitzberg are carrying on the observation very successfully. Telephones have been installed in the above-mentioned places. General management of the surveillance has been intrusted to Alfred von Geigendorf.

Commissar: MITPOVICH.

For Secretary: R. BAETSKI.

NOTE.—Most of the names in this letter, including the signatures at end, are unfamiliar. Peters, placed in charge of French observation, is a Lettish sailor, active and able, a former resident of England. The robbery of the Italian ambassador took place late in the evening on a lighted frequented central street and was a day's sensation. The observation point on the American Embassy was a yellow apartment house almost opposite the entrance. After I got this information I tested the watch and always saw a head or hand retreating from a window. But I doubt if the watchers profited much by studying the visitors to the embassy.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 28.

Gr. General Staff, Central Division, Section M, No. 389.

(Confidential)

February 24, 1918.

TO THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

According to instructions of the Imperial Government, I have the honor to ask you to make in the shortest possible time an investigation as to what commercial boats, auxiliary cruisers, and transports may be sent into the waters of the Pacific Ocean, where the German Government intends to form, for the purpose of opposing the American-Japanese trade, a powerful commercial fleet flying the Russian flag.

At the same time I call to your attention the data that in your Baltic fleet your sailors are selling from the war ships the launches, small fittings, copper, and bronze parts of machines, etc. Would it not be the proper time to raise the question of selling to Germany these war vessels which are being stripped and disarmed?

Be so kind as to communicate the decision of the Government.

Head of the Russian Division of the German General Staff:

O. RAUSCH.

Adjutant:

U. WOLFF.

NOTE.—Opposite first paragraph is the notation: "Ask Lomof. Markin." Latter was one of Trotsky's secretaries. Opposite paragraph second, Markin makes notation, "Refer to Raskolnikoff." Latter is a commissar on this Naval General Staff, who conducted conferences with German officers in Kronstadt in March, April, and July, 1917, and an active aid to Dybenko in stirring up the Russian fleet to revolt. Do not know who Lomof is. The importance of the first paragraph as indicating the use against America to which Germany intends to put Russia is self-evident. The ludicrous picture painted in the second paragraph at once intensifies the shame of the ending of the fine new Russian Navy and discloses the German hope of securing and refitting the vessels.

Have original letter.

DOCUMENT No. 29.

G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 883.

(Very Secret)

March 9, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSION FOR COMBATING THE COUNTER REVOLUTION:

It is herewith communicated that for watching, and if necessary attacking, the Japanese, American, and Russian officers who may command the expeditionary forces in eastern Siberia, our agents Staufacher, Krieger, Geze, Walden, Buttenhoff, Dattan, and Skribanovich take charge, and to whom it is necessary that either Commissar Kobozeff or any of those named by the commission must apply. The addresses of the agents are shown in list No. 3.

Head:

Adjutant:

R. BAUER.

M. K.—. (?)

NOTE.—Comments to "Telegraph Kobozeff" and "Telegraph Streaberg," with an illegible signature, appear on letter, and below it is the order: "Give the list," initialed "D. Z.," corresponding with the signing habit of Dzerzhinski, chairman of the Commission for Combating the Counter Revolution. Below this order appears the list of addresses, as follows.

Report according to list No. 3.

1. Staufacher Vladivostok, Panoff's house.

2. R. Krieger, Nikolsk, Ussurisky.

3. A. Geze, Irkutsk, drug store, Zhinzheroff.

4. F. Walden, Vladivostok, his own house.

5. Buttenhoff, Khabarovsk, firm Kunst & Albers.

6. Dattan, Tomsk, Nechayevskaya Street (Initial A.)

7. [Brothers or Baron] Kuzberg, Harhin, officers of the Chinese-Eastern Railway.

8. Skribanovich (initial G.), Blago veschensk, house of Kunst & Albers.

9. Panoff, Vladivostok, his own house.

This letter was sent me after I left Petrograd and reached me April 5. It is important not only for content, indicating as it does the names and addresses of agents-destroyers who are called upon for increasing activity against the United States and Japan to make the Pacific Ocean a new area of terror, but showing that the German General Staff was continuing after the Brest-Litovsk "peace" to work actively with the Russian Bolshhevik Government.

Have original letter.

CHAPTER IV.

THE PLOT FOR A SHAMEFUL PEACE.

Germany made its Russian peace with its own puppet government, the misnamed Council of People's Commissars, the president of which is Vladimir Ulianov (Lenin), the foreign minister of which was Leon Trotsky, and the ambassador of which to German is A. Joffe. Germany made this peace harder upon the Russian people as punishment to the ambition of its tools in seeking to become too powerful, and in hoping for a little while not only that Russia would be delivered over to them, but that they could double-cross their masters by turning a simulated German revolution into a real one.

But their craftiness was a toy in the hands of rough German force. Germany was actually double-crossing them by negotiating with the Ukrainian Rada at the moment they dreamed they were tricking Germany.

Germany, however, did not discard the Bolshevik leaders, recognizing their further use in the German world campaign for internal disorganizations in the nations with which it wars, but confined them to the limited inland province which Great Russia proper has now become.

Lenin, according to statements made public as soon as Trotsky's spectacular device of "No peace—No war" failed, always was for peace on any German terms. He dominated the situation thereafter and conceded everything that Germany asked. Nor did Trotsky cease to continue to obey the German orders delivered to him both by Gen. Hoffman at Brest-Litovsk, and at Petrograd directly by the Russian Division of the German General Staff, which was seated in Petrograd itself from November, 1917, and which was still there in full operation when I left, Monday, March 4, the day that Petrograd received notification that peace had been signed at Brest-Litovsk by the Russian and German delegation.

Trotsky, therefore, rests rightly under the accusation of having staged his theatrical scene as a climax to the Russian disorganization desired by Germany. The actual order he gave was for the immediate demobilization of the Russian army, leaving the German army unopposed.

The actual effect of the work of the Bolshevik leaders, moreover, was to enable Germany to combine its former army of the Russian front with its western army, for the launching of its March offensive in France. Such has been the fruition of Russia's German-directed Bolshevikism.

The following documents tell the story of the betrayal of Russia to a shameful and ruinous peace.

DOCUMENT No. 30.

G[reat] General Staff, Central Division, Section M/R, No. 408.

(Secret)

FEBRUARY 26, 1918.

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

This Division of the Staff has the honor to request data of the attitude of the detachments being sent to Pskoff and to guard against all possible disastrous results if in these detachments any will carry on patriotic propaganda and agitations against the German army.

Head of the Russian Division German General Staff:

O. RAUSCH.

Adjutant:

U. WOLFF.

NOTE.—The chairman of the Council of People's Commissars is Lenin. At the top of this letter is the written comment: "Urgent. Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars asks Volodarsky to communicate this to the agitation department. Secretary Skripnik." Skripnik is the first secretary of the Government, personally reporting to Lenin. A second notation in margin is: "Central Executive Committee No. 823 to report," signed with illegible initials. The detachments being sent to Pskoff at this time were composed of Red Guards and of the recruits of the new Red Army. Pskoff was taken by the Germans without a fight.

Have original letter.

DOCUMENT No. 31.

G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 750.

(Very Secret)

February 27, 1918.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

Not having received an exact answer to my question of the 25th of February, I now have the honor a second time to request you to inform me in the shortest possible time the numbers and kind of forces sent to Pskoff and Narva.

At the same time, at the orders of the representative of our General Staff, I once more remind you of the desirability of naming Gen. Parski to the post of commander in chief of the Russian armed forces, in place of Gen. Bonch-Bruevich, whose actions do not meet the approval of the German High Command. Since the attacks on the lives and property of the German landowners in Esthonia and Livonia, which, according to our information, were carried out with the knowledge of Gen. Bonch-Bruevich, and his nationalistic actions in Orel, his continuance in the position of general is no longer desirable.

Head of the Bureau:

AGASFER.

NOTE.—Across the letter is written "Send to Trotsky and Podroiskiy. N. G." (Gorbuinov's initials, chief secretary of the Council of People's Commissars.) Observe the mandatory nature of the whole letter and particularly of the first paragraph. Agasfer, as has been shown, is the cipher signature of Maj. Luberts, head of the Petrograd Intelligence Bureau of the German General Staff, the chief branch of the Russian Division of the German General Staff, the head of which is Maj. Rausch, referred to in this letter as the representative of "our General Staff." Apparently both Luberts and Rausch wrote a warning against sending any patriots to the defending forces, and seemingly the Bolshevik effort at obedience as indicated in document No. 30 was not fast enough to suit the German martinets. Podroiskiy was minister of war.

Gen. Parski was appointed to the command of the Petrograd district, and as late as June 14 still held the post. He formerly was in command of the city of Riga, which was surrendered to the Germans without adequate defense in the early autumn of 1917.

Have original letter.

DOCUMENT No. 32.

G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 272/600.

(Very Secret)

February 6, 1918.

TO THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS :

I ask you to immediately give the Turkish subject, Carp C. Missirof, a Russian passport in place of the one taken from him, which was given him in 1912 on the basis of the inclosed national passport.

Agent C. Missirof is to be sent to the staff of the Russian High Command, where, according to the previous discussion between Gen. Hoffman and Commissars Trotsky and Joffe, he will keep watch on the activity of the head of the staff, Gen. Bonch-Bruevich, in the capacity of assistant to the Commissars Kalmanovich and Feierabend.

For the head of the Bureau :

Adjutant :

R. BAUER.
BUKHOLM.

NOTE.—Here we have the behind-the-scene disclosure of the real relations between Trotsky and Gen. Hoffman at Brest-Litovsk, stripping the mask from the public pose. Trotsky got his orders in this case and he carried them out. Across the top of this letter, too, he has written his own conviction, "Ask Joffe. L. T.," while Joffe, whose rôle seems to be that of the mouthpiece of Germany, has written in the margin, "According to agreement this must be done. A. Joffe." Thereby he becomes a witness for the agreement itself—that pledge between himself, Trotsky, and the military chief of the German Government at the Brest-Litovsk conference, to betray the commander of the Russian army when he should attempt to defend Russia against Germany. A further marginal note states that the passport was given February 7, under the Russian name, P. L. Ilin.

Have original letter and the surrendered passport. Kalmanovich and Feiera-bend were Commissars of Counter Espionage.

THE UKRAINIAN DOUBLE-CROSS.

How the Bolsheviks themselves were double-crossed in the Ukraine; how the Germans toyed with their puppets to disorganize Russia, with disclosures of plans for assassination of loyal Russian leaders, are shown in the following documents and Mr. Sisson's accompanying notes.

DOCUMENT No. 33.

Counter Espionage at Army Headquarters, No. 63.

January 10, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSION FOR COMBATING THE COUNTER REVOLUTION :

The Commissar on Combating the Counter Revolution in a cipher telegram, No. 235, demanded the sending of special agents to Kieff and Novochoerkask.

There have been sent Comrades Vlasenko, Gavrilchuk, and Korablev, who have more than once very successfully performed information service. The commissar in his cipher telegram indicates that the German and Austrian agents assigned from Petrograd, Lieuts. Otto, Kremer, Blum, and Vasilko, are playing a double rôle, reporting on what is happening at Petrograd, and they carry on an intensive agitation in favor of a separate peace of the Ukraine with the Central Powers, and for the restoring of order. Their work is having success.

To Siberia have been ordered Comrades Treflev and Shepshelevich, in connection with your report of the purchase and export of gold by Austrian prisoners in Siberia.

Director of Counter Espionage :

Secretary :

N. DRACHEFF.

NOTE.—So stands disclosed the manner in which Germany set about to double-cross the Bolshevik servants who in success had become at times uppish in bargaining with their masters. It was not a part of the German program to create in Russia a power which it could not at any time control, or, if need be, overturn. Its plan here had the additional advantage of not only disciplining the Petrograd Bolsheviks but also of disunifying Russia still further. It worked out to a separate peace with Ukraine and a separate peace with Great Russia. Lieut. Otto is the Konshin afterwards arrested for some unknown betrayal. See Document No. 2.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 34.

Counter Espionage at Army Headquarters, No. 511.

January 30, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSION FOR COMBATING COUNTER REVOLUTION:

You are informed that the German and Austrian officers located at Kieff now have private meetings with members of the deposed Rada. They insistently inform us of the inevitable signing and ratification of peace treaties both between the Ukraine and the Central Powers and between Roumania and Austria and Germany.

Director of Counter Espionage:

Commissar:

FEIERABEND.

O. KALAMANOVICH.

NOTE.—Corroborative of the preceding document. The separate peace with the Ukraine already had been signed.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 35.

G. G.-S. Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 181.

(Very Urgent)

December 9, 1917.

TO THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

In accordance with your request, the Intelligence Bureau on November 29 sent to Rostof Maj. von Boehlke, who arranged there a survey over the forces of the Don Troop Government. The major also organized a detachment of prisoners of war, who took part in the battles. In this case, the prisoners of war, in accordance with the directions given by the July conference at Kronstadt, participated in by Messrs. Lenin, Zinovieff, Kameneff, Raskolnikoff, Dybenko, Shisko, Antonoff, Krilenko, Volodarsky, and Podvoisky, were dressed in Russian army and navy uniforms. Maj. von Boehlke took part in commanding, but the conflicting orders of the official commander Arnautoff, and the talentless activity of the scout Tulak, paralyzed the plans of our officer.

The agents sent by order from Petrograd to kill Gens. Kaledin, Bogaevesky, and Alexieff were cowardly and nonenterprising people. Agents passed through to Karauloff. The communications of Gen. Kaledin with the Americans and English are beyond doubt, but they limit themselves entirely to financial assistance. Maj. von Boehlke, with the passport of the Finn, Uno Muuri, returned to Petrograd and will make a report today at the office of the chairman of the council at 10 p. m.

For the head of the Bureau:

Adjutant:

R. BAUER.

M. K.—(?)

NOTE.—This is a cold-blooded disclosure of a German-Bolshevik plan for the assassination of Kaledin and Alexieff, as well as proof of a condition often denied by Smolny during the winter—that German prisoners were being armed as Russian soldiers in the struggle against the Russian nationalists on the Don. The letter also contains the most complete list of the participants in the July conspiracy conference at Kronstadt. The marginal comment opposite the assassination paragraph, "Who sent them?" is in an unknown handwriting. Maj. von Boehlke is a German officer referred to in Document No. 5. His cipher signature is Schott.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 36.

G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 136.

(Very Secret)

November 28, 1917.

TO THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

In accordance with your request, the Intelligence Bureau of the General Staff informs the Council of People's Commissars that the Ukrainian Commission at the Austrian High Command, in which participate the empowered representatives of the German Staff, has worked out a plan of the activities of the revolutionaries known to the Council of People's Commissars and the Central Executive Committee of the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies—Chudovsky, Boyarsky, Gubarsky, and Piatakoy—who are under the full direction of the Austro-Hungarian High Command.

The commander in chief of the Russian army has been made acquainted by Schott with plans of the Austro-German High Command and will cooperate with him.

Head of Bureau:

AGASFER.

NOTE.—At this early time there was harmony all around on the Ukraine program, Germans, Austrians, and the Commissars in complete brotherhood. Schott is Maj. von Boehlke and Agasfer is Maj. Luberts.

Have photograph of letter.

CHAPTER V.

TROTSKY AND ROUMANIA

The machinations of Trotsky, inspired by the German Gen. Hoffman, for the disruption of Roumania are disclosed in the following:

DOCUMENT No. 37.

Counter Espionage at Army Headquarters, No. 20.

January 2, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSION ON COMBATING COUNTER REVOLUTION:

Commander in chief Krilenko has requested the Counter Espionage at the Army Headquarters to inform you that it is necessary to order the following persons to the Roumanian front immediately: From Petrograd, Commissar Kuhl, Socialist Rakovsky, Sailor Gnieshin; and from the front the chief of staff of the Red Guard, Durasov. These persons should be supplied with literature and with financial resources for agitation. To them is committed the task of taking all measures for the deposing of the Roumanian king and the removal of counter revolutionary Roumanian officers.

Director of Counter Espionage:

FEIERABEND.

N. DRACHEV.

Secretary:

NOTE.—This marks the continuance of large-scale work to disorganize the Roumanian army. That it advances disappointingly to Germany is evidenced by vengeful steps taken by Gen. Hoffman and Trotsky from Brest-Litovsk, when in the middle of January (western calendar) Trotsky, at the request of Gen. Hoffman, ordered the arrest in Petrograd of the Roumanian minister Diamandi. (See Document 37A.)

At about the same time the Roumanian public gold reserves in custody within the Kremlin walls at Moscow were seized by the Russian Government. Diamandi was released from arrest at the demand of the united diplomatic delegations at Petrograd, but his humiliations continued, and on January 28 he was ordered from Petrograd, being given less than 10 hours to prepare for the departure of a party that contained many women and children. Ambassador Francis sought in vain of Zalkind, who was acting as Foreign Minister in the absence of Trotsky again at Brest, for an extension of the time of departures. The Roumanian party was thrown pell-mell on a train at midnight. It was delayed in Finland on one excuse and another, not immediately apparent, but in three weeks the minister, leaving behind a large part of his people, was allowed to proceed to Torneo. By good luck he reached there the day after the Red Guard lost Torneo to the White Guard. That day saved his life, for on the person of Svetlitzsky, a Russian commissar who joined him in mid-Finland and accompanied him to Torneo, was found an order to Timofeyeff, the commissar at Torneo, to shoot him. Svetlitzsky was shot instead. When I passed through Torneo the control officer talked frankly about the details, expressing the opinion that the shooting might have been a mistake, as it was not shown that Svetlitzsky was aware of the contents of the letter. Svetlitzsky, however, was an important person in Petrograd, close to Trotsky. Our American party brought Guranesco, the first secretary of the Roumanian delegation, out of Finland through the lines with us. He had been in Red Finland seven weeks. Behind us at Bjorneburg we left several families of Roumanians who had departed from Petrograd with the minister. We would have liked to have brought them through the lines of the two armies, but our venture was too desperate to permit unauthorized additions to the party.

The marginal notation on this letter is "Execute," initialed "Ch," the sign manual of Chicherin, the returned exile from England, at that time Assistant Commissar of Foreign Affairs, now Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT 37A*

No. 771, Affair of Peace Delegation.

(Confidential)

Brest-Litovsk, December 31, 1917.

TO THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

Comrade L. Trotsky has charged me to bring to the knowledge of the Council of People's Commissars the motives for his telegraphic proposal to arrest the Roumanian diplomatic representatives in Petersburg.

Gen. Hoffman, referring to the conference which had taken place in Brest-Litovsk between the members of the German and Austro-Hungarian delegations on December 29, presented to the Russian delegation in the name of the German and Austrian Chief Command (a deciphered radio-telegram was exhibited in this connection) a confidential demand concerning the immediate incitement of the Roumanian army to recognize the necessity of an armistice and adopting the terms of a democratic peace pointed out by the Russian delegates. The implacability of the staff and the whole commanding force of the Roumanian army, with regard to which the Chief Command of the German army has received the most exact agency information, spoils the excellent impression produced in Germany and on all the fronts by the Russian peace propositions, which has made it possible to again stimulate the popular feeling against England, France, and America, and can bring about an undesirable and dangerous aggravation of the peace question, up to the German army going over to the attack on our front and an open annexation of the territories occupied in Russia.

The general expressed his opinion that against peace might be the Cossacks, some Ukranian regiments, and the Caucasian army, in which case they will also doubtless be joined by the Roumanian armies, which, according to the information in possession of the German staff, enters into the calculations of Kaledin and Alexieff. It is greatly in the interests of the German and Austrian delegations that complete harmony should prevail on the entire Russian front as regards the conclusion of an armistice and adopting the terms of a separate peace between Russia and Germany, seeing that in this event the German and Austrian Chief Command will propose to Roumania their terms of peace, and will be in a position to take up their operative actions on the western front on a very large scale; at the same time Gen. Hoffman, in the course of a conversation with Comr. Trotsky, twice hinted at the necessity of immediately beginning these war operations.

When Comr. Trotsky declared that at the disposal of the council's power there are no means of influencing the Roumanian staff, Gen. Hoffman pointed out the necessity of sending trustworthy agents to the Roumanian army, and the possibility of arresting the Roumanian mission in Petersburg, and repressive measures against the Roumanian king and the Roumanian commanding forces.

* The contents of this letter, written by Joffe, were telegraphed to Washington in February, and photographic copy of letter forwarded by Ambassador Francis to State Department.

After this interview Comr. L. Trotsky by cable proposed to arrest the Roumanian mission in Petersburg with all its members. This report is being sent by special courier—Comrade I. G. Brossoff, who has to personally transmit to Commissar Podvoisky some information of a secret character regarding the sending to the Roumanian army of those persons whose names Comr. Brossoff will give. All these persons will be paid out of the cash of the "German Naphtha-Industrial Bank," which has bought near Boreslav the business of the joint-stock company of Fanto & Co. The chief direction of those agents has been intrusted, according to Gen. Hoffman's indication, to a certain Wolf Vonigel, who is keeping a watch over the military agents of the countries allied with us. As regards the English and American diplomatic representatives, Gen. Hoffman has expressed the agreement of the German staff to the measures adopted by Comr. Trotsky and Comr. Luzimiroff with regard to watching over their activities.

Member of the delegation:

A. JOFFE.

[Marginal Notations]

Comr. Shitkevitch: Take copies and send to the Commiss. for Foreign Affairs, personally to Comr. Zalkind.

[Passages printed above in italics marked:] To Sanders.

Reported January 4, regarding the arrest of Diamandi and others.

M. SHITKEVITCH.

January 5, 1918.—To the Chancery: Send an urgent telegram to Trotsky about the arrest of the Roumanian minister.—SAVELIEFF.

NOTE (as cabled Feb. 9).—The date is January 12, western calendar, the eve of the Russian New Year. The Roumanian minister was arrested that night in Petrograd, and only released on the united demand of all embassies and legations in Petrograd. Since then he has been sent out of Russia. The letter shows that Trotsky took Gen. Hoffman's personal demand as an order for action. Most important of all, however, it strips the mask from the Lenin and Trotsky public protestations that they have sought to prevent the peace negotiations with Germany from turning to the military advantage of Germany against the United States, England, and France. The aim here disclosed is instead to aid Germany in stimulating feeling against England, France, and the United States, in enabling Germany to prepare for an offensive on the western front. A German bank is named as paymaster for Bolshevik agitators among the Roumanian soldiers. Is "Wolf Vonigel," the field director, the Wolf von Igel of American notoriety? The similarity in name is striking. Finally, Gen. Hoffman and the German staff is satisfied with Trotsky's watch over the American and English diplomats. Joffe, who signs the letter, is a member of the Russian Peace Commission. Since this letter was written Zalkind has gone to Switzerland on a special mission.

NOTE.—(July 6, 1918). He did not reach there, being unable to pass through England, and in April was in Christiana.

DOCUMENT No. 38.

Commission for Combating the Counter Revolution and Pogroms, No. —.

Petrograd, Dec. 14, 1917.

MAJOR VON BOEHLKE:

ESTEEMED COMRADE: I bring to your notice that our Finnish comrades, Hakhia, Pukko, and Enrot have advised the Commissar for Combating the Counter Revolution of the following facts:

1. Between the English officers and the Finnish bourgeois organizations there are connections which cause us serious apprehension.

2. In Finland have been installed two wireless stations which are used by unknown persons who communicate in cipher.

3. Between Gen. Kaledin and the American mission there is an undoubted communication, of which we have received exact information from your source, and, therefore, a most careful supervision of the American Embassy is necessary.

These reports must be established exactly. Our agents are helpless. Please excuse that I write on the official letter heads, but I hasten to do this, sitting here at the commission at an extraordinary meeting. Ready to service.

F. ZALKIND.

NOTE.—The written comment at the top of the letter is: "Commissar for Foreign Affairs. I request exact instructions. Schottl." It is von Boehlke's question, signed with his cipher name. (See document 5.) The letter may imply that von Boehlke had, in the opinion of his good friend Zalkind, a means of internal observation at the American Embassy.

DOCUMENT No. 39.

Counter Espionage at the Army Headquarters, No. 268.

(Very Secret)

January 25, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSION ON COMBATING THE COUNTER REVOLUTION:

The 23d of January at the Army Headquarters [Stavka] there took place a conference at which there participated Maj. von Boehlke, assigned from Petrograd. It was decided, upon the insistence of the German consultants, to send to the internal fronts the following persons, furnishing them all powers for dealing with individual counter revolutionaries:

To the Don: Zhikhorev, Rudnev, Krogultz, and Ernest Delgau.

To the Caucasus Front: Vassili Dumbadze, Prince Machabelli, Sevastianov, and Ter-Baburin.

To the 1st Polish Corps of Gen. Dovbor-Menitsky are assigned Dembitski, Stetkus, Zhimiitis, and Gisman.

Be so good as to take all measures for the quick assignment and the adequate furnishing of the assigned persons with money, reserve passports, and other documents.

Senior officer: PETER MIRONOV.

NOTE.—This is an assassination order against individuals. It was not successful against the Polish general. Dombadze and Prince Machabelli were German spies implicated in the Sukhomlinoff affair and sentenced to prison, but afterwards liberated by the Bolshheviks. Lieut. Col. Dembitski was a Bolshhevik Polish officer. Baburin was an assistant chief of staff under Krilenko. The letter is indorsed: "Comrade Lunacharsky. Go and report to Comrade Zinovieff," signature illegible.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 40.

Counter Espionage at the Army Headquarters, No. 51/572.

January 19, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSION FOR COMBATING THE COUNTER REVOLUTION:

There have been received two notes addressed to the Supreme Commander from the staffs of the Austrian and German High Commands. These notes inform the Army Headquarters [Stavka] that the organizer of the volunteer army in the Don region, Gen. Alexieff, is in written communication with the officer personnel of the Polish legions at the front, with the view of getting the help of Polish officers in the counter revolution. This information has been received by the Austrian agents from the Polish Bolshhevik Comrade Zhuk, who played a large part at Rostov during the November and December battles. On the other side, the representatives of the German Government, Count Lerchenfeldt, reports of the rapidly growing movement in Poland in favor of the bourgeois estate owners' imperialistic plan to defend with arms the greatest possible independence of Poland, with the broadening of its frontiers at the expense of Lithuania, White Russia, and Galicia.

This movement is actively supported by the popular democratic party in Warsaw, as well as Petrograd, by military organizations guided by the counter revolutionary estate owners and the bourgeois Polish clergy.

The situation which has arisen was discussed on the 16th of January at the Stavka in the presence of Maj. von Boehlke, sent by the Petrograd branch of the German Intelligence Bureau, and it was there decided:

1. To take the most decisive measures, up to shooting en masse, against the Polish troops which have submitted to the counter revolutionary and imperialistic propaganda.

2. To arrest Gen. Dovhor-Menitsky.
3. To arrange a surveillance of the commanding personnel.
4. Send agitators to the Polish legions to consult regarding this the Polish revolutionary organizations known to the committee.
5. On learning of the counter revolutionary activity of Polish officers to immediately arrest them and send them to the Stavka at the disposal of the Counter Espionage.
6. To arrest the emissaries of Gen. Alexieff, Staff Capt. Shuravsky, and Capt. Rushitsky.
7. To request the Commission for Combating the Counter Revolution, in agreement with the German Intelligence Bureau at Petrograd, to arrange a surveillance and observation of the following institutions and persons:
 - (a) The military committee.
 - (b) The Society of Friends of the Polish Soldier.
 - (c) Inter-Party Union.
 - (d) The Union of Polish Invalids.
 - (e) Members of the Polish Group of the former state Duma and council.
 - (f) The chairman, Lednitsky, and the members of the former Committee for the Liquidation of Affairs of the Kingdom of Poland.
 - (g) Boleslav Jalovtski.
 - (h) Vladislav Grabski.
 - (i) Stanislav Shuritski.
 - (j) Roman Catholic Polish Clergy.
 - (k) The Polish Treasury through which, according to agency reports, the governments of countries allied with Russia intend, with the assistance of the New York National City Bank, to supply with monetary resources the counter revolutionary camp.

(l) It is necessary to verify the private papers of several Lithuanian revolutionaries that among the Church Benevolent Funds, which are at the disposal of the Polish clergy, are the capitals of private persons who hid their money from requisition for the benefit of the state.

In case of establishment of any connection with the counter revolution, the guilty Polish institutions are to be liquidated, their leaders and also persons connected with the counter revolutionary activity are to be arrested, and sent to the disposal of the Stavka.

Chief of the Counter Espionage:

Commissar:

FEIERABEND.
KALMANOVICH.

NOTE.—Again Germany, through Count Lerchenfeldt, was intriguing on both sides. Chiefly, however, the significance of the letter is in the thoroughness of the outlined German plan to crush the threat of armed opposition from the Polish legions of the Russian army. The troops were fired upon, as indicated. The preceding document really follows this in natural sequence. The next two further elucidate the situation for the benefit of the Poles of the outside world. Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 41.

Counter Espionage at the Army Headquarters, No. 461.

January 28, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSION FOR COMBATING THE COUNTER REVOLUTION:

The Special Constituent Commission on the conflict with the Polish counter revolutionary troops has begun its activity. All the conduct of its affairs has been located at the Counter Espionage at the Army Headquarters [Stavka], where is being collected all information on the counter revolution on the external and internal fronts. At the commission have arrived members of the Commission for Combating the Counter Revolution, E. Miekonoshin, I. Zenzinov, Zhilinski, and from Sevastopo Comrade Tiurin. To a conference were called agents announcing their wish to be sent for conflict with the bourgeois Polish officers: Lieut. Col. Dembitski, Boleslav Yakimovich, Roman Strievsky, Joseph Yasenovsky, and Mikhail Adamovich. All those agents are under obligation to carry the affair to the point of open insubordination of the soldiers against the officers and the arrest of the latter.

For emergency the commander in chief ordered to assign Nakhim Sher and Ilya Razymov for the destruction of the counter revolutionary ringleaders among the Polish troops, and the commission recognized the possibility of de-declaring all Polish troops outside the law, when that measure should present itself as imperative.

From Peterburg, observers announced that the Polish organizations are displaying great reserve and caution in mutual relations. There has been established, however, an unquestionable contact between the High Military Council located in Peterburg and the Polish officers and soldiers of the bourgeois estate-owning class with the counter revolutionary Polish troops. On this matter in the Commissariat on Military Affairs, there took place on January 22 a conference of Comrades Podvoisky, Kedrov, Boretzky, Dybenko, and Kovalsky. The Commissar on Naval Affairs announced that the sailors Trushin, Markin, Peinkaitis, and Schultz demand the dismissal of the Polish troops, and threaten, in case it is refused, assaults on the Polish legionaries in Peterburg. The commander-in-chief suggests that it might be possible to direct the rage of the sailors mentioned, and of their group, to the front against the counter revolutionary Polish troops.

At the present time our agitation among the Polish troops is being carried on in very active fashion and there is great hope for the disorganization of the Polish legionaries.

Chief of Counter Espionage:

Secretary

FEIERABEND,
IV. ALEXIEFF.

NOTE.—Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 42.

Counter Espionage at the Army Headquarters, No. 21.

January 28, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSION FOR COMBATING THE COUNTER REVOLUTION:

At the request of the commander in chief, in answer to your inquiry, I inform you, supplementary to the dispatch, that the funds sent with Maj. Bayermeister have been received here. Among the troops acting on the front against the counter revolutionaries have been prepared several battalions for conflict with the Poles and Roumanians. We will pay 12 roubles a day, with an increased food ration. From the hired sections sent against the legionaries have been formed two companies, one from the best shots for the shooting of officer-regiments, the other of Lithuanians and Letts for the spoiling of food reserves in Vitebsk, Minsk, and Mogilev governments, in the places where the Polish troops are situated. Various local peasants have also agreed to attack the regiments and exterminate them.

Commissar:

Secretary:

G. MOSHOLOV.
IV. ALEXIEFF.

NOTE.—These two documents show that the policy against these patriotic soldiers was one of merciless extermination, financed by German money, handed out by a German officer. Bayermeister is named in Document No. 5.

Have photograph of letter.

CHAPTER VI.

THE COMPLETE SURRENDER.

The following documents show the complete surrender of the Bolshevik leaders to their German masters:

DOCUMENT No. 43.

G[reat] General Staff, Central Division, Section M-R, No. 411.

February 26, 1918.

(Very Secret.)

TO THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

According to instructions from the High Command of the German Army, I have the honor to remind you that the withdrawing and disarming of the Russian Red Guard from Finland must be commenced immediately. It is known to the staff that the chief opponent of this step is the head of the Finnish Red Guard, Yarvo Haapalainen, who has a great influence on the Russian tovarische [comrades]. I request you to assign for this struggle with Haapalainen our agent, Walter Nevalainen (Nevalaiselle), bearer of Finnish passport 3681, and supply him with a passport and passes.

Head of the Division:

O. RAUSCH.

U. WOLFF.

Adjutant:

NOTE.—Written at the top of the letter and signed N. G., the initials of Lenin's secretary, N. Gorbunov, is the order: "Send to the Commissar of Foreign Affairs and execute." In the margin is written "Passport 211—No. 392," but unfortunately the name under which the new passport was given is not mentioned. This order explains the withdrawal of the Russian Red Guard from Finland in early March and the abandonment of the Finnish Red Guard to its fate. The latter, however, took care of the disarming both of Russian soldiers and sailors as they left Finland, for the Finns needed guns and ammunition. The Russians sometimes fought but were surrounded and disarmed. In Helsingfors while I was there in March the Red Guard and the sailors were fighting each other nightly with rifles and machine guns. One of two Finnish Red Guard leaders almost surely is Nevalainen, but under the circumstances I do not care to speculate.

The order to hold all foreign embassies in Red Finland was given coincidentally with the appearance of one of them upon the scene. The excuse offered was that foreigners were carrying information to the White Guard. Simultaneously influence was exerted in the White Guard to increase difficulties in passage between the lines. It is reasonable to place the obstacles to passage created on both sides of the Finnish line to German effort, for German aid was being given the White Guard openly at the moment it was intriguing in the inner councils of the Red Guard. The American party concerned in Finland escaped only by persistence and good fortune. The British Embassy party was passed through the day before the closing order came. The French and Italian Embassies were obliged after a month of vain effort to return to Russia.

Have original letter and the surrendered passport.

DOCUMENT No. 44.

G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 283.

February 7, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

We are told that secret service agents attached to the Army Headquarters [Stavka] are following Maj. Erich, who has been ordered to Kieff. I ask you to take urgent measures to remove the surveillance of the above-named officer.

Head of the Bureau:

AGASFER.

Adjutant:

BUKHOLM.

NOTE.—Chicerin, assistant foreign minister, initials a marginal comment, "Talk it over." This note marks the period of acute irritation over the Ukraine between Bolsheviks and Germans. Agasfer is Maj. Luberts.

Have original letter.

DOCUMENT No. 45.

G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 228.

February 4, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

By instructions of the representative of our staff I have the honor to ask you immediately to recall from the Ukrainain front the agitators Bryansky, Wolf, Drabkin, and Pittsker. Their activity has been recognized as dangerous by the German General Staff.

Head of the Bureau:

AGASFER.

Adjutant:

HENRICH.

NOTE.—An exchange of courtesies of the same period as Document No. 44. Chicerin has notated it, "Discuss."

Have original letter, and also photo secured earlier.

DOCUMENT No. 46.

G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 228.

February 3, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSAR OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

According to instructions of the representative of our General Staff, I have the honor once more to insist that you recall from Esthonia, Lithuania, and Courland all agitators of the Central Executive Committee of the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies.

Head of the Bureau:

AGASFER.

Adjutant:

BUCKHOLM.

NOTE.—Another instance of the time when Germany was using an iron hand of discipline, clearing of agitators the Provinces it already had announced its intention of seizing for its own. The letter was referred by Markin, one of Trotsky's secretaries, to Volodarsky, who seems to have been in charge of the proletarian agitation in these Provinces.

Have original of letter, and also photo secured earlier.

DOCUMENT No. 47.

G. G.-S., Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 317.

TO THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

The Intelligence Bureau has received precise information that the agitators of the Petrograd Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies, Volodarski, Brosoff, and Guschin, have completely changed the character of the Esthonia socialists' activity, which finally led to the local German landlords being declared outlawed. By order of the General Staff I ask you to take immediate steps for the restoring of the rights of the above-mentioned German landlords and the recalling of the agitators.

For the head of the Bureau:

R. BAUER.

Adjutant:

E. RATITZ.

NOTE.—This order for the release of the German landlords was at once obeyed, and the act of surrender, evidently at the direct order of Lenin, to whom this letter is addressed, marked the end of the incipient rebellion of the Bolshevik leaders against their German masters.

Have photograph of letter.

VARIED ACTIVITIES.

The following documents show various miscellaneous activities, including measures for the assassination of counter revolutionaries:

DOCUMENT No. 48.

Counter Espionage at the Army Headquarters, No. —.

January 22, 1918.

TO THE COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS:

By our agents it has been established that connections between the Poles, the Don, and French officers, and also probably the diplomatic representatives of the allied powers, are maintained by means of Russian officers traveling under the guise of sack speculators. In view of this we request you to take measures for the strict surveillance of the latter.

Commissar:

KALMANOVICH.

NOTE.—The indorsement on this is by Gorbunoff, "Copy to inform Podvoisky and Dzerzhinsky." The former was War Minister, the latter chairman of the Commission for Combating the Counter Revolution. Such speculators were food peddlers who went into the provinces and brought food to the cities for profitable sale. Soldiers practically had a monopoly of the trade.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 49.

G[reat] General Staff, Intelligence Bureau, Section R, No. 151.

December 4, 1917.

TO THE COMMISSARIAT OF MILITARY AFFAIRS:

Herewith the Intelligence Bureau has the honor to transmit a list of the persons of Russian origin who are in the service of the German Intelligence Department:

Sakharoff, officer First Infantry Reserve Regiment; Ensign Ter-Arytiuniantz, Zanko, Yarchuk, Colovin, Zhuk, Ilinsky, Cherniavsky, Capt. Postinkov, Schneider, Sailors Trushin and Gavrilov. All the persons mentioned are on the permanent staff of the Intelligence Bureau of the German General Staff.

Head of the Bureau:

AGASFER.

Adjutant:

HENRICH.

NOTE.—Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 50.

G[reat] General Staff, Central Division, Section M, No. 22.

January 14, 1918.

(Very Confidential)

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE PEOPLE'S COUNCIL OF COMMISSARS:

The Russian Division of the German General Staff has received an urgent report from our agents at Novocherkash and Rostoff that the friction which has arisen between Gen. Alexieff and Gen. Kaledin, after which the volunteer corps of Gen. Alexieff began the movement to the north, is a tactical step to have a base in the rear. In this way the army of Gen. Alexieff will have a reliable rear base, protected by Cossack troops, for supplying the army, and a base in case of an overwhelming movement on the part of the enemy. The communications of Gen. Alexieff with the Polish troops have been proved by new reports of the Polish Bolshevik commissars, Zhuk and Dembitski.

Chief of the Division of General Staff:

O. RAUSCH.

Chief Adjutant:

R. KRIEGER.

NOTE.—Important as showing that the German had a real fear of the military possibilities in the Alexieff-Kaledin movement. The suicide of Gen. Kaledin at a moment of depression, following betrayals that undoubtedly were carefully plotted, was tragically a part of the great national tragedy.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 51.

Counter Espionage at the Army Headquarters, No. 263/79.

January 23, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSARIAT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

To your inquiry regarding those agents who might be able to give an exact report of the sentiment of the troops and population in the Provinces, I transmit to you a short list of the Russo-German agents-informers: In Voronezh, S. Sirtzoff; in Rostoff, Globoff and Melikoff; in Tiflis, Euskivze, and Gavriloff; in Kazan, Pfaltz; in Samara, Oaipoff and Voenig; in Omsk, Blagovenshensky and Sipko; in Toms, Dattan, Tarasoff, and Rodionoff; in Irkutsk, Zhinzherova and Geze; in Vladivostok, Buttenhoff, Pannoff, and Erlanger.

Chief of Counter Espionage:

FEIERABEND.

Commissar:

KALMANOVICH.

NOTE.—Apart from the list of agents this letter has interest from the comment: "To the company of Comrade Bonch-Bruevich and Secret Department." The signature is illegible.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 52.

Counter Espionage at the Army Headquarters, No. 395.

January 21, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSION FOR COMBATING THE COUNTER REVOLUTION :

The agents of the Counter Espionage at the Stavka [Army Headquarters] have established that the anarchists Stepan Kriloff, Fedor Kutzi, and Albert Bremsen, at Helsingfors, and also Nahim Arshavsky, Ruphim Levin, and Mikhail Shatiloff had during the recent days a conference with the chief of staff of the Petrograd army district Shpilko. After Comrade Shpilko transmitted to the anarchists the offer of Comrade Antonoff and Comrade Bersin to recruit agents for the destruction of several counter revolutionists, the latter expressed their willingness and immediately began the recruiting. To Kieff are assigned the following, who have been hired at Helsingfors; S. Smirnoff and Rigamann; and to Odessa, Brack and Schulkovich.

For the Chief of the Counter Espionage.

Commissar: C. MOSHLOV.

NOTE.—This is an assassination compact between Bolsheviks and anarchists. Antonoff, if one of the chief Bolshevik military leaders, is credited with the taking of Petrograd, and was in charge of the operations against Alexieff and Kaleidin. The list of anarchists include several notorious characters.

Have photograph of letter.

DOCUMENT No. 53.

Counter Espionage at the Army Headquarters, No. 471.

January 27, 1918.

TO THE COMMISSION FOR COMBATING THE COUNTER REVOLUTION :

By us here there has been received a report from Finland, from Grishin and Rakhi, of the counter revolutionary activity of the lawyer, Jonas Kastren. This Kastren, in the years 1914-15 recruited on German funds Finnish volunteer regiments and sent them to Germany. For facilitating the work of recruiting he represented himself as a Socialist-Maximalist, and promised support to the Workers' Red Guard. In his office in Stockholm many of our comrades found a cordial reception and material support. Kastren furnished to Russia German money for the propaganda of Bolshevism in Russia. He had already established in 1916 a division of the German General Staff in Helsingfors. Now he, together with Svinhuvud, Ernroth, and Nandelschtedt, is on the side of the White Guards and is aiding them with money, supplies, and arms. We are informed that Kastren works both with German and English money. It is necessary immediately to cut short the work of Jonas Kastren and his group. The commander in chief advises to call to Petersburg the Finnish comrades, Rahki and Pukho, or order Grishin to Helsingfors.

Commissar :

A. SIVKO.

Secretary :

IV. ALEXIEFF.

NOTE.—Kastren was still alive when I spent a week in Helsingfors in March, but he added to his chances of longevity by fleeing in early February to the White Guards headquarters at Vasa. The order for his removal came too late. Again we see Germany playing with both sides in Finland at the same time.

Have photograph of letter.

* * * * *

(The following was, on May 14, 1919, ordered inserted in the record at this point:)

NOTE BY MR. HUMES.—In view of the testimony of Col. Raymond Robins relative to the opinion of Mr. R. H. B. Lockhart, who represented the English Government in Russia, and with whom he cooperated in many official activities, the following communication from Mr. Lockhart, which is one of "A collection of reports on Bolshevism in Russia" submitted by the English Government to Parliament in April, 1919, is hereby submitted for the record:

Mr. Lockhart to Sir G. Clerk.

DEAR SIR GEORGE,

NOVEMBER 10, 1918.

The following points may interest Mr. Balfour:

1. The Bolsheviks have established a rule of force and oppression unequalled in the history of any autocracy.

2. Themselves the fiercest upholders of the right of free speech, they have suppressed, since coming into power, every newspaper which does not approve their policy. In this respect the Socialist press has suffered most of all. Even the papers of the Internationalist Mensheviks like "Martov" have been suppressed and closed down, and the unfortunate editors thrown into prison or forced to flee for their lives.

3. The right of holding public meetings has been abolished. The vote has been taken away from everyone except the workmen in the factories and the poorer servants, and even amongst the workmen those who dare to vote against the Bolsheviks are marked down by the Bolshevik secret police as counter-revolutionaries, and are fortunate if their worst fate is to be thrown into prison, of which in Russia to-day it may truly be said, "many go in but few come out."

4. The worst crimes of the Bolsheviks have been against their Socialist opponents. Of the countless executions which the Bolsheviks have carried out a large percentage has fallen on the heads of Socialists who had waged a life-long struggle against the old régime, but who are now denounced as counter-revolutionaries merely because they disapprove of the manner in which the Bolsheviks have discredited socialism.

5. The Bolsheviks have abolished even the most primitive forms of justice. Thousands of men and women have been shot without even the mockery of a trial, and thousands more are left to rot in the prisons under conditions to find a parallel to which one must turn to the darkest annals of Indian or Chinese history.

6. The Bolsheviks have restored the barbarous methods of torture. The examination of prisoners frequently takes place with a revolver at the unfortunate prisoner's head.

7. The Bolsheviks have established the odious practice of taking hostages. Still worse, they have struck at their political opponents through their women folk. When recently a long list of hostages was published in Petrograd, the Bolsheviks seized the wives of those men whom they could not find and threw them into prison until their husbands should give themselves up.

8. The Bolsheviks who destroyed the Russian army, and who have always been the avowed opponents of militarism, have forcibly mobilised officers who do not share their political views, but whose technical knowledge is indispensable, and by the threat of immediate execution have forced them to fight against their fellow-countrymen in a civil war of unparalleled horror.

9. The avowed ambition of Lenin is to create civil warfare throughout Europe. Every speech of Lenin's is a denunciation of constitutional methods, and a glorification of the doctrine of physical force. With that object in view he is destroying systematically both by executions and by deliberate starvation every form of opposition to Bolshevism. This system of "terror" is aimed chiefly at the Liberals and non-Bolshevik Socialists, whom Lenin regards as his most dangerous opponents.

10. In order to maintain their popularity with the working men and with their hired mercenaries, the Bolsheviks are paying their supporters enormous wages by means of an unchecked paper issue, until to-day money in Russia has naturally lost all value. Even according to their own figures the Bolsheviks' expenditure exceeds the revenue by thousands of millions of roubles per annum.

These are facts for which the Bolsheviks may seek to find an excuse, but which they can not deny.

Yours, sincerely.

R. H. B. LOCKHART.

(The following, submitted after the close of the hearings, by Mr. Humes, was ordered printed in the record:)

[Translation.]

RUSSIAN REVOLUTIONARY PAMPHLETS.

CONSTITUTION (FUNDAMENTAL LAW) OF THE RUSSIAN SOCIALIST FEDERAL SOVIET REPUBLIC.

[Published by the Department of Foreign Political Literature of the People's Commissariat for Foreign Affairs, Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic. Moscow, 1918.]

DECISION OF THE 5TH ALL-RUSSIAN CONVENTION OF THE SOVIETS, ADOPTED AT THE SESSION OF JULY 10TH, 1918.

The declaration of the rights of the toiling and exploited people, confirmed by the 3rd All-Russian Convention of Soviets in January, 1918, constitutes, together with the Constitution of the Soviet Republic which was confirmed by the 5th Convention of the Soviets the sole fundamental law of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic.

This fundamental law comes into force from the moment of its publication in its final form in the "Izvestiya of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Soviets." It must be published by all local organs of the Soviet government and exhibited in a prominent place in all Soviet institutions.

The 5th Convention charges the People's Commissary for Public Instruction to introduce in all schools and institutions of learning of the Russian Republic without exception the study of the fundamental principles of the present Constitution, as well as their explanation and interpretation.

DIVISION 1.—DECLARATION OF THE RIGHTS OF THE TOILING AND EXPLOITED PEOPLE.

CHAPTER ONE.

1. Russia is declared a Republic of Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies. All central and local power belongs to these Soviets.

2. The Soviet Republic of Russia is established upon the basis of a free union of free nations, as a federation of Soviet national republics.

CHAPTER TWO.

3. Setting before itself the fundamental task of putting an end to all exploitation of man by man, of removing the division of society into classes, of mercilessly suppressing the exploiters, of establishing a socialist organization of society, and of securing the victory of socialism in all countries, the 3rd All-Russian Convention of Soviets of W. S. and P. D. decrees as follows:

(a) For the purpose of realizing the principle of the socialization of land, private ownership in land is abolished and the entire land fund is declared the property of the people and is turned over to the toilers without any indemnity upon the principle of equalization of land-allotments.

(b) All forests, mineral wealth, water power and waterways of public importance, as well as all live stock and agricultural implements, all model landed estates and agricultural enterprises are declared national property.

(c) As a first step to the complete transfer of factories, mills, mines railroads and other means of production and transportation into property of the Workers' and Peasants' Soviet Republic, the law concerning the workers' control and concerning the Supreme Council for National Economy, which aims at securing the power of the toilers over the exploiters, is hereby confirmed.

(d) The 3rd Convention of the Soviets considers the Soviet law concerning the annulling (repudiation) of loans contracted by the governments of the Tzar, the landlords and the capitalists, as the first blow at international banking and financial capital and expresses the conviction that the Soviet government will advance steadfastly along this path until complete victory of the international workers' against the yoke of capitalism is secured.

(e) The principle of the transfer of all banks to the property of the workers' and peasants' state, as one of the conditions of emancipation of the toiling masses from the yoke of capital is hereby reaffirmed.

(f) For the purpose of doing away with parasitical elements in society and of organizing the economic affairs of the country, universal obligatory labor service is established.

(g) In order to secure full power for the toiling masses, and to remove every opportunity for re-establishing the government of the exploiters, the principle of arming the toilers, of forming a Socialistic Red Army of the workers and peasants and of completely disarming the property-holding classes is hereby decreed.

CHAPTER THREE.

4. Expressing its unshakable determination to drag humanity out of the clutches of financial capital and imperialism, which has soaked the earth with blood in the present most criminal of all wars, the 3rd Convention of the Soviets expresses its entire approval of the policy adopted by the Soviet government namely, that of tearing up the secret treaties; of organizing on the largest scale possible fraternization with the workers and peasants of the armies now at war with each other, and of securing by revolutionary means and at all costs a democratic peace of the toilers without annexations and indemnities, upon the basis of free self-determination of nations.

5. For the same purpose the 3rd Convention of the Soviets insists upon the complete repudiation of the barbarous policy of bourgeois civilization, which enables the exploiters in a few chosen nations to prosper upon the enslavement of hundreds of millions of the toiling population in Asia, in colonies generally, and in small countries.

6. The 3rd Convention of the Soviets welcomes the policy of the Council of the People's Commissaries, who have proclaimed the complete independence of Finland, have begun the withdrawal of troops from Persia, and have declared the freedom of self-determination for Armenia.

CHAPTER FOUR.

7. The 3rd All-Russian Convention of the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies holds that at the present moment of decisive struggle of the proletariat with its exploiters, the latter can have no place in any of the organs of government. The government must entirely and exclusively be in the hands of the toiling masses and their authorized representative—The Soviets of Workers', Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies.

8. At the same time, aiming at creating a really free and voluntary union of the toiling classes of all nationalities of Russia, the 3rd Convention of the Soviets limits itself to establishing the basic principles of a federation of Soviet republic of Russia, leaving to the workers and peasants of each nationality the right to decide for themselves at their own duly authorized convention of soviets, whether and on which conditions they wish to participate in the federal government and in the other federal soviet institutions.

DIVISION TWO.—GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE RUSSIAN SOCIALISTIC FEDERAL SOVIET REPUBLIC.

CHAPTER FIVE.

9. The principal aim of the Constitution of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic in the present transitory period is to establish the dictatorship of the city and rural proletariat and of the poorest elements of the peasantry in the form of the powerful All-Russian Soviet government for the purpose of completely suppressing the capitalist class, of abolishing the exploitation of man by man and of establishing Socialism, under which there will be no division of society into classes, nor any power of state.

10. The Russian Republic is a free socialist society of all the toilers of Russia. The entire power of government within the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic belongs to the whole working population of the country, united round the city and rural Soviets.

11. Soviets of (oblasts) (regions), distinguished by the mode of living and national peculiarities of their population, may combine into autonomous (oblast) (regional) unions at the head of which are the (Oblast) Conventions of Soviets, and their executive organs. These autonomous (oblast) (regional) unions also should be at the head of any (oblast) combinations that may be formed.

These autonomous (oblast) (regional) unions enter on the federal basis into the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic.

12. The supreme authority in the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic belongs to the All-Russian Convention of Soviets and in the interval between conventions to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee.

13. For the purpose of securing for the toilers real freedom of conscience the church is separated from the state and the school from the church and the freedom of religious and antireligious propaganda is secured for all citizens.

14. For the purpose of securing for the toilers real freedom of expression of their opinions the R. S. F. S. R. abolishes the dependence of the press upon capital and places in the hands of the working class and of the poorer elements of the peasantry all the technical and material means for the publication of newspapers, pamphlets, books and all other press productions and secures their free circulation throughout the country.

15. For the purpose of securing for the toilers real freedom of assembly, the R. S. F. S. R., recognizing the right of the citizens of the Soviet Republic to freely hold meetings, gatherings, processions, etc., places at the disposal of the working class and of the poorer element of the peasantry all premises suitable for holding public meetings, including furniture, lighting and heating.

16. For the purpose of securing for the toilers real freedom of workers union, the R. S. F. S. R., having broken the economic and political power of the property holding classes and having thus removed all obstacles which under the bourgeois order of society prevented the workers and peasants from enjoying freedom of organization and action, renders to the workers and poorest peasants all possible assistance, material and otherwise, in order to unite and organize them.

17. For the purpose of securing for the toilers real access to knowledge, the R. S. F. S. R. aims at placing at the disposal of the workers and of the poorest peasants full and general education free of charge.

18. The Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic recognizes labour as a duty of all citizens of the republic and proclaims the motto: "He who does not work neither shall he eat."

19. For the purpose of defending by all means the conquests of the great revolution of workers and peasants, the R. S. F. S. R. recognizes as a duty of all citizens of the Republic the defence of the socialist fatherland and establishes universal obligatory military service. The honourable privilege of defending the revolution with arms in hand is granted only to the toilers; upon the non-working elements other military duties are imposed.

20. Basing its actions upon the idea of solidarity of the toilers of all nations, the R. S. F. S. R. grants all political rights of Russian citizenship to foreigners, who live upon the territory of the Russian Republic, are engaged in productive occupations and who belong either to the working class or to peasants that do not exploit the labour of others. The R. S. F. S. R. recognizes the right of local Soviets to grant to such foreigners without any troublesome formalities the rights of Russian citizenship.

21. The Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic grants the right of asylum to all foreigners who are being persecuted for religious or political offences.

22. The R. S. F. R. recognizing the equality of the rights of citizens independent of their race and nationality, declares that it is contrary to the basic laws of the Republic to establish or to tolerate any privileges or advantages on this ground, as well as to in any way oppress national minorities or curtail the equality of their rights.

23. Guided by the rights of the working class as a whole, the R. S. F. R. deprives individuals and separate groups of any rights, which they may be using to the detriment of the Socialist Revolution.

DIVISION THREE.—CONSTRUCTION OF THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT.—A. ORGANISATION OF THE CENTRAL GOVERNMENT.

CHAPTER SIX.—CONCERNING THE ALL-RUSSIAN CONVENTION OF SOVIETS OF WORKERS' PEASANTS' AND RED-ARMY DEPUTIES.

24. The All-Russian Convention of Soviets is the Supreme Authority in the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic.

25. The All-Russian Convention is formed of representatives of the Soviets of the cities on the basis of one deputy for 25,000 electors and of representatives of the provincial ("gubernia") conventions of Soviets on the basis of one deputy for 125,000 inhabitants.

NOTE 1. In case the convention of the Soviets of a "gubernia" does not directly precede the All-Russian Convention, the delegates to the latter are sent directly by the Conventions of "uyezds."

NOTE 2. In case the Convention of the Soviets of the "oblast" directly precedes the All-Russian Convention, the delegates to the latter be sent by the convention of the "oblast."

26. The All-Russian Convention of Soviets is called by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee not less than twice a year.

27. A special All-Russian Convention is called by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee on its own initiative or on the demand of Soviets of localities, on which are represented not less than one third of the entire population of the Republic.

28. The All-Russian Convention of the Soviets elects an All-Russian Central Executive Committee consisting of not more than 200 persons.

29. The All-Russian Central Executive Committee is entirely responsible to the All-Russian Convention of Soviets.

30. During the intervals between the Conventions the Supreme the Republic is the All-Russian Central Executive Committee.

CHAPTER SEVEN.—CONCERNING THE ALL-RUSSIAN CENTRAL EXECUTIVE

31. The All-Russian Central Executive Committee is the high administrative and controlling organ in the R. S. F. S. R.

32. The All-Russian Central Executive Committee gives a general direction to the activities of the workers' and peasants government and of the Soviet Government in the country; it unites and co-ordinates of legislation and administration, and sees to the carrying out of the Constitution and of the decisions of the All-Russian Convention and of the central organs of the Soviet Government.

33. The All-Russian Central Executive Committee considers projected decrees and other propositions brought in by the Council of Commissaries or by the different departments of the administration; it also issues its own decrees and orders.

34. The All-Russian Central Executive Committee summons the All-Russian Convention of Soviets to which it submits a report of its activities and reports concerning the general policy and special questions.

35. The All-Russian Central Executive Committee appoints the People's Commissaries for the general administration of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic, and it also establishes (People's Commissariats) for the different branches of the administration.

36. Members of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee are appointed to the different departments of administration (People's Commissariats) or to the commissions of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee.

CHAPTER EIGHT.—CONCERNING THE COUNCIL OF THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSARIES

37. The general administration of the affairs of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic is in the hands of the Council of People's Commissaries.

38. To accomplish this task, the Council of People's Commissaries issues decrees, orders, and instructions, and in general takes all measures for regularly and speedily carrying on the business of the state.

39. The Council of People's Commissaries immediately informs the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of all decrees and decisions of the Council.

40. The All-Russian Central Executive Committee has the right to annul or hold up any order or decisions of the Council of the People's Commissaries.

41. All decrees and decisions of the Council of the People's Commissaries of high political importance are presented to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee for consideration and approval.

NOTE.—Measures requiring immediate execution may be carried out by the Council of the People's Commissaries directly.

42. The members of the Council of the People's Commissaries are appointed by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee.

43. Eighteen People's Commissariats are formed, viz :

- (a) For Foreign Affairs;
- (b) For Military Affairs;
- (c) For Naval Affairs;
- (d) For the Interior;
- (e) For Justice;
- (f) For Labour;
- (g) For Social Insurance;
- (h) For Public Instruction;
- (i) For Posts and Telegraphs;
- (j) For Nationalities;
- (k) For Finance;

44. With every People's Commissary and under his presidency a collegiate (Board of Commissioners) is formed, the members of which are confirmed by the Council of People's Commissaries.

45. A People's Commissary has the right to make decisions in accordance with his personal judgment on all questions which come under his particular department, informing the members of the collegiate of such decisions. If these members do not approve of some decision of the People's Commissary, the collegiate, without holding up the execution of the decision may lodge a complaint with the Council of the People's Commissaries or with the presidium of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee. The same right of lodging complaints is enjoyed by individual members of the collegiate.

46. The Council of the People's Commissaries is entirely responsible to the All-Russian Convention of Soviets and the All-Russian Central Executive Committee.

47. The People's Commissaries and the collegiates at the head of the People's Commissariats are entirely responsible to the Council of the People's Commissaries and to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee.

48. The title of People's Commissary belongs exclusively to the members of the Council of the People's Commissaries, which administer the general affairs of the R. S. F. S. R., and may not be appropriated by any other representatives of the central or local Soviet Government.

CHAPTER NINE.—CONCERNING THE ADMINISTRATIVE FUNCTIONS OF THE ALL-RUSSIAN CONVENTION OF SOVIETS AND OF THE ALL-RUSSIAN CENTRAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

49. All matters of general state importance fall under the jurisdiction of the All-Russian Convention of Soviets and of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee. Such matters are:

(a) The confirmation of, alteration and addition to the constitution of the R. S. F. S. R.

(b) The general direction of the entire foreign and internal policy of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic.

(c) The establishment and alteration of frontiers, as well as the alienation of any part of the territory of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic or of the rights belonging to it.

(d) The determination of the powers possessed by and the boundaries between the various Soviet organizations of the "oblasts," which go to make up the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic, as well as the settlement of disputes among them.

(e) The admission into the R. S. F. S. R. of new federal parts of the Soviet Republic and the acknowledgment of the withdrawal of any part of the Russian Federation from the union.

(f) General division of the territory of the R. S. F. S. R. for administrative purposes and the confirmation of provincial unions of Soviets, making up an "oblast."

(g) The establishment and change of the systems of weights, measures and currency within the territory of the R. S. F. S. R.

(h) Relations with foreign powers, the declaration of war and the conclusion of peace.

(i) The contracting of loans, customs and commercial treaties, as well as the conclusion of financial agreements.

(j) The establishment of a general plan of public economy and of its different departments within the territory of the R. S. F. S. R.

(k) The confirmation of the Budget of the Russian Federal Soviet Republic.

(l) The fixing of a general system of state taxation and of compulsory services.

(m) The establishment of a plan of organization for the armed forces of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic.

(n) General State-legislation, jurisprudence and judicial proceedings, civil and criminal legislation, etc.

(o) The appointment and dismissal of individual members of the Council of People's Commissaries, as well as of the entire Council of People's Commissaries as a whole and also the confirmation of its chairman.

(p) The publication of general decrees concerning acquisition and loss of rights, of Russian citizenship, and concerning the rights of foreigners on the territory of the Republic.

(q) The right of general or partial amnesty.

50. Besides the matters above indicated the All-Russian Executive Committee have the right to deal with all questions which they recognize as pertaining to their jurisdiction.

51. The following matters come within the sole jurisdiction of the All-Russian Convention of Soviets:

(a) The establishment and alteration of and the addition to the fundamental principles of the Soviet Constitution.

(b) The ratification of peace treaties.

52. The settlement of question set forth in statute c and h of article 49 may be made by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee only when the All-Russian Convention of Soviets cannot be called.

B. ORGANIZATION OF LOCAL SOVIET GOVERNMENT.

CHAPTER TEN.—CONCERNING THE SOVIET CONVENTIONS.

53. Conventions of Soviets are made up as follows:

(a) The conventions of the *Olkasts*¹ (territories); these may be composed of either 10 representatives chosen by soviets of cities and conventions of *Uyezds*² upon the basis of one deputy for every 25,000 inhabitants in the "Uyezds" and of one deputy for every 500 electors in the cities, but the total number of deputies got an entire "Oblast" not to exceed 500; or (2) representatives elected at soviet conventions of separate "gubernias" immediately precedes that of the "oblast."

(b) The conventions of gubernias (provinces or "Okrugs"; these are made up of representatives from Soviets of cities and conventions of *volosts*³) upon the basis of 1 deputy for every 10,000 inhabitants in a "volost" and 1 deputy for 2,000 electors in a city, but the total number of deputies for an entire "gubernia" (or "Okrug") not to exceed 300. In case a convention of Soviets for an "uyezd" is called immediately preceding that of a "gubernia" the deputies are elected upon the same basis by the convention of the "uyezd" and not by those of "volosts."

(c) The convention of "uyezds" ("rayons" or districts), these are composed of representatives of village Soviets on the basis of 1 deputy for 1,000 inhabitants, but not more than 300 deputies for the whole "uyezd" (ryon).

(d) The conventions of "volosts"; these are composed of representatives of all the village of the "volost," on the basis of 1 deputy for every 10 members of the Soviet.

NOTE 1.—At the "nyezd" conventions representatives of town Soviets, the population of which does not exceed 10,000 inhabitants, participate; village Soviets of districts numbering less than 1,000 inhabitants unite for the purpose of electing joint deputies for the "uyezd" convention.

NOTE 2.—Village Soviets, numbering less than 10 members, send to the "volost" convention one representative each.

54. The conventions of Soviets are summoned by the respective executive organs (Executive Committees) of the Soviet authority in the territory at the discretion of the latter or on the demand of Soviets of localities, the inhabitants of which represent not less than one-third of the population of the district under consideration. In any case the conventions must be held not less than twice a year in the "oblast," once in three months in the "gubernia" and "Uyezds" and once a month in the "volost."

55. The Convention of Soviets (for the "oblast," "gubernia," "uyezd" or "volost") elects its executive members of Executive Committee—the number of members of which should not exceed: (a) for the oblast and "gubernia," 25 members; (b) for the uyezd, 20; (c) for the "volost," 10. The Executive Committee is wholly responsible to the convention of Soviets, by which it is elected.

56. Within the limits of its jurisdiction the Soviet convention (of an oblast, gubernia, uyezd or volost) is the highest authority within the bounds of the given territory; during the intervals between the conventions this authority is transferred to the Executive Committee.

¹An oblast is an area uniting more than one "gubernia" province in one local administration.

²Uyezd is the administrative unit into which a gubernia is divided, similar to American counties.

³A volost is made up of a number of villages united for administrative purposes; it is a subdivision of an uyezd.

CHAPTER ELEVEN.—CONCERNING SOVIETS OF DEPUTIES.

57. Soviets of Deputies are formed:

(a) In towns or cities—on the basis of one deputy for each thousand inhabitants, but the total number of such deputies to be not less than 50 and not more than 1,000.

(b) In rural centers (in villages, church-villages, cossack-stanitzas, boroughs, towns numbering less than 10,000 inhabitants, Caucasian and Tartar auls, farming settlements, etc.)—on the basis of one deputy for every 100 inhabitants, the total number of deputies to be not less than 3 nor more than 50 for each rural center.

The powers possessed by the deputies to extend over a period of 3 months.

NOTE.—In those rural districts, where it is recognized as feasible, questions of administration are decided directly by a general assembly of electors of the given district.

58. For current transactions the Soviet of deputies elects from its midst an executive organ (Executive Committee) consisting of not more than 5 members in rural centers and in cities or towns on the basis of one for each 50 members, but not less than 3 nor more than 15 (for Petrograd and Moscow not more than 40). The Executive Committee is wholly responsible to the Soviet, by which it is elected.

59. The Soviets of Deputies are convened by the Executive Committee at the discretion of the latter or on the demand of not less than one half of the members of the Soviet, but not less than once a week in cities and towns and twice a week in rural centers.

60. Within the limits of its jurisdiction the Soviet, and in cases provided for by paragraph 57 (note), the general assembly of electors, is the highest authority in the given territory.

CHAPTER TWELVE.—CONCERNING THE SUBJECTS WHICH THE LOCAL ORGANS OF THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT HAVE AUTHORITY TO DEAL WITH.

61. The organs of Soviet government of an oblast (gubernia) (uyezd) and (volost) and also Soviets of Deputies, have the following subjects to deal with:

(a) The carrying out of all decisions of the higher organs of the Soviet government.

(b) The adoption of all measures aiming at the cultural and economic improvement of the given territory;

(c) All questions having a purely local character in the given district;

(d) The co-ordination of all Soviet activities within the given territory.

62. The Conventions of Soviets and their Executive Committees have the right of control over the activities of the local Soviets (i. e. the oblast conventions and Executive Committees have the power of control over all the Soviets of the given oblast; those of a gubernia over all the Soviets of the given gubernia except over Soviets of towns and cities not included in the convention of an uyezd, etc.). In addition to this the conventions and Executive Committees of an oblast and gubernia have the right to annul the decisions of the Soviets acting within their territory. Of all such actions they must, in the most important cases, inform the Central Soviet Authority.

63. For the fulfillment of the tasks imposed on the organs of Soviet government there are formed, in connection with Soviets (in cities and towns), and with their Executive Committees (in an oblast, gubernia, uyezd and volost, special administrative departments, headed by directors of such departments.

DIVISION FOUR.—ACTIVE AND PASSIVE FRANCHISE.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN.

64. The right to elect and be elected to membership in the Soviets is enjoyed, independent of religion, nationality, right of domicile, etc., by the following citizens of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic, of either sex, who up to date of the elections have reached the age of eighteen years:

(a) All persons obtaining their means of livelihood by productive and socially useful labour, as well as persons engaged in domestic service, who thereby enable the former to carry on their productive labours, such as workmen and servants of all kinds and categories engaged in industry, trade, agriculture, etc., peasants and cossack cultivators, not using hired labour for the purpose of securing profit.

(b) Soldiers and sailors of the Soviet army and navy.

(c) Citizens who belong to the categories enumerated in paragraphs (a) and (b) of this article, but who have lost in some degree their working capacity.

NOTE 1.—Local Soviets may with the consent of the Central authority lower the age limit for the franchise established by the present article.

NOTE 2.—Among the persons who are not naturalized citizens of Russia those, indicated in article 20 (division 2, chapter 5), enjoy also active and passive franchise rights.

65. The following persons, even if they should belong to any of the above mentioned categories, may neither elect nor be elected:

(a) Persons using hired labour for the sake of profit;

(b) Persons living on unearned increment such as interest on capital, income from industrial enterprises and property, etc.;

(c) Private traders, trading and commercial agents;

(d) Monks and ecclesiastical servants of churches and religious cults;

(e) Employees and agents of the former police, of the special corps of gendarmes and of branches of secret police department and also members of the former reigning house of Russia;

(f) Persons, duly recognized as mentally afflicted or insane, as well as persons placed in charge of guardians;

(g) Persons sentenced for crimes of speculation and bribery to a term fixed by law or by a judicial sentence.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN.—CONCERNING THE CONDUCT OF ELECTIONS.

66. Elections take place in accordance with established customs on days fixed by local Soviets.

67. Elections are conducted in the presence of the election commission and the representative of the local Soviet.

68. In cases where the presence of the representative of the Soviet government is for technical reasons impossible, his place is taken by the chairman of the election committee, and, in the absence of the latter, by the chairman of the election assembly.

69. An official record is made on the progress and result of elections and the same is signed by members of the election committee and the representative of the Soviet.

70. The precise order of election procedure and also the question of participation in the elections of the labour unions and other workers' organizations is determined by the local Soviets, in accordance with the instructions of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN.—CONCERNING THE CONTROL AND CANCELLATION OF ELECTIONS AND THE RECALL OF DEPUTIES.

71. All records in connection with elections are filed with the respective Soviets.

72. For examining the elections the Soviet appoints a commission on credentials.

73. The credentials commission reports the results of its examination to the Soviet.

74. The Soviet decides the question of confirming disputed candidates.

75. In the event of rejection of any candidate the Soviet orders new elections.

76. In the event of irregularity in the election as a whole, the question of annulling the election is decided by the Soviet organ next highest in authority.

77. The highest body for cancellation of Soviet elections is the All-Russian Central Executive Committee.

78. The electors, who have sent a deputy to the Soviet have the right to recall him at any time and order new elections in accordance with the general

DIVISION FIVE.—THE BUDGET RIGHT.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN.

79. The financial policy of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic during the present transition period of the dictatorship of the toilers is framed with a view to reaching the goal, namely that of expropriation of the capitalist class and of preparing the conditions for general social equality of the citizens of the republic in the domain of production and distribution of wealth. For this purpose it aims at placing at the disposal of the organs of Soviet government all means necessary for the satisfaction of local and general state needs of the Soviet Republic, not even hesitating at the violation of the rights of private property to attain this end.

80. The state revenues and expenditures of the Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic are combined in the general state budget.

81. The All-Russian Convention of Soviets or the All-Russian Central Executive Committee determines, which of the revenues and incomes are to be entered in the general state budget and which are to be placed at the disposal of the local Soviets; they also define the limits of taxation.

82. The Soviets establish the rate of taxation and revenues exclusively for needs of a local character. The general state needs are satisfied out of the funds of the state treasury.

83. No item of expenditure can be paid out of the state treasury without an entry for such payment being made in the account of state receipts and expenditures or unless the Central government issues a special decree for the payment of such an item.

84. For the satisfaction of the needs of a general state character the respective People's Commissariats¹ place at the disposal of local Soviets the necessary credits out of the general state treasury.

85. All credits granted to the Soviets out of the funds of the general state treasury, as well as the credits approved according to estimates for local needs, must be expended by them within the limits provided for in the subdivisions of the estimates, as directly indicated in their paragraphs and articles and may not be used for the satisfaction of any other needs without a special decree of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee and the Council of People's Commissaries.

86. The local Soviets draw up half-yearly and yearly estimates of receipts and expenditures for local needs. The estimates of the Soviets of villages and volosts and those of the Soviets of towns, which participate in conventions of uyezds, and likewise the estimates of uyezd organs of the Soviet government are subject to approval by the corresponding conventions of gubernias and oblasts or by their Executive Committees; the estimates of the organs of Soviet government of cities, gubernias and oblasts are approved by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee and by the Council of the People's Commissaries.

87. For expenditures, not foreseen by the estimates and likewise in case of deficits in the estimates, supplementary credits may be obtained by the Soviets from the corresponding People's Commissariats.

88. In the event of an insufficiency of local resources for the satisfaction of local needs subsidies or loans to meet pressing expenditures and granted from the funds of the general state treasury to the local Soviets by the All-Russian Central Executive Committee and by the Council of the People's Commissaries.

DIVISION SIX.—CONCERNING THE COAT OF ARMS AND FLAG OF THE RUSSIAN SOCIALIST FEDERAL SOVIET REPUBLIC.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN.

89. The Coat of Arms of the R. S. F. S. R. consists of the representation of a red background in rays of the sun of a gold sickle and hammer placed cross-wise, the handles pointing downward; the whole surrounded by a wreath of wheat ears and having the inscription:

(a) Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic and

(b) Proletarians of all countries, unite!

90. The commercial, naval, and military standard of the R. S. F. S. R. consists of a scarlet flag in the upper left corner of which, near the flag-staff, are placed the letters R. S. F. S. R. in gold, or the words Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic.

Signed: Chairman of the 5th All-Russian Convention of Soviets and of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee, J. Sverdlov.

Members of the Presidium of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee. G. L. Teodorovich, F. A. Rosenholz, A. C. Mitrofanor, K. G. Rosin, A. P. Maximov.

Secretary of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee, V. A. Avanessov.

¹ Executive departments of the State, which were formerly known as ministries.

(Mr. Humes submitted the following translation of various decrees of the Bolshevik government of Russia, preceded by table of contents, which was ordered inserted in the record as an appendix:)

CONTENTS OF APPENDIX.

ORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENT.

- Exhibit 1. Decree of Bolshevik Government Reiterating the Call for a Constituent Assembly Originally Called by the Provisional Government.
- Exhibit 2. Decree Organizing Council of People's Commissaries.
- Exhibit 3. Regulations of the Government on the Order in which the Laws are to be Confirmed and Published.
- Exhibit 4. Decree on the dissolution of the Central Duma of Petrograd. November 16, 1917.
- Exhibit 5. Decree on the annulation of Class of Society and Civil Grades. November 10, 1917.
- Exhibit 6. Declaration of rights of the peoples of Russia. November 2, 1917.
- Exhibit 7. Instructions on the rights and duties of Soviets.
- Exhibit 8. Decree on the Provincial Soviet Organization.
- Exhibit 9. Decree on the Organization of Local Self-government. December 24, 1917.
- Exhibit 10. Decree on the Administration of National Undertakings. March 7, 1918.
- Exhibit 11. Decree on the Supreme Board of National Economy.
- Exhibit 12. Decree on the Regional and Local Boards of National Economy.
- Exhibit 13. Decree appropriating Two Million Roubles for International Revolutionary Propaganda purposes. December 13, 1917.
- Exhibit 14. Decree on Peace. October 26th, 1917.
- Exhibit 15. Appeal to Laboring Mohammedans of Russia and the East. November 24, 1917.
- Exhibit 16. Declaration of the Rights of the Laboring and Exploited People. The form of this Declaration was prepared for submission to the Constituent Assembly by the Bolshevik Government and the refusal of the Constituent Assembly to adopt it was one reason for its forcible dissolution by the Red Guard.

THE ARMY.

- Exhibit 17. Decree on the Equalization of Rights of all Serving in the Army. December 17, 1917.
- Exhibit 18. Order of the High Commander in Chief Krylenko to the Army. November 21, 1917.
- Exhibit 19. Decree on the Appropriation of Twenty Million Roubles for the Workmen's and Peasant's Red Army. January 16, 1918.

THE NAVY.

- Exhibit 20. Decree on the Democratization of the Navy of the Russian Republic. January 12, 1918.
- Exhibit 21. Decree on the Democratization of the Fleet of the Russian Republic.
- Exhibit 22. Decree on Assessment of Salaries for the Seamen of the Navy Recruited on Voluntary System. February 14, 1918.
- Exhibit 23. Decree Suppressing the Admiralty Council.
- Exhibit 24. Decree of the People's Commissaries Organizing a Red Fleet.
- Exhibit 25. Decree of the Soviet of People's Commissaries on the Assessment of salaries of the Government Employes and Persons Standing in the Government Service of the Ports and Institutions of the Admiralty. February 15, 1918.
- Exhibit 26. Decree of the Soviet of the People's Commissars on the Assessment of Salaries of Commanders and Others of the Navy Recruited on Principles of Voluntary Service.

THE LAND.

- Exhibit 27. Decree Abolishing Private Ownership of Land, Farming Implements, Live Stock, and Farm Products. Passed by the Congress of Soviets of Workmen and Soldiers Delegates at the Meeting of October 25, 1917.

Exhibit 28. Decree Abolishing Private Ownership of Land, Farming Implements, Live Stock, Farm Products, and for Other Purposes. October 26, 1917.

Exhibit 29. Decree Abolishing Private Ownership in Cities.

Exhibit 30. Land laws of the Russian Federated Soviet Republic. September, 1918.

Exhibit 31. Decree on Harvesting and Requisitioning Detachments.

Exhibit 32. Decree on Sequestration of all Vacant Premises Suitable for Dwelling Purposes. October 28, 1917.

AGRICULTURE.

Exhibit 33. Ordinance of the Commissariat of Agriculture Regarding the Organization of the Central Geodetical Technical Department. January 1, 1918.

Exhibit 34. Ordinance on the Supply of Agricultural Implements.

Exhibit 35. Decree on Grain Control. May 14, 1918.

TRADE, COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY.

Exhibit 36. Ordinance of the Commissariat of Commerce and Industry Regarding the Measures of the Import and Export of Goods. December 29, 1917.

Exhibit 37. Decree on the Nationalization of Foreign Trade. April 22, 1918.

Exhibit 38. Decree on Local Sections of People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry. Council of People's Commissaries July 27, 1918.

Exhibit 39. Regulations Adopted at the First All-Russian Congress of the Councils of National Economy on the 26th of May, 1918.

Exhibit 40. Translation of Article in the "Courier of the Peoples Commissariat of Trade and Industry" as to Concessions. June 20, 1918.

Exhibit 41. Decree on the Regulation of Prices. January 30, 1918.

Exhibit 42. Decree Nationalizing Soap Factories and Monopolizing the Sale of Fats and Soap.

Exhibit 43. Decree on the Nationalization of the Textile Industry. January 19, 1918.

WORKMEN'S CONTROL OF INDUSTRY.

Exhibit 44. Decree on the Workmen's Control of Industries. November 14, 1917.

LABOR.

Exhibit 45. Decree of the Workmen's and Peasants' Government on the Eight Hour Working Day. October 29, 1917.

Exhibit 46. Decree on Suspension of Work and Terms of Hiring and Discharging Workmen. December 20, 1917.

INSURANCE.

Exhibit 47. Decree on Nationalization of the Insurance Business.

Exhibit 48. Decree Organizing the Insurance Council.

Exhibit 49. Regulations on the Insurance Boards.

Exhibit 50. Regulations on the Insurance Against Unemployment.

Exhibit 51. Memorandum on the Insurance against Unemployment.

Exhibit 52. Decree on Workmen's Insurance against Accidents. November 8, 1917.

Exhibit 53. Decree on the Indemnification of Soldiers who were Detailed to Work in Industrial Enterprises and who Have Suffered from Accidents.

BANK CONTROL AND NATIONALIZATION.

Exhibit 54. Decree on the State Bank. November 17, 1917.

Exhibit 55. Decree on Suppression of the Land Bank of the Nobility and the Peasant Land Bank of the old Ministry of Finance. November 25, 1917.

Exhibit 56. Decree on the Nationalization of Banks. December 14, 1917.

Exhibit 57. Decree on Steel Boxes in Banks. December 14, 1917.

Exhibit 58. Decree on the Confiscation of Shares of Former Private Banks. January 27, 1918.

REPUDIATION OF LOANS.

Exhibit 59. Decree on the Annulment of National Loans Agreed on at the Session of the Central Executive Committee, January 21, 1918.

Exhibit 60. Decree on Annulment of State Loans Passed at the Meeting of the Central Executive Committee January 21, 1918.

Exhibit 61. Order Concerning the Execution of Decrees for the Annulment of the State Loans. March 7, 1918.

FINANCIAL.

Exhibit 62. Decree on the Circulation of Certificates of the Liberty Loan as Currency Notes. February 16, 1918.

Exhibit 63. Order Concerning the Circulation as Specie of Obligations of the "Liberty Loan" and of Coupons of the Repudiated State Loans. Moscow District Executive Committee of the Councils of Workmen's, Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies. May 30, 1918.

COURTS.

Exhibit 64. Decree Abolishing Courts of the Old Regime and Instituting Others. November 24, 1917.

Exhibit 65. Instructions to the Revolutionary Tribunal. December 19, 1917.

THE PRESS.

Exhibit 66. Decree on the Nationalization of the Press. October 28, 1917.

Exhibit 67. Decree on the Revolutionary Tribunal of the Press. December 18, 1917.

Exhibit 68. Decree on Government Publications.

Exhibit 69. Decree on the Introduction of a State Monopoly on Advertisements. November 12, 1917.

Exhibit 70. Statement on the Activity of the Literary Publications Board Attached to the People's Commissariat on Education.

POSTS AND TELEGRAPHS.

Exhibit 71. Decree of the People's Commissar of the Post and Telegraph. November 3, 1917.

Exhibit 72. Regulations of the Commissariat of Post and Telegraphs for a New Schedule of Salaries of the Postal and Telegraph Officials. January 13, 1918.

EDUCATION.

Exhibit 73. Decree on the Dissolution of the State Committee on Public Instruction. November 23, 1917.

Exhibit 74. Decree on the Creation of a State Commission of Education.

Exhibit 75. Regulation Concerning the Admission to a Higher School Institution of the Russian Socialist Federative Soviet Republic.

Exhibit 76. Regulation of the Soviet of People's Commissaries Concerning Standard Remuneration for Teachers.

Exhibit 77. Decree on the Appropriation of 12,520,000 Roubles for Subsidies to Teachers. January 3, 1918.

Exhibit 78. Resolution of the School Sanitation Board.

Exhibit 79. Orders of the People's Commissioner of Education of the Western Provinces and Front.

Exhibit 80. Commissary Lepeshinsky's Paper on School Reform Read at the First All-Russian Congress of Teachers—Internationalists. June 2, 1918.

Exhibit 81. Statement of the Repertoire Committee of the Art-Educational Section.

SOCIAL WELFARE.

Exhibit 82. Decree of the Commissariat of Social Welfare Creating a "Palace of Motherhood." December 31, 1917.

INHERITANCE.

Exhibit 83. Decree Abolishing Inheritance. April 27, 1918.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

Exhibit 84. Decree on Marriage, Children, and Registration of Civil Status. December 18, 1917.

Exhibit 85. Decree on Divorce. December 18, 1917.

CHURCH AND STATE.

Exhibit 86. Decree on Separation of Church from the State.

Exhibit 87. Decree on the Nationalization of Church Property. January 16, 1918.

TAXES.

Exhibit 88. Decree on the Levying of Direct Taxes. November 24, 1917.

ARREST OF REVOLUTIONISTS.

Exhibit 89. Decree on the Arrest of the Leaders of the Civil War against the Revolution. November 28, 1917.

WORKERS MILITIA.

Exhibit 90. Decree on the Organization of a Workers Militia. October 28, 1917.

THE RED CROSS.

Exhibit 91. Decree on the Nationalization of the Property and Capital of the Red Cross.

HOSPITALS.

Exhibit 92. Decree on the Transfer of Hospitals.

MONUMENT TO KARL MARX.

Exhibit 93. Instructions Concerning the Erection of a Monument in Honour of Karl Marx. June 1, 1918.

 APPENDIX.

EXHIBIT No. 1.

DECREE OF BOLSHEVIK GOVERNMENT REITERATING THE CALL FOR A CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY ORIGINALLY CALLED BY PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT.

In the name of the Government of the Republic, elected by the All-Russian Congress of Councils of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, with the participation of the Peasants' Delegates, the Council of the People's Commissaries decree:

1. That the elections to the Constituent Assembly shall be held on November 25th, the day set aside for this purpose.

2. All electoral committees, all local organizations, the Councils of Workmen's, Soldiers' and Peasants' Delegates and the soldiers' organizations at the front are to bend every effort toward safeguarding the freedom of the voters and fair play at the elections to the Constituent Assembly, which will be held on the appointed date.

 EXHIBIT 2.

DECREE ORGANIZING COUNCIL OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARIES.

The all-Russian congress of soviets of workmen, soldiers and peasant delegates decrees.

A temporary workmen and peasant government, which will bear the name of council of people's commissaries is to be formed until the convocation of the Constituent Assembly. The management of separate branches of the life of the State is entrusted to commissions, the contingent of which must guarantee the realisation of the programme announced by the Congress, in close union with the working organisations of workmen, workwomen, sailors, soldiers, peasants and employees. The Governing Power belongs to a Collegium of Chairmen of such commissions, i. e. to the Council of People's Commissaries. The Control over the activity of the people's commissaries and the right to dismiss them belongs to the All-Russian Congress of soviets of Workmen, Peasant and Soldiers Delegates and its Central, Exec. Com. At the present moment the Council of People's Commissaries is composed of the following persons:

The Chairman of the Council—Vladimir Oulianoff (Lenin); Commissary for the Interior—A. I. Rykoff; Agriculture—V. P. Mulitin; Labour—A. G. Shliapnikoff; For Military and Naval Affairs—a Committee composed of: V. A. Ovsienko (Antonoff) N. V. Krylenko and F. N. Dybenko; Trade and Industry—V. P. Nogin; Public Instruction—A. V. Lunacharsky; Finance—I. I. Skvortzoff (Stepanoff); Foreign Affairs—L. D. Bronstein (Trotzky); Justice—G. I. Oppokoff (Lomoff); Food Supply—I. A. Teodorovitch; Post and Telegraph—N. P. Aviloff (Gleboff); Chairman of affairs of nationalities—I. V. Djugasvili (Stalin).

The post of Commissary for railway affairs is temporarily vacant.

EXHIBIT 3.

REGULATIONS OF THE GOVERNMENT ON THE ORDER IN WHICH THE LAWS ARE TO BE (CONFIRMED AND PUBLISHED.

1. From now on until the convocation of the Constituent Assembly the elaboration and publication of laws shall be carried out in the order established in these Regulations by the Provisional Workmen and Peasants Government elected by the All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workmen Soldiers and Peasants Delegates.

2. Each law project is submitted to the examination of the Gov't by the respective ministry signed by the corresponding People's Comm. or it may be submitted by the Chancery of legislative propositions attached to the Gov't under the signature of the manager of the Department.

3. After confirmation by the Government the Regulation in its final wording is signed in the name of the Russian Republic by the Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaries or by the People's Commissary who acting in his stead submitted said Regulation to the examination of the Government and it is then published for general information.

4. The day of its publication in the official "Gazeta of the W. & P. Gov't" is the day on which a law or regulation is recognized as having entered into force of law.

5. Any other term for its entering in force may be specially mentioned, in which case it is considered to have entered in force of law in each place when the respective telegrams was published there.

6. The publishing of the legislative dispositions of the Government through the Governing Senate is suspended. The department of Legislative propositions attached to the Council of P. C. shall publish periodically Digests of the Reg. and Disp. of the Govt. which have entered into force of law.

7. The Central Executive Committee of the Soviets of W. S. & P. Del. is entitled at any time to stop or modify or revoke any regulations of the Government.

(Signed) VI. Oulianoff—Lenin.

October 31st, 1917. No. 212.

EXHIBIT 4.

DECREE ON THE DISSOLUTION OF THE CENTRAL DUMA OF PETROGRAD.

Whereas the Central Municipal Duma elected August 20th before the days of Korniloff's attempt has obviously and finally lost all right to be the representative of the population of Petrograd, as being quite contrary to its desires and hopes, as was proved by the revolution of October 25th and at the elections to the Constituent Assembly. And whereas the present contingent of the Duma majority having lost all the political confidence of the population is still continuing to make use of its formal rights for counter revolutionary resistance against the will of the workman, soldiers and peasants, for sabotage and impeding all well-planned public work, the Council of People's Commissaries considers necessary to appeal to the inhabitants of the capital to pass a resolution regarding the policy of the self-government of the town.

For this purpose the Council of People's Commissaries decrees:

1. To dissolve the Municipal Duma of Petrograd; the day of its dissolution to be November 17th, 1917.

2. All the functionaries elected by the Duma of the present contingent are to remain at their posts and fulfill all their duties until the functionaries elected by the new Duma will be ready to take up said duties.

3. All the employees of the Municipal Self-Government of Petrograd are to continue to fulfill their direct duties; those who will leave the service of their own will shall be recognised as dismissed forthwith.

4. New elections to the Duma of Petrograd are to be held November 26th, 1917, in conformity to the Regulations for the election of members to the municipal Duma of Petrograd of November 26th 1917, which are being published together with this decree.

5. The new Municipal Duma of Petrograd is to meet on November 28th 1917 at 2 p. m.

6. Persons guilty of not submitting to the present decree and also of intentionally damaging or destroying any property belonging to the Town shall be immediately arrested and brought before the Military Revolutionary Tribunal.

In the name of the Russian Republic:

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaries VI: Oulilanoff (Lenin).

People's Commissary of Justice P. Stouchka.

Manager of the Affairs of the Council VI: Bonch-Bruevitch.

Secretary of the Council N. Gorbounoff.

Petrograd November 16th, 1917.

EXHIBIT 5.

DECREE ON THE ANNULLATION OF CLASSES OF SOCIETY AND CIVIL GRADES.

ART. 1. All the classes of society existing up to now in Russia, and all divisions of citizens into classes, all class distinctions and privileges, class organizations and institutions and also all civil grades are abolished.

ART. 2. All ranks (nobleman, merchant, peasant etc., titles prince, count etc.) and denominations of civil grades (private, state, and other councillors) are abolished and only one denomination is established for all the population of Russia, that of citizens of the Russian Republic.

ART. 3. The property of the class institutions of the nobility are to be immediately handed over to the zemstvo (county Council) self-governing organizations.

ART. 4. All property of the merchants and burgess corporations is to be immediately transferred to the corresponding municipal self-governing organizations.

ART. 5. All the institutions of corporations, affairs, proceedings and archives are to be handed over immediately to the corresponding town and zemstvo organizations.

ART. 6. All the corresponding articles of the laws in force up to now are revoked.

ART. 7. The present decree shall enter in force on the day of its publication and it shall be immediately put into execution by the local soviets of workmen soldiers and peasant Delegates.

The present decree is confirmed by the Central Executive Committee of the Soviets of workmen and soldiers Delegates at the meeting of November 10th, 1917.

Signed:

Chairman of the Central Executive Committee J. Sverdloff.

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaries VI. Oulianoff (Lenin).

Manager of the affairs of the Council of People's Commissaries V. Bonch-Bruevitch.

Secretary of the Council: N. Gorbounoff.

EXHIBIT 6.

DECLARATION OF RIGHTS OF THE PEOPLES OF RUSSIA.

The October Revolution of the workmen and peasants began under the sign of a general liberation.

The peasants are being liberated from the power of the landed proprietors, because there will be no more landed property—it is abolished. The soldiers and sailors are liberated from the power of autocratic generals, because the generals will now be elected and they may be removed. The workmen are liberated from the caprices and oppression of the capitalists because from now on a workmen's control will be established over the factories and works. Everything that is alive and that is capable of living is becoming liberated from hateful bondage.

Only the peoples of Russia remain yet, who have suffered and are still suffering from oppression and arbitrary administration and it must be proceeded immediately to their liberation, which must be brought about decisively and irrevocably.

During the epoch of tsarism the peoples of Russia were systematically baited against one another. The results of such policy were—slaughter and pogroms on one side, the enslavement of the people on the other.

There can not and shall not be any return to this shameful policy of baiting. From now on it must be replaced by the policy of a voluntary and honourable union of all the peoples of Russia.

In the period of imperialism after the revolution of February when the power passed into the hands of the Kadet bourgeoisie, the undisguised policy of baiting ceded the place to a policy of a cowardly mistrust of all the peoples of Russia, a policy of cavilling and provocation, hiding itself behind the words: "liberty" and equality of the peoples. The results of this policy are well known: increase of national ill-will, destruction of mutual confidence.

An end must be put to this unworthy policy of falsehood and mistrust, cavil and provocation. From now on it must be replaced by a frank and honest policy leading to a complete mutual understanding among the peoples of Russia.

Only as a result of such policy will there be formed an honourable and solid union of the peoples of Russia.

Only as a result of such a union will it be possible to weld the workmen and peasants of all the peoples of Russia into a single revolutionary force, capable of withstanding all attempts on the part of the imperialist-annexionist bourgeoisie.

The Congress of the Soviets in June c. y. proclaimed the right of the peoples of Russia to a free self-determination.

The second Congress of Soviets in October c. y. confirmed this inalienable right of the peoples of Russia still more decisively and definitely.

In execution of the desire of these Congresses the Council of People's Commissaries has decided to lay the following principles as the basis of its activity in regard to the question of nationalities in Russia.

1. The equality and sovereign rights of the peoples of Russia.
2. The right of the peoples of Russia to determine freely how they are to be governed even up to their separation and formation of an independent state.
3. The revocation of all national, and national-religious privileges and limitations.
4. The free development of the national minorities and ethnographic groups inhabiting the Russian territory.

The concrete decrees resulting from the above shall be elaborated immediately after the formation of a Commission for the Affairs of Nationalities.

In the name of the Russian Republic the People's Commissary on Affairs of Nationalities—Joseph Diugashvili—Stalin.

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaries V. Oulianoff (Lenin)
November 2nd 1917.

EXHIBIT 7.

INSTRUCTIONS ON THE RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF SOVIETS.

1. Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies, being local organs, are quite independent in regard to questions of a local character, but always act in accord with the decrees of the central Soviet Government as well as of the larger bodies (district, provincial and regional Soviets) of which they form a part.

2. Upon the Soviets, as organs of government, devolve the tasks of administration and service in all departments of local life—administrative, economic, financial and educational.

3. Under administration, the Soviets carry out all decrees and decisions of the central Government, take measures for giving the people the widest information about those decisions, issue obligatory ordinances, make requisitions and confiscation, impose fines, suppress counter-revolutionary organs of the press, make arrests, and dissolve public organizations which incite active opposition or the overthrow of the Soviet Government.

NOTE.—The Soviets render a report to the central Soviet Government regarding all measures undertaken by them and important local events.

4. The Soviets elect from their number an executive organ which is charged with the duty of carrying out their decisions and the performance of the current work of administration.

NOTE 1.—The Military-Revolutionary Committees, as fighting organs which came into existence during the revolution, are abolished.

NOTE 2.—As a temporary measure, it is permitted to appoint Commissaries in those provinces and districts where the power of the Soviet is not sufficiently well-established or where the Soviet Government is not exclusively recognized.

5. The Soviets, being organs of government, are allowed credits from state funds for three months upon the presentation of detailed budgets.

Instructions regarding the Organizations of Soviets.—At the session of the collegium under the People's Commissary for Internal Affairs, on January 9, 1918, instructions as to the organization of Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies were voted as follows:

In all Soviets, in place of the old, antiquated government institutions, the following departments or commissariats must first be organized:

1. Administration, in charge of the domestic and foreign relations of the Republic and technically unifying all the other departments.

2. Finances, whose duty is the compilation of the local budget, the collection of local and state taxes, the carrying out of measures for the nationalization of the banks, the administration of the People's Bank, control over the disbursement of national funds, etc.

3. Board of National Economy, which organizes the manufacture of most necessary products of factory, mill, and home industries, determines the amount of raw materials and fuel, obtains and distributes them, organizes and supplies the rural economy, etc.

4. Land, whose duty is to make an exact survey of the land, forests, waters, and other resources, and their distribution for purposes of utilization.

5. Labor, which must organize and unite trade unions, factory and mill committees, peasant associations, etc., and also create insurance organizations of all kinds.

6. Ways of Communication, whose duty is the taking of measures for the nationalization of the railways and steamship enterprises, the direction of this most important branch of the national economy, the building of new roads of local importance, etc.

7. Post, Telegraph and Telephone, which must aid and develop these state enterprises.

8. Public Education, which looks after the education and instruction of the population in the school and out of school, establishes new schools, kindergartens, universities, libraries, clubs, etc., carries out measures for the nationalization of printing-shops, the publication of necessary periodicals and books and their circulation among the population, etc.

9. Legal, which must liquidate the old courts, organize people's and arbitration courts, take charge of places of detention, reform them, etc.

10. Medical-Sanitary, whose duty is sanitary-hygienic supervision, the organization of medical aid accessible to all, sanitary equipment of urban and rural settlements, etc.

11. Public Realty, whose duty is the regulation of the housing problem, supervision over confiscated and public buildings, the construction of new ones, etc.

NOTE.—Soviets are advised to utilize the organizational apparatus of Zemstvo and municipal institutions, with appropriate changes, when forming the departments.

At the same session was passed the draft of the decree fixing the boundaries of provinces, districts, etc., as follows:

1. Questions of changes of boundaries of provinces, districts, or townships are to be settled entirely by the local Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', Peasants', and Laborers' Deputies.

2. When parts of one province or territory are included in another, the technical questions and misunderstandings which arise are dealt with by mixed commissions of the interested Provincial Soviets or their congress.

3. A similar procedure is followed when the boundaries of a district or township are rectified at the expense of another.

4. Territories, provinces, districts and townships may also be divided into parts, forming new administrative economic units.

5. Detailed data regarding all such changes are reported to the Commissary for Internal Affairs.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 8.

THE PROVINCIAL SOVIET ORGANIZATION.

The scheme of the general statutes of Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', Peasant, and Cossack Deputies, as a representative organ, is no less necessary for the obscure places in our provinces than is the scheme of the departments and sub-departments of the Soviets. . . .

The statutes of the Soviets may be divided into sections, as follows: (1) the purpose of the organization of Soviets; (2) the basis of representation; (3) sections of the Soviets; (4) elections of the presidium and executive committee of the Soviet; (5) the functions of the presidium; (6) the executive committee and its functions; (7) general sessions; (8) committees.

1. The purpose of the organization of the Soviet.

The Soviet of Workmen's, Soldiers', Peasant, and Cossack Deputies is the sovereign state organ of revolutionary democracy, in addition to the organization of governmental authority in the provinces. The Soviet pursues the following objects:

(a) The organization of the large laboring masses of workmen, peasants, soldiers, and Cossacks;

(b) The struggle against counter-revolutionary currents and the strengthening of the Soviet Republic and all liberties gained by the October revolution.

2. The basis and order of representation in the Soviets.

(a) A Soviet of Workmen's, Soldiers', Peasant, and Cossack Deputies is constituted of one or two representatives each of all workmen's, soldiers', peasant, and Cossack organizations (parties, trade unions, committees, etc.) in the cities, villages and settlements.

(b) The peasants elect two representatives from each township to the district Soviet (a township Soviet has one or two representatives from each small town, village or hamlet).

(c) The Cossacks elect two representatives (or three) from each village to the Regional Soviet of Workmen's, Soldiers', Peasant, and Cossack Deputies, and one representative each from a forepost [small settlement], hamlet or small town to the village Soviet. (In Cossack territories the peasant representation in the Regional Soviet is proportional, according to the villages.)

(d) The workmen and all proletarian laboring masses in cities where the urban proletariat does not exceed 5,000 or 6,000 persons have representation on the following basis:

(1) Every enterprise employing 100 persons sends one representative.

(2) Enterprises employing from 100 to 200 persons send two representatives; from 200 to 300 persons, three representatives, etc.

(3) Enterprises employing less than 50 persons, combine, if possible, with other small kindred enterprises and send a common representative to the Soviet. Those unable to combine may send their representative independently.

(e) The soldiers of a local garrison (Cossack, sailors) send to the Soviet their representatives on the following principle: each company, squadron, command, etc., elects two representatives to the Soviet; clerks, hospital attendants, horse reserves, and other small units, send one representative each.

Addenda to paragraph 2. (1) Every member newly elected to the Soviet must present a certificate from his constituents, which is examined by the credentials committee; (2) if a member of the Soviet deviates from the instructions of his constituents then the constituents have the right to recall him and elect another in his place; (3) each section (the workmen's, the soldiers', etc.) of the Soviet has the right to include in its membership experienced and necessary workers by coöptation up to one-fifth of its entire membership. Those added by coöptation have the right of a consulting vote at general sessions of the Soviet in the committees and sections.

3. Sections of the Soviet: (a) a Soviet has four sections: peasant, workmen's, soldiers', and Cossack; (b) each section elects from its membership a presidium consisting of a chairman, two vice-chairmen, and two secretaries, which directs all the business of the section; (c) the representation in the presidium is proportional to the membership of this or that party group.

4. Election of the Presidium and Executive Committee: (a) The members of the Soviet, in each section, elect a presidium, which is chosen at a general meeting by a universal, direct, equal and secret vote, in the proportion and number indicated in paragraph 3 (Sections of the Soviet); (b) the presidia of all sections of the Soviet constitute the general presidium of the Soviet, which elects from its membership a general chairman of all sections, two vice-chairmen, and two secretaries; (c) besides the presidium, the general assembly of the Soviet elects from its membership an executive committee, proportionate to the membership of each party group (not section), so arranged that the membership of the executive committee shall not exceed one-fourth of the entire membership of the Soviet, (d) the members of the presidium form a part of the membership of the Executive Committee on an equal basis with the other members.

5. The Functions of the Presidium: (a) The presidium is the directing organ of the entire Soviet and decides independently all matters which cannot suffer delay; (b) the presidium meets not less than four times a week; (c) the presidium renders an accounts of its activity to the executive committee and to the entire Soviet, who have the right to recall them and to replace them at any time and period; (d) the presidium must in its actively abide strictly by the instructions of the executive committee and the general assembly.

6. The Executive Committee and its Functions: (a) The executive committee of the Soviet is an organ formed out of the membership of the Soviet (paragraph 4). The president, or one of the vice-presidents of the Soviet is the chairman of the executive committee (paragraph 4); (b) all current business of the Soviet is decided and carried on by the executive committee, and only matters of particular importance are submitted to the decision of the general assembly of the Soviet; (c) questions considered by the executive committee are passed or rejected by a relative majority of votes. On questions of extraordinary importance a minority report is received, entered upon the records, and reported to the general assembly; (d) questions are decided by an open vote, and only in matters of extraordinary importance, at the request of members of the executive committee, by a secret ballot; (e) a session of the executive committee is considered legal when not less than one-half of its membership is present; (f) members of the executive committee who for one reason or another cannot attend a session of the executive committee must notify the member of the executive committee on duty to that effect not later than half an hour before the opening of the session; (g) members of the executive committee who have been absent from three sessions without sufficient reason are deprived of the right to vote at two sessions, and the presidium notifies their constituents regarding the case; (h) the executive committee meets once a week (irrespective of special sessions); (i) special sessions, to consider questions of extraordinary importance, are called by the chairman or the vice-chairman or by three members of the executive committee; (j) members of the executive committee must be notified of a special session by a summons not later than two hours before the opening of the session; (k) a special session is legal with any number of members present; (l) the sessions of the executive committee may be open or executive; (m) members of the executive committee are on duty in the reception rooms of the Soviet, one from each section, by turns.

7. General sessions: (a) general sessions of the Soviets are called by the presidium whenever necessity arises, but not less than twice a month; (b) general sessions may be regarded as legal when half of the entire membership of the Soviet is present; special sessions, when any number are present; (c) all questions submitted for the consideration of the general assembly must first be passed upon either by the executive committee or by the presidium; (d) a general session may be called also at the request of one-fifth of the membership of the Soviet; (e) admission to the sessions of the Soviet is by ticket only; (f) the sessions may be open or executive by decision of the presidium or of the assembly itself.

8. Committees: (a) committees are elected in each case by the general assembly, by the executive committee, or by the presidium; (b) the membership of a committee is determined by the assembly; (c) the chairman of each committee makes a report about the work of the committee to the general assembly of the Soviet, the executive committee, and the presidium; (d) auditing committees, control committees, etc., for the examination of the Soviet affairs, are selected only by the general assembly of the Soviet; (e) each committee has the right of independent coöptation of learned persons with the privilege of a consulting vote.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 9.

DECREE ON THE ORGANIZATION OF LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

The Central Executive power—the Provisional Workers' and Peasants' Government (the Soviet of People's Commissars)—was instituted by the Central organ of the Soviets—by the 2nd All-Russian Congress of Soviets. In localities the administrative power belongs to the Soviets, in whose jurisdiction must be all the institutions of administrative, economic, financial and educational characters. Such an organization of central power and of power in localities is not more than a confirmation of that political factor that the power of the country has been transferred to the proletarian and semi-proletarian elements.

Having established this fundamental law and endeavoring to enforce it consistently, we approach the period of the following organization scheme.

All previous orders of local self-governments, such as: regional, provincial and county commissars, committee of public organization, rural administration, etc., must be replaced by respective (regional, provincial, and county) Soviets of Workers', Peasants' and Soldiers' Deputies. The whole country must be covered with a network of Soviet organizations, which must be in close relation to one another. Each one of these organizations, including the smallest, is absolutely autonomous in questions of local CHARACTER, but their decrees must be of a character corresponding with the decrees and laws of the larger Soviet organizations and the decrees of the Central power, of which they are a part. Thus is being organized a united uniform state—the Republic of Soviets.

Under such circumstances the regional, provincial and county Soviets of Workers' Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies have a tremendous responsibility in solving the organization problem. In view of fact that the peasants' organization is weaker than any other democratic organization, the Deputies must give special attention to the organization of Peasants' Soviets and their closest co-operation with the Soviets of the Workers' and Soldiers' Deputies. In the organization of the Soviets of Peasants' Deputies it must be borne in mind that they should really unite all the democratic, proletarian and semi-proletarian elements of the village.

People's Commissariat of Interior.

Published in the organ of the Provisional Workers' and Peasants' Government, #21, December 24th 1917.

(NOTE.—Each decree of the Soviet of Workers' and Peasants' Government becomes effective and must be enforced upon its publication in the official organ of the Government.)

EXHIBIT 10.

DECREE ON THE ADMINISTRATION OF NATIONAL UNDERTAKINGS.

PART I.

1. The Central Administration of Nationalized Undertakings, of whatever branch of industry, assigns for each large nationalized undertaking technical and administrative directors, in whose hands are placed the actual administration and direction of the entire activity of the undertaking. They are responsible to the Central Administration and the Commissioner appointed by it.

2. The technical director appoints technical employees and gives all orders regarding the technical administration of the undertaking. The factory committee may, however, complain regarding these appointments and orders to the Commissioner of the Central Administration, and then to the Central Administration itself; but only the Commissioner and Central Administration may stop the appointments and order of the technical director.

3. In connection with the Administrative Director there is an Economic Administrative Council, consisting of delegates from laborers, employees, and engineers of the undertaking. The Council examines the estimates of the undertaking, the plan of its works, the rules of internal distribution, complaints, the material and moral conditions of the work and life of the workmen and employees, and likewise all questions regarding the progress of the undertaking.

4. On questions of a technical character relating to the enterprise the Council has only a consultative voice, but on other questions a decisive voice, on condition, however, that the Administrative Director appointed by the Central Administration has the right to appeal from the orders of the Council to the Commissioner of the Central Administration.

5. The duty of acting upon decisions of the Economic Administrative Council belongs to the Administrative Director.

6. The Council of the enterprise has the right to make representation to the Central Administration regarding a change of the directors of the enterprise, and to present its own candidates.

7. Depending on the size and importance of the enterprise, the Central Administration may appoint several technical and administrative directors.

8. The composition of the Economic Administrative Council of the enterprise consists of (a) a representative of the workmen of the undertaking; (b) a representative of the other employees; (c) a representative of the highest technical and commercial personnel; (d) the directors of the undertaking, appointed by the Central Administration; (e) representatives of the local or regional council of professional unions of the people's economic council, of the council of workmen's deputies, and of the professional council of that branch of industry to which the given enterprise belongs; (f) a representative of the workmen's coöperative council, and (g) a representative of the Soviet of peasants' deputies of the corresponding region.

9. In the composition of the Economic Administrative Council of the enterprise, representatives of workmen and other employees, as mentioned in points (a) and (b) of Article 8, may furnish only half of the number of members.

10. The workmen's control of nationalized undertakings is realized by leaving all declarations and orders of the factory committee, or of the controlling commission, to the judgment and decision of the Economic Administrative Council of the enterprise.

11. The workmen, employees, and highest technical and commercial personnel of nationalized undertakings are in duty bound before the Russian Soviet Republic to observe severe industrial discipline, and to carry out conscientiously and accurately the work assigned to them. To the Economic Administrative Council are given judicial rights, including that of dismissal without notice for longer or shorter periods, together with the declaration of a boycott for non-proletariat recognition of their rights and duties.

12. In the case of those industrial branches for which central administrations have not yet been formed, all their rights are vested in provincial councils of the national economy, and in corresponding industrial sections of the Supreme Council of the National Economy.

13. The estimates and plan of work of a nationalized undertaking must be presented by its Economic Administrative Council to the central administration of a given industrial branch at least as often as once in three months, through the provincial organizations, where such have been established.

14. The management of nationalized undertakings, where such management has heretofore been organized on other principles because of the absence of a general plan and general orders for the whole of Russia, must now be reorganized in accordance with the present regulation, within the next three months [i. e., by the end of May, new style].

15. For the consideration of the declarations of the Economic Administrative Council concerning the activity of the directors of the undertaking at the central administration of a given branch of industry, a special section is established, composed one-third of representatives of general governmental, political, and economic institutions of the proletariat, one-third of representatives of workmen and other employees of the given industrial branch, and one-third of representatives of the directing, technical and commercial personnel and its professional organizations.

16. The present order must be posted on the premises of each nationalized undertaking.

NOTE.—Small nationalized enterprises are managed on similar principles, with the proviso that the duties of technical and administrative directors may be combined in one person, and the numerical strength of the Economic Administrative Council may be cut down by the omission of representatives of one or another institution or organization.

PART II.

17. A Central Administration [Principal Committee] for each nationalized branch of industry is to be established in connection with the Supreme Council of the National Economy, to be composed one-third of representatives of workmen and employees of a given industrial branch; one-third of representatives of the general proletariat, general governmental, political, and economic organizations and institutions (Supreme Council of National Economy, the People's Commissioners, All-Russian Council of Professional Unions, All-Russian Council of Workmen's Cooperative Unions, Central Executive Committee of the Councils of Workmen's Delegates) and one-third of representatives of scientific bodies, of the supreme technical and commercial personnel, and of democratic organizations of all Russia (Council of the Congresses of All Russia, cooperative unions of consumers, councils of peasants' deputies).

18. The Central Administration selects its bureau, for which all orders of the Central Administration are obligatory, which conducts the current work and carries into effect the general plans for the undertaking.

19. The Central Administration organizes provincial and local administrations of a given industrial branch, on principles similar to those on which its own organization is based.

20. The rights and duties of each Central Administration are indicated in the order concerning the establishment of each of them, but in each case each Central Administration unites, in its own hands (a) the management of the enterprises of a given industrial branch, (b) their financing, (c) their technical unification or reconstruction, (d) standardization of the working conditions of the given industrial branch.

21. All orders of the Supreme Council of National Economy are obligatory for each Central Administration; the Central Administration comes in contact with the Supreme Council in the person of the bureau of productive organization of the Supreme Council of National Economy through the corresponding productive sections.

22. When the Central Administration for any industrial branch which has not yet been nationalized is organized, it has the right to sequester the enterprises of the given branch, and equally, without sequestration, to prevent its managers completely or in part from engaging in its administration, appoint commissioners, give orders, which are obligatory, to the owners of non-nationalized enterprises, and incur expenses on account of these enterprises for measures which the Central Administration may consider necessary; and likewise to combine into a technical whole separate enterprises or parts of the same, to transfer from some enterprises to others fuel and customers' orders, and establish prices upon articles of production and commerce.

23. The Central Administration controls imports and exports of corresponding goods for a period which it determines, for which purpose it forms a part of the general governmental organizations of external commerce.

24. The Central Administration has the right to concentrate in its hands and in institutions established by it, both the entire preparation of articles necessary for a given branch of industry (raw material, machinery, etc.), and the disposal to enterprises subject to it of all products and acceptance of orders for them.

PART III.

25. Upon the introduction of nationalization into any industrial branch, or into any individual enterprise, the corresponding Central Administration (or the temporary Central Administration appointed with its rights) takes under its management the nationalized enterprises, each separately, and preserves the large ones as separate administrative units, annexing to them the smaller ones.

26. Until the nationalized enterprises have been taken over by the Central Administration (or principal commissioner), all former managers or directorates must continue their work in its entirety in the usual manner, and under the supervision of the corresponding commissioner (if one has been appointed), taking all measures necessary for the preservation of the national property and for the continuous course of operations.

27. The Central Administration and its organs establish new managements and technical administrative directorates of enterprises.

28. Technical administrative directorates of nationalized enterprises are organized according to Part I of this Regulation.

29. The management of a large undertaking, treated as a separate administrative unit, is organized with a view to securing, in as large a measure as possible, the utilization of the technical and commercial experience accumulated by the undertaking; for which purpose there are included in the composition of the new management not only representatives of the laborers and employees of the enterprise (to the number of one-third of the general numerical strength of the management) and of the Central Administration itself (to the number of one-third or less, as the Central Administration shall see fit), but also, as far as possible, members of former managements, excepting persons specially removed by the Central Administration and, upon their refusal, representatives of any special competent organizations, even if they are not proletariat (to a number not exceeding one-third of the general membership of the management.)

30. When nationalization is introduced, whether of the entire branch of the industry or of separate enterprises, the Central Administrations are permitted, in order to facilitate the change, to pay to the highest technical and commercial personnel their present salaries, and even, in case of refusal on their part to work and the impossibility of filling their places with other persons, to introduce for their benefit obligatory work and to bring suit against them.

31. The former management of each nationalized undertaking must prepare a report for the last year of operation and an inventory of the undertaking, in accordance with which inventory the new management verifies the properties taken over. The actual taking over of the enterprise is done by the new management immediately upon its confirmation by the principal committee, without waiting for the presentation of the inventory and report.

32. Upon receipt in their locality of notice of the nationalization of some enterprise, and until the organization of the management and its administration by the Central Administration (or the principal commissioner, or institution having the rights of the principal commissioner) the workmen and employees of the given enterprise, and, if possible, also the Council of Workmen's Deputies, the Council of National Economy, and Council of Professional Unions, select temporary commissioners, under whose supervision and observation (and, if necessary, under whose management) the activity of the undertaking continues. The workmen and employees of the given enterprises, and the regional councils of national economy, of professional unions, and of workmen's delegates have the right also to organize temporary managements and directorates of nationalized enterprises until the same are completely established by the Central Administration.

33. If the initiative for the nationalization of a given enterprise comes, not from the general governmental and proletariat organs authorized for that purpose, but from the workmen of a given enterprise or from some local or regional organization, then they propose to the Supreme Council of National Economy, in the person of its bureau of organization of production, that the necessary steps be undertaken through the proper production sections, according to the decree of 28 February regarding the method of confiscating enterprises.

34. In exceptional cases local labor organizations are given the right to take temporarily under their management the given enterprise, if circumstances do not permit of awaiting the decision of the question in the regular order, but on condition that such action be immediately brought to the notice of the nearest provincial council of national economy, which then puts a temporary sequestration upon the enterprise pending the complete solution of the question of nationalization by the Supreme Council of National Economy; or, if it shall consider the reasons insufficient, or nationalization clearly inexpedient, or a prolonged sequestration unnecessary, it directs a temporary sequestration or even directly reestablishes the former management of the enterprise under its supervision, or introduces into the composition of the management representatives of labor organizations.

35. The present order must be furnished by the professional unions of all Russia to all their local divisions, and by the councils of factory committees to all factory committees, and must be published in full in the Iscestia of all provincial councils of workmen's and peasants' deputies.

Published March 7, 1918.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 11.

DECREE ON THE SUPREME BOARD OF NATIONAL ECONOMY.

1. The Supreme Board of National Economy is established under the Council of the People's Commissaries.

2. The task of the Supreme Board of National Economy is the organization of the national economy and state finances. For that purpose the Supreme Board of National Economy elaborates general standards and a plan for the regulation of the economic life of the country, coördinates and unifies the activity of the central and local regulating institutions (fuel board, metal board, transport board, central supplies committee, etc., and the respective People's Commissaries of commerce and industry, supplies, agriculture, finances, war and navy, etc.) of the All-Russian Board of Workmen's Control, and also of the corresponding activities of factory and trade organizations of the working class.

3. The Supreme Board of National Economy is given the right of confiscation, requisition, sequestration, and compulsory syndication of various branches of industry and commerce, and other measures in the domain of production, distribution, and state finances.

4. All existing institutions for the regulation of the national economy are subordinated to the Supreme Board of National Economy, which is given the right to reform them.

5. The Supreme Board of National Economy is formed: (a) of the All-Russian Board of Workmen's Control, whose personnel is determined by the decree of November 14, 1917; (b) of representatives of all the People's Commissaries; (c) of learned persons, who are invited and have a consulting vote.

6. The Supreme Board of National Economy is divided into sections and departments (as fuel, metal, demobilization, finance, etc.), and the number and the sphere of activity of these sections and departments are determined by the entire Board.

7. The departments of the Supreme Board of National Economy conduct the work of regulating the separate branches of national economic life, and also prepare the measures of the respective People's Commissaries.

8. The Supreme Board of National Economy forms out of its membership a bureau of 15 persons, for the coördination of the current work of the sections and departments and the performance of tasks which demand immediate attention.

9. All projects of law and large measures which have reference to the regulation of the national economy in its entirety are submitted to the Council of the People's Commissaries through the Supreme Board of National Economy.

10. The Supreme Board of National Economy unifies and directs the Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies, which include the local organs, of workmen's control, and also the local commissaries of labor, commerce and industry, supplies, etc. In the absence of corresponding economic branches, the Supreme Board of National Economy forms local organs.

All decisions of the Supreme Board of National Economy are binding upon the economic departments of the local Soviets, which constitute the local organs of the Supreme Board of National Economy.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 12.

DECREE ON REGIONAL AND LOCAL BOARDS OF NATIONAL ECONOMY.

1. For the purpose of the organization and regulation of the entire economic life of every industrial region, in conformity with general state and local interests, under the regional and local Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies, there are organized regional Boards of National Economy, as local institutions for the organization and the regulation of production, directed by the Supreme Board of National Economy and acting under the general control of the respective Soviet of Workmen's, Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies.

2. The Regional Board of National Economy is formed: (a) of the collegia elected at the joint conferences of producers' trade unions and factory committees (mining, commercial, industrial, transport, etc.) and also at conferences of land committees called by the Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies; (b) of representatives of Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies and democratic coöperative societies; (c) of representatives of the technical, administrative, and commercial management of enterprises (numbering not more than one-third of the entire membership of the board). . . .

Representatives of departments participate in the deliberations of the Regional Board of National Economy and have a consulting vote.

3. The Regional Board of National Economy is divided into sections, according to the branches of economic life: (1) state economy and banks, (2) fuel, (3) metal manufacture, (4) textile manufacture, (5) cotton manufacture, (6) wood, (7) mineral substances, (8) animal products, (9) alimentary and gas-tronomic substances, (10) chemical products, (11) construction works, (12) transport, (13) agriculture, (14) supplies and consumption, or other sections which the Regional Board of National Economy, owing to local circumstances, may find necessary.

Each section which takes charge of any branch of production is divided into four main departments: (1) organization: (a) management, (b) financing, and (c) technical organization of enterprises; (2) supply and distribution; (3) labor; (4) statistical. Kindred departments of the sections, by meeting jointly, form conferences (1) on organization, (2) on supplies and distribution, (3) on labor questions, (4) on statistics. They maintain permanent business bureaus.

The Board of National Economy forms also other inter-sectional conferences, as on demobilization, etc.

4. The Regional Board of National Economy elects an executive committee which directs all the activity of the Board, its departments, sections and bureaus.

The Regional Board of National Economy elects a presidium which constitutes the presidium of the executive committee and of the separate committees of the Regional Board of National Economy.

5. The Regional Board of National Economy has jurisdiction over the following matters:

(a) The consideration and solution of questions of principle and those common to the whole region; the unification and direction of the activities of the lower organs of workmen's control in the region, the regulation of their mutual relations, the composition and elaboration of detailed instructions for them regarding different questions of control.

(b) The direction, under the supervision of the Supreme Board of National Economy, of the management of private enterprises which have become the property of the Republic.

(c) The investigation of conflicts not settled by the local organs.

(d) The investigation of all the needs of the region as to fuel, raw material, means of production, labor force, transportation, facilities, supplies, and, in general, articles of prime necessity.

(e) The accounting of raw material, unfinished products, goods, labor forces, implements, and other articles of production.

(f) The taking of measures for the satisfaction of the wants and economic needs of the population, rural economy, etc.

(g) The establishment of regulations and plans for the distribution of general state supplies in the region.

(h) The formation of plans for the distribution of orders among the enterprises.

(i) The regulation of transport in the region.

(j) The establishment of strict supervision over the entire economic life of the region with regard to organization, finances, etc.

(k) The taking of measures for the most complete utilization of the productive forces of the region, in the industries as well as in rural economy.

(l) The establishment of bases of distribution of the labor forces, materials, fuel, means of production, goods, supplies, etc.

(m) The taking of measures for the improvement of the sanitary-hygienic conditions of labor.

6. All regulating institutions of local significance come under the jurisdiction of the respective Regional Boards of National Economy, and all employees, together with the technical and administrative apparatus, are placed at the disposal of the Regional Board of National Economy.

7. All decisions of the Regional Board of National Economy have a compulsory character, and must be carried out by all local institutions and also by the directorates of enterprises.

The decisions of the Regional Board of National Economy can be suspended and vacated only by the Supreme Board of National Economy.

8. The limits of the economic regions are fixed by a congress of Regional Boards of National Economy and, until its meeting, by the Supreme Board of National Economy.

9. All Regional Boards of National Economy must, immediately upon formation, enter into business connection with the Supreme Board of National Economy, obeying its directions upon questions affecting general state interests.

10. The formation of Boards of National Economy of smaller regions (provincial, district, etc.), modelled after the organization of Regional Boards of National Economy, is left to the initiative of provincial Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies. The establishment of the sphere of their activity and their general direction and coördination devolve upon the Regional Board of National Economy.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 13.

DECREE APPROPRIATING 2,000,000 ROUBLES FOR INTERNATIONAL REVOLUTIONARY PROPAGANDA PURPOSES.

An Ordinance on assigning two million roubles for the needs of the revolutionary internationalist movement.

Taking into consideration that Soviet authority stands on the ground of the principles of international solidarity of the proletariat and the brotherhood of the toilers of all countries, that the struggle against war and imperialism, only on an international scale, can lead to complete victory, the Soviet of Peoples Commissaries, considers it necessary to come forth with all aid, including financial aid, to the assistance of the left, internationalist, wing of the workers movement of all countries, entirely regardless whether these countries are at war with Russia, or in an alliance, or whether they retain their neutrality.

With these aims the Soviet of Peoples Commissaries ordains: the assigning of two million roubles for the needs of the revolutionary internationalist movement, at the disposition of the foreign representatives of the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs.

President of the Soviet of Peoples Commissaries—VI. Oulianoff (Lenin).

Peoples Commissary for Foreign Affairs—L. Trotzky.

Manager of Affairs of the Soviet of Peoples Commissaries. VI. Bonch-Bruевич.

Secretary of the Soviet—N. Gorbounov.

Published in No. 31 of the "Gazette of the Temporary Workers and Peasants Government," December 13, 1917.

EXHIBIT 14.

DECREE ON PEACE.

Accepted unanimously at the meeting of the All-Russian Congress of Soviets of W. S. & P. Delegates October 26th, 1917.

The workmen and peasant Government created by the revolution of October 24th-25th and supported by the soviets of W. S. & P. Delegates proposes to all belligerent nations and their governments to commence immediately negotiations for an equitable democratic peace.

An equitable or democratic peace, desired by the greatest majority of exhausted tormented and ravaged-by-the-war workmen and labouring classes of all the combatant countries, a peace which the Russian workmen and peasants demanded most insistently and decisively after the overthrow of the monarchy, is, according to the Government, an immediate peace without annexation (i. e. without the seizure of foreign lands, without the forcible annexation of foreign nationalities) and without the payment of indemnifications.

This is the peace which the Russian Government is proposing all the belligerents to conclude immediately, expressing its willingness to take all decisive steps without any delay till the final confirmation of all the conditions of such a peace by the lawful meetings of the people's representatives of all countries and all nations.

Under the annexation or seizure of foreign lands the Government understands any addition to a great and strong state of a small or weak nationality without the precisely, clearly and voluntarily expressed consent and wish of such a nation, independently thereof when such an annexation had been accomplished, independently thereof how cultured or ignorant is the nation which is being arbitrarily annexed or retained within the limits of a given state. Independently, lastly, thereof, whether such a nation is residing in Europe or in some far country across the ocean.

If any nation is being retained within the boundaries of a given state forcibly, if notwithstanding its desire, expressed in print, or in popular meetings, in decisions of parties of revolts and uprisings against oppression, it will not be given the possibility by a free voting with the absolute removal of all the troops of the annexing or stronger nation, to decide without the least compulsion the question regarding the form of its existence as a state, then its annexation is arbitrary seizure and violation of its rights.

The Government considers that to continue this war in order to divide between the stronger and richer nations the weaker ones seized by them, is a crime against humanity and it solemnly declares its decision to sign immediately any conditions of peace which will stop this war on the terms mentioned above and which are equally fair to all the nations without exception.

At the same time the Government declares that it does not in any way consider the aforesaid peace conditions as an ultimatum, i. e., the Government consents to examine all other conditions of peace, insisting only that they be proposed as quickly as possible by any one of the combatants and as clearly as possible, with the exclusion of all ambiguities and secrets in the proposition of the peace conditions.

The Government revokes all secret diplomacy expressing on its part the firm intention to conduct all negotiations openly before all the people, and proceeding immediately to the publication of all secret agreements confirmed or concluded by the Government of landowners and capitalists since February and up to October 25th, 1917. All the tenure of these secret agreements in so far as they are directed as in most cases to the granting of advantages and privileges to the Russian landowners and capitalists, or to the retaining or increase of the annexations of the Great Russians, The Government declares to be unconditionally and immediately revoked.

In addressing the governments and nations of all the countries with a proposition to begin immediately negotiations regarding the conclusion of peace the Government expresses on its part its willingness to conduct these negotiations, by means of correspondence, or by telegraph, or by way of negotiations between the representatives of the different countries or at a conference of such representatives. For the facilitation of such negotiations the Government will detail its empowered representative to the neutral countries.

The Government proposes to all the governments and peoples of the belligerent countries to conclude an immediate truce, desiring on its part, that such a truce be concluded for not less than three months, i. e., for such a period of time during which it would be quite possible to complete the negotiations for peace with the participation of representatives of all the nations or nationalities, which were involved in the war or compelled to take part in it, and also to convene full-powered meetings of peoples' representatives of all countries for the final confirmation of the peace conditions.

Addressing this proposition of peace to the governments and peoples of all the belligerent countries, the provisional workmen and peasant government of Russia addresses itself also in particular to the conscious workmen of the three most advanced nations of humanity and the greatest of the powers participating in the present war. England, France and Germany. The workmen of these countries have given the best services to the cause of progress and socialism and the great models of the chartist movement in England, the series of revolutions carried out by the French proletariat, lastly, the heroic struggle against the exclusive law in Germany and the long stubborn disciplinary work for the creation of proletarian organisations in Germany which ought to serve as a model for the workmen of the whole world,—all these models of proletarian heroism and historical creation serve as a guarantee that the workmen of the aforementioned countries will understand the duties lying on them which are to deliver humanity from the horrors of war and their results,—because these same workmen by their decisive and energetic activity will help us to bring a successful end the cause of peace and at the same time the liberation of all working classes from slavery and exploitation.

EXHIBIT 15.

APPEAL TO LABORING MOHAMMEDANS OF RUSSIA AND THE EAST.

To all Laboring Mohammedans of Russia and the East.
Comrades! Brothers!

Great events are transpiring in Russia. An end is approaching to the bloody war—begun over the partition of foreign lands. The domination of ravishers who enslaved the peoples of the world, is following. Under the blows of the Russian revolution the old structure of Kabal and slavery is cracking. The world of arbitrariness and oppression is living out its last days. A new world is coming forth, a world of toilers and the emancipated. At the head of this revolution stands the workers and peasants' government of Russia, the Soviet of Peoples' Commissaries.

All Russia is sown with Revolutionary Soviets of workers, soldiers, and peasants deputies. The power of the country is in the hands of the people. The laboring people of Russia are burning up with the one desire to obtain an honorable peace, and help the oppressed peoples of the world to fight for and obtain freedom for themselves.

For this holy work Russia is not alone. The great call of freedom sounded by the Russian revolution is taken up by all the toilers of the West and East. The peoples of Europe, exhausted by war, are already stretching their arms to us, creating peace. The workers and soldiers of the West are already gathering under the standard of socialism, storming the strongholds of imperialism. And distant India, the same, which for centuries was oppressed by the "enlightened" ravishers of Europe, has raised the standard of revolt, organizing their own Soviets of Deputies, casting from their shoulders contemptible slavery, calling the peoples of the East to the struggle for freedom.

The Kingdom of Capitalistic plunder and force is crumbling. The soil is burning under the feet of the plunderers of imperialism. In the face of these great events we turn to you, toiling and unfortunate Mohammedans of Russia and the East.

Mohammedans of Russia, Tartars of the Pre-Volga and Crimea, Kirgeese and Sarts of Siberia and Turkestan, Turks and Tartars of Transcaucasia, Chechents and Mountaineers of Caucasasia, all those whose Mosques and houses of prayer were destroyed, whose faith and customs were trampled under foot by the Tsars and oppressors of Russia! From now your faith and customs, your national and cultural institutions are proclaimed free and inviolate. Arrange your national life freely and without hindrance. You have that right. Know, then, that your rights, as also the rights of all the peoples of Russia, are protected by all the might of the revolution and its organs, the Soviets or Workers, Soldiers and Peasants Deputies.

Support then, this revolution and its authorized government.

Mohammedans of the East, Persians and Turks, Arabians and Hindoos; all those with whose heads and property, with whose liberty and native land, the covetous plunderers of Europe, have traded for hundreds of years, all those whose countries the robbers who started the war wish to share!

We announce that the secret agreements of the overthrown Tzar on the seizure of Constantinople confirmed by the overthrown Kerensky, are now torn up and destroyed. The Russian Republic and its government, the Soviet of Peoples' Commissaries, is against the seizure of foreign lands; Constantinople must remain in the hands of the Mohammedans.

We announce that the agreement on the partition of Persia is torn and destroyed. As soon as military activities cease the troops will be withdrawn from Persia, and the Persians will be guaranteed the right of free determination of their fate.

We announce that the agreement on the partition of Turkey and the taking away from her of Armenia is torn up and destroyed. As soon as military activities cease, the Armenians will be secured the right to freely determine their political fate.

Not from Russia or her revolutionary government does slavery await you, but from the plunderers of European imperialism, from those who turned your native land into a plundered and pilfered "colony" of their own.

Overthrow these plunderers and enslavers of your countries. Now, when war and destruction are crushing the foundations of the world, when the whole world is inflamed with indignation against the imperialistic usurpers, when every spark of revolt is converted into the mighty flames of revolution, when even the Indian Mohammedans, hounded and exhausted by the foreign yoke are rising up against their enslavers, now we cannot be silent. Lose no time, and cast from your shoulders the centuries old usurpers. Do not surrender any more to their plundering of the sites of your burnt home. You must be master of your own country! You must yourself arrange your life to your own image and likeness! You have the right to that, your fate is in your own hands.

Brothers! Comrades!

We are firmly and resolutely going toward an honorable, democratic peace. On our standard we carry the liberation of the oppressed peoples of the world.

Mohammedans of Russia!

Mohammedans of the East!

On this path of restoration of the world, we expect from you sympathy and support.

(Chairman of the Soviets of Peoples Commissaries V. Ulyanov (Lenine).

Peoples Commissary of National Affairs Djougatovic Stalin.

(Published in the No. 17 of the Gazette of the Temporary Workers and Peasants Government. November 24, 1917.)

EXHIBIT 16.

DECLARATION OF THE RIGHTS OF THE LABORING AND EXPLOITED PEOPLE.

The form of the following declaration was prepared for submission to the Constituent Assembly by the Bolshevik Government and the refusal of the Constituent Assembly to adopt it was one reason for its forcible dissolution by the Red Guard.

The Central Executive Committee proclaims the following basic principles:

I. The Constituent Assembly resolves:

1. Russia is declared to be a Republic of Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies. All the power in the centre and in the provinces belongs to these Soviets.

2. The Russian Soviet Republic is formed on the basis of a free union of free nations, as a federation of national Soviet republics.

II. Taking as its fundamental task the abolition of any exploitation of man by men, the complete elimination of the division of society into classes, the ruthless suppression of exploiters, the establishment of a socialistic organization of society and the victory of Socialism in all countries, the Constituent Assembly resolves, further:

1. To effect the socialization of the land, private ownership of land is abolished, and the whole land fund is declared common national property and transferred to the laborers without compensation, on the basis of equalized use of the soil.

All forests, minerals, and waters of state-wide importance, as well as the whole inventory of animate and inanimate objects, all estates and agricultural enterprises, are declared national property.

2. The Soviet law of labor control and the Supreme Board of National Economy are confirmed, with a view to securing the authority of the toilers over the exploiters, as the first step to the complete transfer of all factories, mills, mines, railways, and other means of production and transportation to the ownership of the Workmen's and Peasants' Soviet Republic.

3. The transfer of all banks into the ownership of the Workers' and Peasants' state is confirmed, it being one of the conditions of the emancipation of the laboring masses from the yoke of capital.

4. With a view to the destruction of the parasitic classes of society and the organization of the national economy, universal labor service is established.

5. In the interest of securing all the power for the laboring masses and the elimination of any possibility of the reestablishment of the power of the exploiters, the arming of the toilers, the formation of a socialistic red army of workmen and peasants, and the complete disarmament of the wealthy classes are decreed.

III. 1. Expressing its inflexible determination to wrest humanity from the talons of financial capital and imperialism, which have drenched the earth with blood in this most criminal of wars, the Constituent Assembly subscribes unanimously to the policy of abrogating secret treaties which has been adopted by the Soviet Government, the organization of the widest fraternization with the workmen and peasants of the armies now warring against each other, and the securing, at any cost and by revolutionary measures, of a democratic peace without annexations and indemnities, on the basis of free self-determination of peoples.

2. For these same purposes the Constituent Assembly insists upon a complete break with the barbarous policy of bourgeois civilization which built the prosperity of the exploiters among the few chosen nations upon the enslavement of hundreds of millions of the laboring population in Asia, in the colonies in general, and in the small countries.

The Constituent Assembly welcomes the policy of the Council of the People's Commissaries which has proclaimed the complete independence of Finland, which has begun the removal of the troops from Persia, and which has declared the freedom of self-determination of Armenia.

The Constituent Assembly views the Soviet law of the repudiation of the loans contracted by the Government of the Czar, the landowners and bourgeoisie, as the first blow to international banking, finance and capital, and expresses its confidence that the Soviet authority will continue to pursue that course until the complete victory of the rising of international labor against the yoke of capital is attained.

IV. Having been elected on the basis of party lists made up before the October revolution, when the people could not yet rise en masses against the exploiters and did not know the strength of the opposition when the latter defends its class privileges, and when the people had not yet practically undertaken the creation of a socialistic society, the Constituent Assembly would deem it radically wrong, even from a formal point of view, to set itself in opposition to the Soviets.

In substance, the Constituent Assembly considers that now, at the moment of the decisive battle of the people with their exploiters, there can be no place for the latter in any of the organs of government. The power must belong wholly and exclusively to the toiling masses and their plenipotentiaries, the Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Delegates.

Supporting the Soviet Government and the decrees of the Council of the People's Commissaries, the Constituent Assembly recognizes that its tasks are completed when it has framed a general statement of the fundamental bases of a socialistic reconstruction of society.

At the same time, aiming at the creation of a really free and voluntary and, consequently, a more complete and lasting union of the laboring classes of all the nations of Russia, the Constituent Assembly confines itself to the establishment of the fundamental principles of federation of the Soviet Republic of Russia, leaving it to the workmen and peasants of each nation to decide independently, at their own representative Soviet Congress, whether they wish to participate in the Federal Government and in the other Soviet institutions, and on what basis.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 17.

DECREE ON THE EQUALIZATION OF RIGHTS OF ALL SERVING IN THE ARMY.

On the equalization of rights of all serving in the army. In realization of the will of a revolutionary people, for the quickest and most decisive destruction of all remnants of the former inequality in the army, the Soviet of Peoples Commissaries ordains:

1. All titles and stations in the army, starting with that of corporal and ending with that of general, are abolished. The army of the Russian Republic from now on consists of free and equal-to-one-another citizens, holding the honorable station of Soldiers of the Revolutionary Army.

2. All preference, connected with the former titles and stations as well as outward distinctions are annulled.

3. All titles are annulled.

4. All orders and other marks of distinction are abolished.

5. With the abolishing of the officers rank there are abolished all ~~separate~~ officers organizations.

6. The institution of orderlies, now existing in the active army, is abolished.
NOTE.—Orderlies remain only in regimental offices, committees and other army organizations.

President of the Soviet of Peoples Commissaries—VI. Oulianoff (Lenin).

Peoples Commissary for Military and Naval Affairs—N. Krilenko.

Peoples Commissary for Military Affairs—Padvaoytskiy.

Colleagues of the Peoples Commissary for Military Affairs—Kedrov, Sklyanskiy, Legran, Mehonoshin.

Secretary of the Soviet—N. Gorbounov.

December 16, 1917.

Published in No. 35 of the "Gazette of the Temporary Workers and Peasants Government." December 17, 1917.

EXHIBIT 18.

ORDER OF THE HIGH COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

[Krylenko to the Army.—Telegram.]

Petrograd, Smolny. Council of People's Commissaries, Trotzky. In the name of the revolution order to the armies.

Upon receiving information and communications from the separate Corps and Armies regarding the armistices concluded with the enemy on the fronts I enjoin the following rules to be observed in future for the conclusion of armistices:

1. All private agreements regarding the suspension of hostilities must conform to the fact of the sending of a special delegation, in accordance with the resolution of the Council of People's Commissaries, to the general headquarters of the high commander of the German armies on the 19th instant.

This armistice must be a general one for all the fronts, as coming from the Central Authority of the Russian Republic, wherefore all partial armistices must automatically lose their force from the moment of the conclusion of a general armistice by the aforementioned delegation.

2. An obligatory condition for the conclusion of a partial armistice must be that of the suspension of all movements of troops from the fronts of the contracting parties to any new fronts, and especially from our front to those of the Allied armies.

3. All armistices to be concluded must be confirmed by me or by the central organs of authority of Petrograd.

4. A preliminary concordance of such armistices on as large sectors of the front is desirable; in particular, the western front which has already concluded such an armistice, the Roumanian front just proceeding to the conclusion of one, the northern front where partial armistices have taken place,—must immediately take note of the above conditions and inform me of the corresponding alterations in the wording of their agreements.

Comrades! Only under such conditions can we be assured of the solidity and unity of the revolutionary struggle for peace.

Long live the peace concluded by the peoples themselves!

Hail to the end of the accursed slaughter!

Hail to the victory and power of the people!

The present order is to be read in all the companies, squadrons, sotnias, batteries, ship's crews and separate detachments.

November 21st 1917. No. 16248.

High Commander-in-Chief Krylenko.

EXHIBIT 19.

DECREE ON THE APPROPRIATION OF 20,000,000 ROUBLES FOR THE WORKMEN'S AND PEASANTS' RED ARMY.

Assignment of twenty million (20,000,000) rubles for the organization of the Workmen's and Peasants' Red Army. In agreement with the decision of the Committee of the Soldiers' Section of the Third All-Russian Congress of Peasants, Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies for the organization of the Workmen's and Peasants' Red Army, the Soviet of People's Commissaries ordains as follows:

For the organization of the Workmen's and Peasants' Red Army shall be allotted at first from the National Treasury, twenty million (20,000,000) rubles at the disposition of the All-Russian Committee established in connection with the People's Commissariat for military affairs consisting of two representatives of the Military Commissariat and two representatives of the General Staff of the Red Army for the organization of the Workmen's and Peasants' Red Army with the consequent transfer of these twenty million (20,000,000) rubles from the war fund.

Of the sum thus assigned, credits shall be opened with the local District and Regional Soviet's Army Committees and Staff of the Red Army for the organization of a Workmen's and Peasants' Red Army, to provide for the Soldiers forming the Army and their families and for the organization of a Central Directorate.

(Signed):

President of the Soviet of People's Commissaries, V. Ulianov (Lenin).

People's Commissary for Military Affairs, N. I. Podvoiski.

Director of Administration, Vlad. Bonch-Brukevich.

Secretary of the Soviet, N. Gorbunov.

Published, January 16, 1918.

EXHIBIT 20.

DECREE ON THE DEMOCRATIZATION OF THE NAVY OF THE RUSSIAN REPUBLIC.

ON THE DEMOCRATIZATION OF THE NAVY.

PART 1. General regulation on the personnel of the Fleet.

1. The personnel of the Fleet of the Russian Republic consists of free citizens, enjoying equal civic rights.

2. The designation by title, which has existed until now, and which expressed class distinction, are abolished, and all sailors in the Navy are to be called "Sailors of the Naval Fleet of the Russian Republic."

3. From the sailors of the Fleet of the Russian Republic there will be apportioned the commanding personnel, superintending the tactical and technical sections, working in conjunction with the committees for the management of the administrative section of the Navy.

4. The political section is entirely in the administration of elected committees.

5. The commanding personnel is formed of persons, who are accepted into the service and performing this service in accordance with special rules expounded in Part 5.

6. From persons not of the commanding personnel, on accordance with rules in Part 5, there are elected according to their specialties foremen who are responsible aids of the specialists of the commanding personnel.

7. All sailors have designations, answering to their specialties and position occupied; for example, Commander, Mechanic, Artilleryman, Electrician, etc.

8. All titles are revoked and persons occupying positions of command, are designated by their duties, for example,—Citizen Commander, Citizen Mechanic, etc.

9. A new style of clothing, general for all naval sailors, is to be designed by a separate, special commission.

NOTE.—Pending the preparation of the new form of clothing, the wearing of the old uniform is permissible.

10. All sailors in the Navy are granted the right to wear civilian clothing off duty.

11. All sailors of the Navy have the right to be members of any political, national, religious, economic or professional organization, society or union. They have the right, freely and openly, to express and profess by word or month, in writing or in print, their political, religious and other views.

12. All sailors of the Navy are subject to the laws, general for all citizens, without any exceptions. Correspondence must be delivered to the addressee without interruption.

13. All sailors, not on duty, have the right to absent themselves from their vessels and sections in accordance with orders and rules, established by corresponding organizations, but on the condition that a sufficient number of persons must remain to serve the vessel or section.

14. The commanding personnel have separate accommodations for living and for work, on board ship and at shore-stations.

15. The commanding personnel are allowed servants who hire out at their own free will, at the expense of the person desiring to have same, or in time of war, by the appointment of orderlies, on a mutual (with the crew) agreement, and with a definite salary.

NOTE.—The hiring of female help is prohibited on vessels of the Navy.

PART 2.—The management of the Navy.

16. The general guidance of the life and activities of the Navy is concentrated in the Central Committee of the Sea. At the head of the latter stands the Military-Naval Section, which superintends entirely the operative and technical affairs and works in conjunction with the Administrative, Economic, and Political Sections of the Central Committee of the Sea.

17. The Military-Naval Section is elected by the plenarium of the Central Committee of the Sea, on a basis of special instructions, which were worked out for that.

18. Being entirely independent in its operative ordinances, the Military-Naval Section is responsible for its actions to the plenium of the Central Committee of the Sea, as well as before the Superior State organs.

19. At the head of the Military-Naval Section stands a person designated as the Chief of the Military-Naval section of the Central Committee of the Sea, elected in accordance with paragraph 38, part 5, on the election of the commanding personnel.

20. All orders for the fleet or flotilla are issued by the Military-Naval Section, signed by the chief, countersigned by the member of the section attached to him, and are compulsory for the entire personnel of the Navy.

Note: Decisions of the Central Committee of the Sea are presented to the Military-Naval Section, which in accordance with the decision, issues an order, in accordance with the above paragraph, referring to the corresponding number of the decision.

PART 3.

21. The Chief of the Military-Naval Section has two assistants to the section, the first of which is the substitute chief and superintends the operative section of the fleet,—the second assistant superintends the technical and administrative sections.

22. For the development and bringing to reality of questions on all branches of the Military-Naval Section, there will enter into the Military Section; the principal specialists, with their assistants, on the operative, administrative and technical sections. The number of principal specialists and their assistants must correspond to the actual needs of the Navy, is determined by the Central Committee of the Sea and confirmed by the Supreme Naval organ.

23. The following commanding duties exist in the Fleet:

(a) Flag Officers.—Chief of: Divisions, Brigades, Detachments, Flotillas, Divisions of 2d grade vessels, divisions of 3rd grade vessels, divisions of 4th grade vessels, divisions of aircraft, coast defence, hydrographic expedition, protection of aquatic regions, service of connection, regions of the service of connection.

For each of the above duties there is a corresponding military section, the complement of which is determined by the Military-Naval Section of the Central Committee of the Sea.

(b) Ship Duties.—Commander of vessel, assistant to the commander, revisor. Specialists: Pilot, artilleryman, miner, electro-technic, diver, mechanic, doctor. Assistant specialists: Section plutong (?) commanders and others.

(c) Shore Duties.—Commander of a crew, commander of a company.

Note (to Par. 23): In other shore detachments and stations the commanding personnel is determined in accordance with the construction of the establishment, and is composed of persons administering, according to their specialties, the supreme military and technical branches.

PART 4. Rights, Duties and Responsibility of the Commanding Personnel.

24. The Chief of the Military-Naval Section works in conjunction with the Military section and the Central Committee of the Sea, on instructions, worked out specially for that, and issues all ordinances to the Navy, detachments, sections and vessels, over his signature, countersigned by the member of the Central Committee of the Sea attached to him.

25. Issuing all orders and ordinances, the Chief of the Military-Naval Section is responsible entirely for the operative and technical branches of the Navy. In branches where the work is in conjunction with the Central Committee of the Military-Naval Section is responsible only in the event that the ordinance of the C. C. of the Sea was introduced in accordance with his report, or if the ordinance is contrary to the views expressed in the matter by the Chief of the Military Section, and the latter does not agree with the plenum of the Central Committee of the Sea in regard to the introduced ordinance, then the responsibility for events, resulting from such ordinance are not borne by the Chief of the Military Section.

26. The duties of the commanding personnel are :

(a) In commanding their section, according to specialization in military, navigation or technical respect, in battle as well as when not in battle ;

(b) In commanding in military-naval instruction, in its entirety as well as in separate sections.

(c) Determining the date of preparedness of vessels for going to sea ;

(d) Issuing of orders for work which can not be postponed, caused by unavoidable circumstances ;

(e) All matters of administration, in conjunction with ship committee, in accordance with ordinances regarding the latter.

27. The commanding personnel assumes full responsibility in the limits of its activities described in par. a, b, c, d, or Par. 26, and shares the responsibility with committees in the limits of their joint activities, in the sense and spirit of responsibility, described in par. 25.

PART 5. Manner of Electing the Commanding Personnel of the Active Fleet and Battle Sections.

28. From persons having a sufficient preparation both in a theoretical and practical respect, there are elected foremen specialists by a general assembly of the corporation of specialists, on the basis of the four-member formula, and the results of the election are communicated to the ship committee and the commander of the vessel.

29. All persons designated to supersede and position of command, must have the necessary preparation, both theoretical and practical, substantiated by diploma from special schools, or special examining commissions.

NOTE.—To the duties of specialist can be admitted elected persons of good practical experience, who have passed the practical tests on the commission, which are established for that by the Central Committee of the Sea, and in connection with which, before assuming their duties, such persons must be sent to a school for a short theoretic preparation.

30. Before the election of foremen-specialist, the corporation of the corresponding specialty, together with the commander, prepares a list of candidates proposed for the assuming of the duties.

NOTE.—If the corporation has no candidates of its own, then it must refer to the Central Committee of the Sea for same.

31. From the person placed in the list of candidates (according to par. 29) are elected the foremen-specialists, only by the corporation of the corresponding specialty, on the basis of the four-member formula ; the election of this or that person is communicated by the corporation to the commander of the vessel for the notification of the entire complement of the vessel. If, within seven days from the date of the proclaiming of the result of the election, there has been no challenging of the candidate, (announced in accordance with par. 43, part 6) on the part of the crew, then the candidate is considered confirmed by the personnel of the vessel.

32. Before the election of an assistant commander, a candidate list of persons proposed for the assumption of duty is compiled by the ship committee together with the commander. In the necessity of electing a commander the candidates list is prepared by the ship committee together with the Flag Office.

NOTE.—If the ship committee has no candidates it must obtain same from the Central Committee of the Sea.

33. The election of an assistant commander, as well as a commander is conducted by the entire crew of a vessel, on the basis of the four-member formula, in connection with which the elections are considered effective if not less than two-thirds of the complement of the vessel participated.

34. Chiefs of divisions are elected by the division committee and commanders of vessels of the division from a list of candidates, compiled by the division committee and commanders, together with the Chief of Division.

35. This Chief of Division is elected by a committee of the division, together with the Chiefs of Divisions, from a list of candidates prepared by the Central Committee of the Sea, together with the Chief of the Military-Naval Section of the Central Committee of the Sea.

36. Chiefs of brigades, detachments, flotillas and others, are elected by the committee of the brigade, detachment, flotilla, etc., with the commanders of vessels, from a candidate list, compiled by the Central Committee of the Sea, together with the chief of the Military-Naval Section of the Central Committee of the Sea.

37. The commanding personnel, elected in accordance with Par. 32, 34 and 35, are confirmed in their positions by the Central Committee of the Sea, which issues the necessary order to the fleet and flotillas.

38. The Chief of the Military Naval Section of the Central Committee of the Sea is elected from candidates of the Central Committee of the Sea, together with the committees of divisions, brigades, detachments and flotillas, with the Chiefs of brigades, divisions, detachments and flotillas. The elections are conducted by the committees and chiefs who participated in the preparation of the list of candidates according to the four-member formula, and the elected person is confirmed in their position by the Supreme Maritime College at the presentation of the Central Committee of the Sea.

39. The personnel of the military sections is elected by the Chief of the Section, together with the committee of the section.

NOTE.—Pending the preparation of new lists the complement will remain the same.

40. The medical personnel is elected by the professional union of surgeons and assistant surgeons, and the results of elections are communicated to the Central Committee of the Sea after the confirmation of the candidate by the command of the vessel, in the manner of the confirmation of foremen-specialists (as in paragraph 31). The medical personnel is elected in accordance with #36, from a candidate list, presented by the Professional Union of Surgeons and Assistant-Surgeons.

41. Every sailor of the Naval Fleet, selected for any of these positions, has the privilege of refusing to occupy the position, having submitted the motive for his refusal. The final decision on the acceptability or non-acceptability of the refusal is reserved to the Central Committee of the Sea, at whose disposal is also all business connected with the election of the particular person. The motive of his refusal and the recall of the corresponding Chief and section committee, regarding the motive of refusal of the elected sailor.

42. The persons elected to office, at these elections will be considered those who receive an absolute majority, in connection with which if there is no absolute majority, then the two first candidates, having received the comparative majority, are voted on again.

PART 6. Recall of persons of the Commanding Personnel.

43. The question of the recall of any member of the commanding personnel of a vessel can be raised before the Ship Committee, by a group of $\frac{1}{3}$ of the complement of the vessel or the separate corporation of a specialty, if it pertains to specialists. The recall is subject to further action, if it is adopted by a general assembly of the crew or the corporation and specialties, by not less than $\frac{2}{3}$ of the number present.

44. The recall, adopted by the general assembly of the crew or corporation of specialists is forwarded, together with the report of the Chief of Section, if a commander is being recalled, or with the report of the commander in the recall of his assistant or a specialist, to the Central Committee of the Sea, for a final confirmation of the recall.

45. The commander of a vessel can raise the question of the recall of his assistant or any one of the specialists, by presenting to the ship's committee a statement explaining his motives. Having received such a statement the ship's committee brings it before a general assembly (for deliberation) of the entire complement of the vessel or corporation of specialists and the entire expedition of business on such recall with a protocol of the general assembly is presented for a final decision to the Central Committee of the Sea.

46. The question of the removal of chiefs of divisions, brigades, detachments, flotillas, and the personnel of other military sections attached to them, can be raised by committees and members of the commanding personnel who elected as well as those who participated in preparing the candidate lists for the chief who is being removed (Nos. 34, 35, 36 and 37) and is considered in the corresponding committee, whereupon the final decision is presented to the Central Committee of the Sea, which forwards the entire expedition of business on the discussion of the notice of recall to the corresponding committees.

47. The question of the removal of the Chief of the Military-Naval Section of the Central Committee of the Sea can be raised by the committees and persons of the commanding personnel, who participated in the election of the chief, in accordance with paragraph 38, by presenting a statement of their motives to the Central Committee of the Sea. Having received such a statement, the Central Committee of the Sea presents it for joint deliberation of the Central Committee of the Sea with the committees and the chiefs of brigades, divisions, detachments, and flotillas, and the removal is considered adopted if it is voted for by not less than $\frac{2}{3}$ of the members present at the consultation. The final confirmation of the adopted recall is presented to the Supreme Naval College, to whom the Central Committee of the Sea directs the entire expedition of business on the removal of the chief, together with the designation of the person newly elected to that duty in exact accordance with No. 38.

48. In exceptional cases persons against whom a statement of removal has been placed and adopted by the crew, can be temporarily removed from duty and even removed from the vessel pending a final decision of the Central Committee of the Sea on the question of their removal.

PART 7. Order of Subordination.

49. The distribution of the commanding personnel in the order of its subordination is established as follows: Chief of the Military-Naval Section of the Central Committee of the Sea, Flag Officers, Chiefs of Divisions, Commanders, Senior Specialists and their Assistants, and Forman Specialists.

50. The distribution of committees in the order of subordination is established as follows: Central Committee of the Sea, committees of separate sections (divisions, brigades, detachments, positions, etc.) Ship and Company Committees.

51. Instructions to vessels, detachments, and the fleet on operative and technical questions are issued by corresponding persons of the commanding personnel, on economic and administrative questions by the commanding personnel, together with the committee and on political questions by the committees; whereupon the commander and committees must be notified of all signals and semaphore messages received and sent.

NOTE.—All orders of central organs of the naval administration, as well as the general state, and also ordinances of any committees published for general information are subject to execution in the fleet and flotillas of the Navy only in the event of their confirmation by the Central Committee of the Sea, through instructions published in accordance with No. 20 and the foot note.

Manner of conducting of elections at the present time.—1. All members of the commanding personnel must be reelected.

2. In view of the fact that during the period of the revolutionary movement, a majority of the members of the commanding personnel were in fact appointed with the consent of the crew, the re-election of the existing commanding personnel can be made by the removal of undesirable persons under the authority of Part 6 regarding removals.

3. Persons who are proposed for removal and who are not elected to positions corresponding to their knowledge and practical ability, are at the disposal of the Central Committee of the Sea and are either entered into the reserve of the Central Committee of the Sea, discharged from the service on account of age, or on general rules which will be worked out for the dismissal from the service of members of the commanding personnel, or for the lack of suitable appointments.

4. Persons enrolled in the reserve of the Central Committee of the Sea must be given a salary corresponding to the position for which they are considered a candidate.

5. The salaries of the commanding personnel, according to positions held on an elective basis, remain as heretofore, pending the development of new salaries and establishment of a real status;

6. Every change in the personnel of a fleet, which has adopted the ordinance of the Central Committee of the Sea is to be communicated to the Administration of Personnel for the conducting of corresponding accounts.

7. In fulfilling this ordinance in cases which were not anticipated it is necessary to be guided by local conditions of fleets.

Peoples Commissary for Naval Affairs—Dibenko.

Director of the Naval Ministry—M. Ivanow.

Published in No. 6 of the Gazette of the Temporary Workers and Peasants Government on January 12, 1918.

EXHIBIT 21.

DECREE ON THE DEMOCRATIZATION OF THE FLEET OF THE RUSSIAN REPUBLIC.

SECTION 1. General Position of the Personnel of the Fleet.

(1) The Personnel of the Fleet of the Russian Republic consists of free citizens enjoying equal civil rights.

(2) The hitherto existing titles of rank which emphasized caste distinctions are abolished and all serving in the Fleet are called "Sailors of the War Fleet of the Russian Republic."

(3) From among the Sailors of the Fleet of the Russian Republic is taken the commanding body which consists of the war operations and technical departments who work with elected committees in carrying out the administrative work of the Fleet.

(4) The Department of Politics is entrusted altogether to elected committees. (p. 50.)

EXHIBIT 22.

DECREE ON ASSESSMENT OF SALARIES FOR THE SEAMEN OF THE NAVY RECRUITED ON VOLUNTARY SYSTEM.

Nomenclature of occupations.	Fundamental assessment monthly.	Bonus (additional payment on account of high cost of living).
Ship boys (students) of all specialties.....	180	160
Seamen.....	210	160
Superior seaman, carpenter, machinist helper, cook, baker (bread), musician, sanitarian, ruderer, signalman, distance measurer, mess caterer.....	220	160
Stoker helper.....	225	160
Clerk, superior gunner, galvanizer, electrician, superior signalman, superior distance measurer.....	230	160
Stoker, boatsman.....	235	160
Cook and diver.....	240	160
Mine machinist.....	245	160
Superior stoker, superior bandmaster.....	250	160
Superior mine machinist.....	255	160
Machinist (Komendor), motorman, superior galvanizer, master gunner, superior electrician, and superior clerk.....	260	160
Master skipper for artillery and machines.....	270	160
Superior machinist, superior diver, artilleryman.....	280	160
Feldsher.....	290	160
Motorman superior.....	300	160
Telegraph operator and radio-telegraph operator.....	230	160
Telegraph operator superior and radio telegraph operator superior.....	260	160

(Published in the 23rd issue of Journal of the Workmen and Peasant Government of February 14th (new style).)

EXHIBIT 23.

DECREE SUPPRESSING THE ADMIRALTY-COUNCIL.

The Admiralty-Council is suppressed. All the rights of the Admiralty-Council as the highest organ in the affairs of the Fleet and Navy Department shall pass over to the Marine Section of the Central Executive Committee elected by the All-Russian Congress of the Military fleet. A detailed regulation on the limits of the competency and order of activity of the Marine Section will be published separately.

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaries. V. Oulianoff (Lenin).

People's Commissary ad int. Lieutenant Ilyin (Raskolnikoff).

EXHIBIT 24.

DECREE OF THE SOVIET OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARIES. ORGANIZING A RED FLEET.

The Russian fleet, like the army, has been brought, by the crimes of the Imperial and Bourgeois régimes and by the burden of war to a condition of great disorganization. The transition to the arming of the people which the program of the Socialist party demands, is greatly obstructed by these circumstances. In order to preserve the national property and to oppose the organized forces which are the remnants of the mercenary army of the Capitalists and Bourgeoisie and in order to uphold, in case of necessity, the idea of the Universal Proletariat, it is necessary as a transition measure to have recourse to the organization of the fleet on the basis of the recommendation of the candidates of parties, professions and other collective democratic organizations.

In view of this the Soviet of People's Commissaries proclaims: the fleet which existed on the basis of universal military service under the Imperial laws is declared to be abolished and there is hereby organized a Socialistic Workmen's and Peasants' Red Fleet.

EXHIBIT 25.

DECREE OF THE SOVIET OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARIES ON ASSESSMENT OF SALARIES OF THE GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES AND PERSONS STANDING IN THE GOVERNMENT SERVICE OF THE PORTS AND INSTITUTIONS OF THE ADMIRALTY.

PART II.—A. Schedule of salaries of Government officials and persons in the Government Service of the Admiralty.

Class.	Fundamental salaries per month.	Additional salary per month on acc. of high cost of living.	Total per month.
		Rubles kop.	Rubles kop.
1.....	150	150	300
2.....	160	155	315
3.....	170	160	330
4.....	175	162. 50	337. 50
5.....	185	167. 50	352. 50
6.....	200	175	375
7.....	220	183	403
8.....	225	185	410
9.....	250	195	445
10.....	275	202. 50	477. 50
11.....	285	210	495
12.....	300	217	517
13.....	315	220	535
14.....	325	222. 50	547. 50
15.....	340	225	565
16.....	370	226. 80	596. 80
17.....	380	229. 50	609. 50
18.....	385	230. 30	615. 39
19.....	395	232. 30	627. 30
20.....	405	233. 50	638. 50
21.....	420	236. 30	656. 30
22.....	460	239. 10	699. 10
23.....	480	241. 25	721. 25
24.....	500	243. 10	743. 10
25.....	550	242	796
26.....	590	247. 33	837. 33
27.....	615	247. 33	872. 33
28.....	665	247. 33	912. 33
29.....	685	247. 33	932. 33
30.....	705	247. 33	952. 33
31.....	795	247. 33	1,042. 33
32.....	870	247. 33	1,117. 33

Chairman of the Soviet of People's Commissaries: V. L. Uljanov (Lenin).

People's Commissary for the Navy: Dibenko.

Assistant People's Commissary of Finance: Axelrod.

Secretary of the Soviet of People's Commissaries: N. Gorbunov.

(Published in the 24th number of the Journal of the Workmen and Peasant Government of February 15th (new style).)

EXHIBIT 26.

DECREE OF THE SOVIET OF THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSARS ON ASSESSMENT OF SALARIES OF COMMANDERS AND OTHERS OF THE NAVY RECRUITED ON PRINCIPLES OF VOLUNTARY SERVICE.

Nomenclature of duties on the men of war.	1st class.	2nd class.	3rd class.	Remark.
Captain.....	655	580	505	} With the training of a captain.
1st Assistant to Captain.....	580	505	430
2nd Assistant to Captain.....	530	455
3rd " " ".....	480	} With the training of ship-mechanic.
1st Mechanic.....	635	560	485
2nd " " ".....	560	185
3rd " " ".....	510	} With the training of ship-mechanic.
1st Artilleryman and 1st Miner.....	635	560	485
2nd " " ".....	560	485
3rd " " ".....	510	} With the training of ship-mechanic.
Section Chief (plutong) peleton.....	430	380	330
Brigadier.....	805	720	655
Detachment Flagman Specialist.....	710	635	560

Chief of the Naval General Staff.....	955
Manager of Provisions of the Navy Commissariat.....	955
Chief of the War Department.....	980
Assistant to the Chief of the War Department of the operative and structural Department.....	805
Specialist Flagman of the Chief of the War Department.....	785
Chief of the Communication Service.....	580
District Chief.....	505
Chief of the Central Station.....	430
Chief of the Radi station.....	430

To all on the above chart mentioned salaries is to be added the high cost of living bonus per 160 Rubles.

The foregoing salaries are for a full month.

EXHIBIT 27.

DECREE ABOLISHING PRIVATE OWNERSHIP OF LAND, FARMING IMPLEMENTS, LIVE STOCK AND FARM PRODUCTS, PASSED BY THE CONGRESS OF SOVIETS OF WORKMEN AND SOLDIERS DELEGATES AT THE MEETING OF OCTOBER 25TH, 1917, 2 A. M.

1. All private ownership of land is abolished immediately without any indemnification.

2. All landowners estates, likewise all the lands of the Crown, monasteries, church lands with all their live stock and inventories property, homestead constructions and all appurtenances pass over into the disposition of the volost land committees and district Soviets of Peasants Delegates until the Constituent Assembly meets.

3. Any damage whatever done to the confiscated property belonging from now on to the whole people, is regarded as a grievous crime, punishable by the revolutionary court of justice. The district Soviets of Peasants Delegates shall take all necessary measures for the observance of the strictest order during the confiscation of the landowners' estates, for the determination of the dimensions of the plots of land and which of them are subject to confiscation, for the drawing up of an inventory of the whole confiscated property and for the strictest revolutionary guard of all the farming property on the land with all the constructions, implements, cattle, supplies of products etc., passing over to the people.

4. For guidance during the realisation of the great land reforms till their final resolution by the Constituent Assembly shall serve the following peasant Nakaz (Instruction) drawn up on the basis of 242 local peasant nakazes by the editor's office of the "Izvestia of the All-Russian Soviet of Peasant Delegates" and published in No. 88 of said "Izvestia" (Petrograd, No. 88, August 19th 1917.)

EXHIBIT 28.

DECREE ABOLISHING PRIVATE OWNERSHIP OF LAND, FARMING IMPLEMENTS, LIVE STOCK, FARM PRODUCTS, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES.

The question re the land may be decided only by the general Constituent Assembly.

The most equitable solution of the land question should be as follows:

1. The right of private ownership of the land is abolished for ever; the land can not be sold, nor leased, nor mortgaged, nor alienated in any other way. All the lands; of the State, the Crown, the Cabinet, the monasteries, churches, possession lands, entailed estates, private lands, public and peasant lands, etc., shall be alienated without any indemnification they become the property of the people and the usufructory property of all those who cultivate them (who work them).

For those who will suffer from this revolution of property the right is recognised only to receive public assistance during the time necessary for them to adapt themselves to the new conditions of existence.

2. All the underground depths: the ore, naphtha coal, salt, etc. and also the forests and waters, having a general importance, shall pass over into the exclusive use of the state. All the minor rivers, lakes, forests etc. shall be the usufruct of communities, provided they be under the management of the local organizations of self-government.

3. The plots of land with highest culture: gardens, plantations, nursery gardens, seed-plots, green-houses etc. shall not be divided, but they shall be transformed into model farms, and handed over as the exclusive usufruct of the state or communities, in dependence on their dimensions or importance.

Homestead lands, town and country lands with private gardens and kitchen gardens remain as usufruct of their present owners, the dimensions of such lands and the rate of taxes to be paid for their use shall be established by the laws.

4. Studs, governmental and private cattle-breeding and bird-breeding enterprises etc. become the property of the people and pass over either for the exclusive use of the state, or a community, depending on their dimensions and their importance.

All questions of redeeming same shall be submitted to the examination of the Constituent Assembly.

5. All the agricultural inventoried property of the confiscated lands, the live and dead stock, pass over into the exclusive use of the state or a community depending on their dimensions and importance without any indemnification.

The confiscation of property shall not concern peasants who have a small amount of land.

6. The right to use the land shall belong to all the citizens (without distinction of sex) of the Russian State, who wish to work the land themselves, with the help of their families, or in partnerships and only so long as they are capable of working it themselves. No hired labour is allowed.

In the event of a temporary incapacity of a member of a county community during the course of two years, the community shall be bound to render him assistance during this period of time by cultivating his land.

Agriculturists who in consequence of old age or sickness will have lost the possibility of cultivating their land shall lose the right to use it, and they shall receive instead a pension from the state.

7. The use of the land shall be distributive, i. e. the land shall be distributed among the labourers, in dependence on the local conditions—at the labour or consumption rate.

The way in which the land is to be used may be freely selected: as homestead, or farm, or by communities, or associations, as will be decided in the separate villages and settlements.

8. All the land upon its alienation, is entered in the general popular land fund. The local and central self governing organisations, beginning from the democratically organised village and town communities and ending with the central province institutions shall see to the distribution of the land among the persons desirous of working it.

The land fund is subject to periodical redistributions depending on the increase of the population and the development of the productivity and cultivation.

Through all changes of the limits of the allotments the original kernel of the allotment must remain intact.

The land of any members leaving the community returns to the land fund and the preferential right to receive the allotments of the retiring members belongs to their nearest relations or the persons indicated by them.

The value of the manuring and improvements invested in the land so far as the same will not have been used up when the allotment will be returned to the land fund, must be reimbursed.

If in some place the land fund will prove to be insufficient for the satisfaction of the local population, the surplus of the population must emigrate.

The organization of the emigration, also the costs thereof and of providing the emigrants with the necessary stock must be borne by the state.

The emigration is carried out in the following order: first the peasants without land who express their wish to emigrate, then the depraved members of communities, deserters, etc. and lastly by drawing lots on agreement.

All of what is contained in this nakaz, being the expression of the will of the greatest majority of conscious peasants of the whole of Russia, is pronounced to be a temporary law, which till the Constituent Assembly is to be put into execution as far as possible immediately, and in some parts of it gradually as will be determined by the district soviets of peasant delegates.

The lands of peasants and Cossacks serving in the ranks shall not be confiscated.

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaries Vladimir Oulianoff—Lenin.
October 26 1917

EXHIBIT 29.

DECREE ABOLISHING PRIVATE OWNERSHIP IN CITIES.

On August 20th, 1918, a decree was issued by the Soviet Government, whereby, in cities of more than 10,000 inhabitants all the houses and other buildings, as well as the plots on which they stand ceased to be the property of their former owners and became the property of the Workers Soviet Republic.

This decree does not apply to small towns of less than 10,000 inhabitants, neither does it apply to villages and hamlets.

This decree does not apply to small property owners (less than 10,000 roubles), if they use their houses as dwellings for themselves.

Thus, not alone poor people, but also people of medium means, will not suffer because of this decree.

Those who heretofore subsisted on income from rentals will receive from the Government a subsidy up to 10,000 roubles.

The income on the confiscated property will be used for building dwellings for the poor. One-tenth of the entire income will constitute a State Housing Fund and this fund will be used by the State to build light, airy and roomy dwellings for the toilers.

One third of the income will be expended for public municipal needs, as: lighting, water supply and drainage system, cleaning, etc.

The rest of the income, i. e. more than half, will constitute a local town dwelling fund (reserve). This fund will be used for repairing buildings, erecting new ones, paving streets, etc.

EXHIBIT 30.

LAND LAWS OF THE RUSSIAN FEDERATED SOVIET REPUBLIC.

The following 'Fundamental Law of Socialization of the Land' in Russia went into effect in September, 1918, replacing the earlier and briefer Land Decree of November 7, 1917.

DIVISION I. General Provisions.

ARTICLE 1. All property rights in the land, treasures of the earth, waters, forests, and fundamental natural resources within the boundaries of the Russian Federated Soviet Republic are abolished.

ARTICLE 2. The land passes over to the use of the entire laboring population without any compensation, open or secret, to the former owners.

ARTICLE 3. The right to use the land belongs to those who till it by their own labor, with the exception of special cases covered by this decree.

ARTICLE 4. The right to use the land cannot be limited by sex, religion, nationality, or foreign citizenship.

ARTICLE 5. The sub-surface deposits, the forests, waters, and fundamental natural resources are at the disposition (according to their character) of the county, provincial, regional, and Federal Soviet powers and are under the control of the latter. The method of disposition and utilization of the sub-surface deposits, waters and fundamental natural resources will be dealt with by a special decree.

ARTICLE 6. All private live stock and inventoried property of non-laboring homesteads pass over without indemnification to the disposition of the county, provincial, regional, and Federal Soviets.

ARTICLE 7. All homestead constructions mentioned in Article 6, as well as all agricultural appurtenances, pass over to the disposition (in accordance with their character) of the county, provincial, regional, and Federal Soviets without indemnification.

ARTICLE 8. All persons who are unable to work and who will be deprived of all means of subsistence by force of the decree socializing all lands, forests, inventoried property, etc., may receive a pension (for a lifetime or until the person becomes of age), upon the certification of the local courts and the land departments of the Soviet power, such as a soldier receives, until such time as the decree for the insurance of the incapacitated is issued.

ARTICLE 9. The apportionment of lands of agricultural value among the laboring people is under the jurisdiction of the Volostnoi (several villages), county, provincial, main, and Federal land department of the Soviets in accordance with their character.

ARTICLE 10. The surplus lands are under the supervision, in every republic, of the land departments of the main and Federal Soviets.

ARTICLE 11. The land departments of the local and central Soviets are thus entrusted with the equitable apportionment of the land among the working agricultural population, and with the productive utilization of the natural resources. They also have the following duties:

(a) Creating favorable conditions for the development of the productive forces of the country by increasing the fertility of the land, improving agricultural knowledge among the laboring population.

(b) Creating a surplus fund of lands of agricultural value.

(c) Developing various branches of agricultural industry, such as gardening, cattle-breeding, dairying, etc.

(d) Accelerating the transition from the old unproductive system of field cultivation to the new productive one (under various climates), by a proper distribution of the laboring population in various parts of the country.

(e) Developing collective homesteads in agriculture (in preference to individual homesteads) as the most profitable system of saving labor and material, with a view to passing on to Socialism.

ARTICLE 12. The apportionment of land among the laboring population is to be carried on on the basis of each one's ability to till it and in accordance with local conditions, so that the production and consumption standard may not compel some peasants to work beyond their strength; that at the same time it should give them sufficient means of subsistence.

ARTICLE 13. Personal labor is the general and fundamental source of the right to use the land for agricultural purposes. In addition, the organs of the Soviet power, with a view to raising the agricultural standard (by organizing model farms or experimental fields), are permitted to borrow from the surplus land fund (formerly belonging to the Crown, monasteries, ministers, or land-owners) certain plots and to work them by labor paid by the state. Such labor is subject to the general rules of workmen's control.

ARTICLE 14. All citizens engaged in agricultural work are to be insured at the expense of the state against old age, sickness or injuries which incapacitate them.

ARTICLE 15. All incapacitated agriculturalists and the members of their families who are unable to work are to be cared for by the organs of the Soviet power.

ARTICLE 16. Every agricultural homestead is to be insured against fire, epidemics among cattle, poor crops, dry weather, hail, etc., by means of mutual Soviet insurance.

ARTICLE 17. Surplus profits, obtained on account of the natural fertility of the land or on account of its location near markets, are to be turned over for the benefit of social needs to the organs of the Soviet power.

ARTICLE 18. The trade in agricultural machinery and in seeds is monopolized by the organs of the Soviet power.

ARTICLE 19. The grain trade, internal as well as export, is to be a state monopoly.

DIVISION II.—Who has the right to use the land.

ARTICLE 20. Plots of land may be used in the Russian Federated Soviet Republic for the following social and private needs:

A. Cultural and educational:

1. The state, in the form of the organs of the Soviet power (Federal, regional, provincial, county, and rural).

2. Social organization (under the control and by permission of the local Soviets).

B. For Agricultural Purposes:

3. Agricultural communities.

4. Agricultural associations.

5. Village organizations.

6. Individuals and families.

C. For construction purposes:

7. By the organs of the Soviet power.

8. By social organizations, individuals, and families (if the construction is not a means of obtaining profits).

9. By industrial, commercial, and transportation enterprises (by special permission and under the control of the Soviet power).

D. For constructing ways of communication:

10. By organs of the Soviet power (Federal, regional, provincial, county, and rural, according to the importance of the ways of communication).

DIVISION III.—The order in which land is apportioned.

ARTICLE 21. Land is given to those who wish to work it themselves for the benefit of the community and not for personal advantage.

ARTICLE 22. The following is the order in which the land is given for personal agricultural needs:

1. To locate agriculturists who have no land or a small amount of land, and to local agricultural workers (formerly hired), on an equal basis.

2. Agricultural emigrants who have come to a given locality after the issuance of the decree of socialization of the land.

3. Non-agricultural elements in the order of their registration at the land departments of the local Soviets.

NOTE.—When arranging the order of the apportionment of land, preference is given to laboring agricultural associations over individual homesteads.

ARTICLE 23. For the purpose of gardening, fishing, cattle-breeding, or forestry, land is given on the following basis:

(1) Land which cannot be tilled; (2) land which can be tilled, but which on account of its location is preferably to be used for other agricultural purposes.

ARTICLE 24. In rural districts, land is used for construction purposes in accordance with the decision of the local Soviets and the population.

In cities, land may be obtained in the order in which applications are filed with the respective local Soviets, if the construction planned does not threaten to harm the neighboring buildings and if it answers all other requirements of the building regulations.

NOTE.—For the purpose of erecting social buildings, land is given regardless of the order in which applications are filed.

DIVISION IV.—The Standard of Agricultural Production and Consumption.

ARTICLE 25. The amount of land given to the individual homesteads for agricultural purposes, with a view to obtaining means of subsistence, must not exceed the standard of agricultural production and consumption as determined on the basis indicated in the instruction given below.

INSTRUCTION FOR DETERMINING THE PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION STANDARD FOR USE OF LAND OF AGRICULTURAL VALUE.

1. The whole of agricultural Russia is divided into as many climatic sections as there are field cultivation systems historically in existence at the given agricultural period.

2. For every agricultural section a special production and consumption standard is set. Within the section the standard may be changed in accordance with the climate and the natural fertility of the land, also in accordance with its location (near a market or railway) and other conditions which are of great local importance.

3. For an exact determination of the standard of each section, it is necessary to take an all-Russian agricultural census in the near future.

NOTE.—After the socialization of the land has been accomplished, it is necessary to survey it immediately and to determine its topography.

4. The apportionment of land on the production and consumption basis among the agricultural population is to be carried on gradually in various agricultural sections, according to regulations stated herein.

NOTE.—Until the socialization of land is entirely accomplished, the relations of agriculturists will be regulated by the land departments of the Soviets in accordance with a special instruction.

5. For the determination of the production and consumption standard of a given climatic section, it is necessary to take the standard (an average agricultural homestead) of one of the counties of that section (or another agricultural standard of equal size) with a small population, and with such a proportion of various agricultural advantages, as, in the opinion of the local inhabitants (regional or provincial congress of the land departments of the Soviets) will be recognized as the most normal, i. e., the most favorable for the type of field cultivation which predominates in that climatic section.

6. For the determination of what an average agricultural homestead is, it is necessary to take into consideration only those lands which were actually in the possession of working peasants down to 1917, i. e., lands bought by peasant organizations, associations, individuals, and entailed and rented lands.

7. Forest, sub-surface deposits, and waters are not to be considered in this determination.

8. Private lands which were never used for agricultural purposes and which were actually in the possession of the state, private banks, monasteries, or land owners, will not be taken into consideration in this determination, as they will constitute the surplus land fund which will serve to supply the landless peasants and those who have less land than the peasants' production and consumption standard calls for.

9. For determining the entire amount of land, which was in actual possession of the working peasants down to the revolution of 1917, it is necessary to determine its quantity according to its special character (field, pasture, meadow, drainage, gardens, orchards, estates).

10. This determination must be made in exact figures as well as in the proportion of the entire quantity to each individual homestead, settlement, village, county, province, or region, or the entire climatic section of the given system of field cultivation.

11. When thus determining the entire quantity of land, it is necessary to determine the quality of each acre of a typical field or meadow by ascertaining the amount (in poods) of grain or hay yielded by an acre of land of the given section for the past ten years.

12. When determining the quantity and quality of land, it is necessary to determine at the same time the entire population of the given climatic section engaged in agriculture, and also that part of the population which subsists at the expense of agriculture.

13. The census of the inhabitants engaged in agricultural work is to be taken by sex, age, and family for each homestead separately, and later the information obtained is to be classified by villages, counties, and provinces of the given section.

14. When taking the census of the population it is necessary to determine the number of workmen and members dependent on them, and for that purpose the entire population is divided into the following classes according to ages:

Those unable to work.

Girls, to 12 years of age.

Boys, to 12 years of age.

Men, from 60 years of age.

Women, from 50 years of age.

Those incapacitated by physical or mental illness are recorded separately.

Those able to work.

Men, from 18 to 60, 1.0 unit of working strength.

Women, from 18 to 50, 0.8 unit of working strength.

Boys, from 12 to 16, 0.5 unit of working strength.

Girls, from 12 to 16, 0.5 unit of working strength.

Boys, from 16 to 18, 0.75 unit of working strength.

Girls, from 16 to 18, 0.6 unit of working strength.

NOTE.—These figures may be changed in accordance with climatic and customary conditions by decision of the appropriate organs of the Soviet power.

15. By dividing the number of acres by the number of working units, the number of acres to each unit may be obtained.

16. The number of incapacitated members to each working unit may be obtained by dividing the entire incapacitated element by the total of working units.

17. It is also necessary to describe and figure out the number of work animals and cattle that can be fed on one acre of land and with one working unit in a county, it is necessary to ascertain the average acre in quality and fertility. This average is the sum of crops from various soils divided by the number of the soil categories (paragraph 9).

19. The average obtained as above is to serve as a basis for determining the production and consumption standard by which all the homesteads will be equalized from the surplus land fund.

NOTE.—In case the average, as indicated above, obtained after preliminary calculations, proves insufficient for existence (see Division 1, Article 12), it may be increased from the surplus land fund.

20. For determining the amount of land needed for additional distribution among peasants, it is necessary to multiply the number of acres of land to each working unit in a county by the sum of agricultural working units of the given climatic section, and to subtract from the product the amount of land which the working population have on hand.

21. Further, upon ascertaining the number of acres of land (in figures and percentage according to character) which the surplus land fund has, and comparing this figure with the quantity of land necessary for additional distribution among peasants who have not sufficient land, the following is to be determined: is it possible to confine the emigration within the boundaries of the given climatic section? If so, it is necessary to determine the size of the surplus land fund and its capacity. If it is not possible to confine it within the given climatic section, ascertain how many families will have to emigrate to another section.

NOTE.—The main land departments of the Soviet power must be informed of the quantity of surplus land, as well as of a lack of the same; and the location, amount, and kind of unoccupied lands must be indicated.

22. When additional distribution takes place, it is necessary to know the exact amount and quality of land which the peasants have, the number of cattle, on hand, the number of members of the families, etc.

23. When additional distribution takes place in accordance with the production and consumption standard, this standard must be raised in the following cases:

(1) When the working strength of a family is overtaxed by the number of incapacitated members; (2) when the land which the family has on hand is not sufficiently fertile; (3) in accordance with the quality of such land of the surplus fund as is given to the peasant (the same applies to meadows).

25. When an additional apportionment of land takes place and the given district lacks certain advantages, the peasant gets a certain amount of land possessing other advantages.

DIVISION V. Standard for the Utilization of Land for Construction, Agricultural, and Educational Purposes, etc.

ARTICLE 26. When land is apportioned for educational and industrial purposes and also for the erection of dwellings, for cattle breeding, and other agricultural needs (with the exception of field cultivation), the quantity of land to be apportioned shall be determined by the local Soviets in accordance with the needs of the individuals or organizations which ask permission to use the land.

DIVISION VI.

ARTICLE 27. In case the surplus land fund in the given section proves to be insufficient for additional distribution among peasants, the surplus of the population may be transferred to another section where there is sufficient surplus land.

ARTICLE 28. Transfer from one section to another is to take place only after the peasants of the latter section are all distributed.

ARTICLE 29. The emigration from one section to another, as well as the distribution of the inhabitants within the section, must be carried on as follows: at first those who are furthest away from the surplus land fund are to emigrate, so that:

(a) the land of the surplus fund is used first of all by the peasants of that village or hamlet in the vicinity of which the surplus land fund lies.

NOTE.—If there are several such villages, preference is given to those that tilled the land before.

(b) the second place is given to the peasants of the Volost within the boundaries of which the surplus land lies.

(c) the third place is given to the peasants of the county within the boundaries of which the surplus lands lie.

(d) finally, if the given system of field cultivation covers several provinces, the peasants of the provinces within the boundaries of which the surplus land lies receive additional land.

ARTICLE 30. The emigration accordingly runs in the following order: (a) volunteers are the first to emigrate; (b) second, those organizations which suffer most from lack of land, (c) agricultural associations, communities, large families, and small families which have small amounts of land.

ARTICLE 31. The apportionment of land among agriculturists who have to emigrate is to be carried on as follows: in the first place, small families suffering from lack of land; second, large families suffering from lack of land; third, families suffering from lack of land; fourth, agricultural associations, and, finally communities.

ARTICLE 32. The transfer of peasants from one section to another is to be done with consideration, so that the new places shall give the peasant a chance to cultivate land successfully and the climatic conditions shall be analogous to those of his previous domicile. In that case it is necessary to take into consideration the customs and nationality of the emigrants.

ARTICLE 33. The cost of transferring peasants to new places is to be provided by the state.

ARTICLE 34. In connection with the transfer, the state is to help the peasants in the building of homes, roads, drains, and wells, in obtaining agricultural machinery and artificial fertilizers, by creating artificial water systems (when necessary) and by erecting educational centres.

NOTE.—For the purpose of expediting the establishment of agricultural work on a socialistic basis, the state offers to extend to the emigrants every aid necessary for a systematic and scientific management of collective homesteads.

DIVISION VII. Form of Utilization of Land.

ARTICLE 35. The Russian Federated Soviet Republic, for the purpose of attaining Socialism, offers to extend aid (cultural and material) to the general tilling of land, giving preference to the communistic and cooperative homesteads over individual ones.

ARTICLE 36. Lands of cooperative and individual homesteads must, if possible, be in the same location.

DIVISION VIII. Obtaining Rights to the Use of Land.

ARTICLE 37. Land may be obtained:

- (a) For educational purposes.
 1. Social usefulness.
- (b) For agricultural purposes:
 1. Personal labor.
- (c) For building purposes.
 1. Social buildings.
 2. Dwellings.
 3. The necessity of conducting a working homestead.
- (d) For the purpose of constructing ways of communication.
 1. Public necessity.

DIVISION IX. The Order in Which the Right to Use the Land May be Obtained.

ARTICLE 38. An application must be filed with the land department of the Soviet power in whose jurisdiction the desired land lies.

ARTICLE 39. The application shows the order in which the permission to use the land is granted. The permission is granted on the basis of the general provisions of this decree.

NOTE.—The application should contain the following information, in addition to the full name and address of the person who desires to use the land: former occupation, the purpose for which land is desired, the inventory on hand, the location of the desired plot and its size.

NOTE.—If the land department of the Volostnoi Soviet refuses to grant the permission to use land, the question may be brought (within one week) to the notice of the department of the county Soviet; if the county Soviet refuses, it may be presented to the land department of the provincial Soviet within two weeks.

NOTE.—The right to use land (sub-surface deposits, waters, forests, and fundamental natural resources) cannot be obtained under any circumstances through purchase, rental, inheritance, or any other private transaction.

DIVISION X.

ARTICLE 40. The right to use the land becomes effective in the following order.

ARTICLE 41. The right to use land for construction purposes becomes effective upon actual occupation of the plot or upon preparations for its occupation but not later than three months after the receipt of permission from the local Soviet.

NOTE.—By actual preparations is meant the delivery of building materials to the place of destination or the closing of a contract with workers.

ARTICLE 42. The right to use lands for agricultural purposes (on the basis of personal labor) becomes effective upon beginning the work at the opening of the next agricultural season.

ARTICLE 43. The right to use the land for field cultivation becomes effective upon the actual beginning of field work (without hired help) at the opening of the agricultural season next after the receipt of a permit from the local Soviet.

NOTE.—Buildings may be erected on plots of land that may be tilled only by special permission of the land department of the Soviet Government.

ARTICLE 44. In case of actual inability to use the plot in the period of time allowed by the land department, the latter may extend this period if there is valid cause, i. e., the illness of the working hands, trouble brought about by epidemics, etc.

DIVISION XI. Transfer of Right to Use Given Plots of Land.

ARTICLE 45. The right to use the land is not transferable.

ARTICLE 46. The right to use land may be obtained by anyone on the basis of this decree, and it cannot be transferred from one person to another.

DIVISION XII. Temporary Cancellation of the Right to Use the Land.

ARTICLE 47. Any land-borrower's right to use the plot of land may be stopped for a certain length of time, without cancelling it entirely.

ARTICLE 48. Any land-borrower may cease utilizing the land at a certain time and still have the right to (a) if natural calamities (floods, etc.) deprive him of the possibility; (b) if the agriculturist is temporarily ill; (c) if the agriculturist is called to do some government duty; or for other cause valid from the social point of view. He may hold it until such time as conditions are favorable for the utilization of his plot.

NOTE.—The period of such temporary cessation is to be determined in each case by the land department of the local Soviet.

ARTICLE 49. Upon every temporary cessation of the use of the land (as indicated in Article 48), the local Soviet either organizes community help to the agriculturist or calls upon the workers, paid by the state and subject to the general regulations of workers' control, to do the work of the afflicted agriculturist (temporary incapacity, death, etc.) so as to save his property and proceed with production.

DIVISION XIII. Cessation of the Right to Use the Land.

ARTICLE 50. The right to use the land may cease for an entire agricultural unit, or for individual members of the same.

ARTICLE 51. The right of the given individual to use the land may cease for the whole plot or for a part of it.

ARTICLE 52. The right is cancelled (a) if the organization, or the purpose for which it had taken land, is declared void; (b) if units, associations, communities, etc., disintegrate; (c) if the individual finds it impossible to cultivate the field or do other agricultural work, and if at the same time the individual has other means of subsistence (for instance, a pension paid to the incapacitated); (d) upon the death of the individual, or when his civil rights are cancelled by the court.

ARTICLE 53. The right to use a plot of land ceases:

- (a) in case of a formal refusal to use the plot;
- (b) in case of obvious unwillingness to use the plot, although no formal refusal has been filed;
- (c) in case the land is used for illegal purposes (e. g., throwing garbage);
- (d) in case the land is exploited by illegal means (e. g., hiring land secretly);
- (e) in case the use of the land by a given individual bring injury to his neighbor (e. g., manufacture of chemicals).

NOTE.—The land-borrower, upon cessation of his right to the use of the land, has the right to demand from the respective land departments of the Soviets a fee for the unused improvements and labor invested in the land, if the given plot did not bring him sufficient profit.

Chairman of the All-Russian Central Executive Committee: Sverdloff.

Members of the Executive Body: Spiridonova, Mourqnoff, Zinoveiff, Oustinoff, Kamkoff, Lander, Skouloff, Colodarsky, Peterson, Natanson-Bobroff.

Secretaries of the Central Executive Committees: Avanessoff, Smoliansky.

Chairman of the Soviet of People's Commissaries: V. Oulianoff (Lenin).

People's Commissar of Agriculture: A. Kolegueff.

EXHIBIT 31.

DECREE ON HARVESTING AND REQUISITIONING DETACHMENTS.

1. It is entrusted to all Provincial and district Soviets of Workmen's and Peasants' Deputies, to all village Committees of Poverty, to all trade organs of the People's Commissariates of Food Supply and Agriculture immediately to set about to organize harvesting and requisitioning detachments; to use for the purpose of harvesting the new crops detachments of workmen and peasants of the provinces suffering from famine, who have been sent to requisition grain and to proceed immediately to organize for these purposes new detachments from local peasants and workmen.

2. The duties of these detachments shall be: (1) harvesting the crops on the fields of former landlord estates, (2) harvesting the crops in localities near the zone of fighting, (3) harvesting the crops on the fields of well-known peasant speculators and rich peasants, (4) assisting in the timely harvesting of all grain in general and the storing of all surplus grain in the state store houses.

3. All grain collected by the harvesting and requisitioning detachments is to be distributed as follows: first, is divided out the amount absolutely necessary to satisfy the needs of the poorest elements of the local village population; this portion of grain is not to be exported but remains on the spot; all the remaining grain is to be turned over immediately and unconditionally to the collecting points: the distribution of this grain is controlled by the provincial Food Supply Committee under the direction of the People's Commissariat of Food Supply.

4. If the members of the harvesting and requisitioning detachment are not paid on the basis of former decrees, as for example the decree on the preserving for volunteer workmen sent to the front or to food supply detachments, all their places in the factories and of their average earnings (collection of laws 630), they are rewarded first by food supplies, second by payments in money fixed according to local conditions and third by special premiums for the successful and rapid completion of harvesting and collecting. The amount of wages and premiums is fixed by the provincial Food Supply Committees under instructions of People's Commissariat of Food Supply.

Signed: President of Council of People's Commissaries, V. Ulianov (Lenin).

Executive Secretary of the Council, V. L. Bonch-Bruevitch.

EXHIBIT 32.

DECREE ON SEQUESTRATION OF ALL VACANT PREMISES SUITABLE FOR DWELLING PURPOSES.

1. The municipal self-governments are entitled to sequester all vacant premises suitable for dwelling purposes.
 2. The municipal self-Governments are entitled to settle in the vacant dwelling premises on the basis of the rules and standards approved by them such citizens who are in need of dwelling places or who inhabit overcrowded or insanitary lodgings.
 3. The municipal self governments are entitled to form a Dwelling Inspection and to establish its sphere of activity and organization.
 4. The municipal self-governments are entitled to publish obligatory regulations for the formation of house committees, establishing their organizations, sphere of activity and according to them the rights of a juridical body.
 5. The municipal self-governments may institute dwelling tribunals and establish their sphere of action, organization and rights.
 6. The present regulations shall be promulgated by telegraph.
- People's Commissary for the Interior A. I. Rykoff.
Petrograd, October 28th, 1917.

EXHIBIT 33.

ORDINANCE OF THE COMMISSARIAT OF AGRICULTURE.

Regarding the Organization of the Central Geodetical Technical Department.
II. The Department consists of the following primordial office personnel:

Denomination of duties.	Total of offices.	Salary per year to each office holder.
Department Manager.....	1	12,000 Rubels.
Assistant Department Manager.....	1	10,000 "
Department Inspector.....	5	8,000 "
Instructor.....	3	7,000 "
Secretary.....	5	to 6,000 "
Assistant Secretary.....	5	" 5,000 "
Office Servant.....	5	" 4,000 "
Copyist.....	4	" 5,000 "
Messenger.....	2	" 3,000 "

REMARK 2.—The Department employes as also persons who are temporarily engaged for work are paid all their actual traveling and provisioning expenses.

X. The foregoing ordinance takes effect with January 1st, 1918.

National Commissary of Agriculture, L. Kolegajev.

Secretary of the Collegium for Agriculture, B. Levin.

Published in the 22nd issue of the Journal of the Temporary Workmen and Peasant Government, of January 30th, 1918.

EXHIBIT 34.

ORDINANCE ON SUPPLY OF AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

To factory and mill committees and representatives of manufacturing enter-

The Supreme Board of National Economy has now undertaken the organization of the entire business of supplying the agricultural population with agricultural machinery and implements. In order that all this work may be carried out successfully, it is necessary that the Supreme Board of National Economy should have at its disposal exact information about all those establishments which at this moment have already changed or are ready to change to the production of agricultural machinery. Only with all this information at hand will it be possible to organize systematically this branch of national economy, which is most important for the Russian Republic, and to avoid in the future those ills which may be caused by an unorganized change from war production to piece work. Moreover, all the information is necessary for the apportionment of orders for agricultural machines and implements, which the Supreme Board of National Economy will soon place.

In view of what has been said, we urgently request all factory and mill committees and manufacturers, or their organizations, to furnish in writing the most complete information about their establishments which have to do with the manufacture of agricultural machinery, indicating the number of workmen, the machine equipment, and the possible minimum production per month, together with a statement of the machines and implements (type and patent), necessary in rural economy, for which they can take orders.

In view of the exceptional importance of the matter of supplying our rural economy, we respectfully request the provincial papers to reprint this appeal. (Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 35.

DECREE ON GRAIN CONTROL.

The disastrous undermining of the country's food supply, the serious heritage of the four years' war, continues to extend more and more, and to be more and more acute. While the consuming provincial Governments are starving, in the producing Governments there are at the present moment, as before, large reserves of grain of the harvests of 1916 and 1917 not yet even threshed. This grain is in the hands of tight-fisted village dealers and profiteers, of the village bourgeoisie. Well fed and well provided for, having accumulated enormous sums of money obtained during the years of war, the village bourgeoisie remains stubbornly deaf and indifferent to the wailings of starving workmen and peasant poverty, and does not bring the grain to the collecting points. The grain is held with the hope of compelling the Government to raise repeatedly the prices of grain, at the same time that the holders sell their grain at home at fabulous prices to grain speculators.

An end must be put to this obstinacy of the greedy village grain-profiters. The food experience of former years showed that the breaking of fixed prices and the denial of grain monopoly, while lessening the possibility of feasting for our group of capitalists, would make bread completely inaccessible to our many millions of workmen and would subject them to inevitable death from starvation.

The answer to the violence of grain-owners towards the starving poor must be violence towards the bourgeoisie.

Not a pood [40 lbs. Russian] should remain in the hands of those holding the grain, except the quantity needed for sowing the fields and provisioning their families until the new harvest.

This policy must be put into force at once, especially since the German occupation of the Ukraine compels us to get along with grain resources which will hardly suffice for sowing and curtailed use.

Having considered the situation thus created, and taking into account that only with the most rigid calculation and equal distribution of all grain reserves can Russia pass through the food crisis, the Central Executive Committee of all Russia has decreed:

1. Confirming the fixity of the grain monopoly and fixed prices, and also the necessity of a merciless struggle with grain speculators, to compel each grain owner to declare the surplus above what is needed to sow the fields and for personal use, according to established normal quantities, until the new harvest, and to surrender the same within a week after the publication of this decision in each village. The order of these declarations is to be determined by the People's Food Commissioner through the local food organizations.

2. To call upon workmen and poor peasants to unite at once for a merciless struggle with grain-hoarders.

3. To declare all those who have a surplus of grain and who do not bring it to the collecting points, and likewise those who waste grain reserves on illicit distillation of alcohol and do not bring them to the collecting points, enemies of the people; to turn them over to the Revolutionary Tribunal, imprison them for not less than ten years, confiscate their entire property, and drive them out forever from the communes; while the distillers are, besides, to be condemned to compulsory communal work.

In case an excess of grain which was not declared for surrender, in compliance with Article 1, is found in the possession of anyone, the grain is to be taken away from him without pay, while the sum, according to fixed prices, due for the undeclared surpluses is to be paid, one-half to the person who points out the concealed surpluses, after they have been placed at the collecting points, and the other half to the village commune. Declarations concerning the concealed surpluses are made by the local food organizations.

Further, taking into consideration that the struggle with the food crisis demands the application of quick and decisive measures, that the more fruitful realization of these measures demands in its turn the centralization of all orders dealing with the food question in one organization, and that this organization appears to be the People's Food Commissioner, the Central Executive Committee of all Russia hereby orders, for the more successful struggle with the food crisis, that the People's Food Commissioner be given the following powers:

1. To publish obligatory regulations regarding the food situation, exceeding the usual limits of the People's Food Commissioner's competence.

2. To abrogate the orders of local food bodies and other organization contravening the plans and actions of the People's Commissioner.

3. To demand from institutions and organizations of all departments the carrying out of the regulations of the People's Food Commissioner in connection with the food situation without evasions and at once.

4. To use the armed forces in case resistance is shown to the removal of food grains or other food products.

5. To dissolve or reorganize the food agencies in places where they might resist the orders of the People's Commissioner.

6. To discharge, transfer, turn over to the Revolutionary Tribunal, or subject to arrest officials and employees of all departments and public organizations in case of interference with the orders of the People's Commissioner.

7. To transfer the present powers, in addition to the right to subject to arrest, above, to other persons and institutions in various places, with the approval of the Council of the People's Commissioners.

8. All understandings of the People's Commissioner, related in character to the Department of Ways of Communication and the Supreme Council of National Economy, are to be carried through upon consultation with the corresponding departments.

9. The regulations and orders of the People's Commissioner, issued in accordance with the present powers, are verified by his college, which has the right, without suspending their operation, of referring them to the Council of Public Commissioners.

10. The present decree becomes effective from the date of its signature and is to be put into operation by telegraph.

Published May 14, 1918.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 36.

ORDINANCE OF THE COMMISSARIAT OF COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY REGARDING THE MEASURES OF THE IMPORT AND EXPORT OF GOODS.

About the measures of Import and Export of goods.

The Soviet of National Commissaries decrees:

- (1) Until the final Organization of the Sub-Department of International and Economic Policy at the Supreme Soviet of National Economics, the permits for the export and import of goods, from the territory, respectively in the territory of Russia, are exclusively given under the authority of the Department of Foreign Commerce of the Commissariat of Commerce and Industry.

The Export and Import of goods without such permits is regarded as contraband and will be punished with all severity according to the laws of the Republic.

- (2) Order is given herewith to all custom's officials and Institutions on all frontiers under penalty of capital punishment not to allow the Export over the frontier, or, the import from the other side, of goods without the presentation of such permits.

(3) The foregoing decree will become effective with the 1st of January, 1918, and all permits for the export and import, released after December 31st 1917 by any other Institution than the Department of Foreign Commerce of the Commissariat of Commerce and Industry, mentioned above under paragraph one, will be regarded as null and void.

(4) The foregoing ordinance is made effective telegraphically.

Chairman of the Soviets of National Commissaries: Ulyanoff (Lenin).

National Commissaries: Steinberg, Stalin, Shlyepnikoff, (Podvoyski) Obo-lensk.

Commissary of Military Affairs: Podvoyski.

Temporary Administrator: Vl. Bonch-Bruavich.

Soviet Secretary: Gorbunoff.

December 29th, 1917.

(Published in the 1st issue of the Journal of the Temporary Workers and Peasant Government, of January 3rd 1918.)

EXHIBIT 37.

DECREE ON THE NATIONALIZATION OF FOREIGN TRADE.

I. All foreign trade is nationalized. Trade arrangements on the buying and selling of every kind of produce (of the mining and cultivating industry, agriculture, etc.) with foreign states and individual trade enterprises, abroad, will be made in the name of the Russian Republic by organs specially authorized for that purpose; other than through these organs, all trade arrangements with foreign countries for import and export are prohibited. Note: Rules for import and export of postal packets and passengers effects will be issued separately.

II. The organ administering the foreign trade will be the Peoples Commissariat of Trade and Industry.

III. For the organization of import and export there is instituted in the Peoples Commissariat for Trade and Industry, a Soviet of Foreign Trade. The Soviet is composed of representatives of the following administrations, institutions and organizations; (a) Military, Naval, Agriculture, Supply, Roads of Communications, Foreign Affairs and Finances, Administrations; (b) representatives of the Central Organs of regulating and managing separate brands of production, such as Centro-tea, Centro-sugar, Centro-textile, etc. and representatives of all sections of the Supreme soviet of Peoples' Economy; (c) Central organizations of cooperatives; (d) Central representations of Trade-Industrial and Agricultural organizations; (e) Central organs of Professional Unions and Trade-Industrial Employees; (f) Central Organs of Trade-Enterprises for Importation and Exportation of principal products. Note: The right is reserved to the People's Commissariat of Labor and Industry to bring representatives not named herein into the personnel of the Soviet of Foreign Trade.

IV. The Soviet of Foreign Trade conducts a plan of exchange of wares with foreign lands, worked out by the People's Commissariat for Trade and Industry, and affirmed by the Soviet for People's Economy.

Among the problems of the Soviet of Foreign Trade are: (1) Balancing of the supply and demand of exported and imported products; (2) Organization of storage and purchase, through the proper centers of separate industries (supre-sugar, supreoil, etc.) and in their absence, through the medium of co-operative, private agencies and Trade firms; (3) Organization of purchases abroad; through State Purchasing Commission and Agents, cooperative organizations and trade firms; (4) Fixing of prices on imported and exported wares.

V. (1) The Soviet for Foreign Trade is divided into sections, according to branches of production and of the most important exported and imported wares, and the Presidents of these sections are the representatives of the People's Commissariat for Trade and Industry.

(2) The President of the General Assembly of members of the Soviet of Foreign Trade and its Presidium, elected by the General Assembly, is the representative of the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry. Note: The internal organization of the Soviet for Foreign Trade, number of sections their problems, rights and sphere of activities, will be worked out separately.

(3) All decisions of the sections are submitted to the Presidium for the approval of the People's Commissariat for Trade and Industry.

VI. This decree is in effect from the date of its publication.

President of the Soviet of Peoples Commissaries. V. C. Uliyanov (Lenin).

Bronskiy, Stalin, Tchicherin.

Manager of Affairs of the Soviet of Peoples Commissaries.

BONCH BRUEVICH

SECRETARY N. GORBUNOV

Moscow, April 22, 1918.

EXHIBIT 38.

DECREE ON LOCAL SECTIONS OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARIAT OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY.

1. In order to coordinate local efforts in organizing and regulating trade and industrial activities of the districts in conformity with general and local interests, for executive functions and functions of control under general directions from the center, there are organized for Provincial (or Regional) Soviets of Workmen's and Peasants' Deputies Provincial (or Regional) Sections of the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry.

2. The Provincial (or Regional) Sections of the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry are guided in their activities by instructions from the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry.

3. For the Provincial (or Regional) Section of the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry is organized a Soviet, of two representatives each, from the following organizations: from the Provincial (or Regional) Soviet of Workmen's and Peasants' Deputies, from the Trade Union of Employees of Trade and Industry, from the Union of Cooperative Organizations, from the local food supply organ, and one each from the Provincial (or Regional) Soviet of National Economy and from the Association of Industrial Enterprises. The President of the Soviet is the Director of the Provincial (or Regional) Section of the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry, elected by the Provincial (or Regional) Soviet and confirmed by the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry.

4. The main tasks of the Local Section of the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry, within its district:

(a) Carry out measures adopted by the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry, within its district:

(b) Control trade and industrial enterprises of the district according to general instructions from the center:

(c) Coordinate and direct the trade and industrial activity of all local organizations, and of all technical apparatus of trade control of a given locality, and regulate their interrelationship.

(d) Prepare and elaborate detailed instructions for their own executive organs.

(e) Study the conditions of the markets of the district and the conditions of trade, collect and work up statistical information on the conditions of the market.

(f) Make special investigations and inquiries in special fields of trade and industry, and carry out any special instructions from the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry.

5. The Provincial (or Regional) Section for the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry presents to the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry monthly reports on its activity.

6. The acts and orders of the Provincial (or Regional) Section of the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry may be suspended by the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry.

7. Urban and District Trade Inspectors are established as the executive organ and technical apparatus of the Provincial (or Regional) Sections of the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry. The right to issue general instructions to the local organizations of the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry, and the organizing of the Trade Inspectors is reserved to the People's Commissariat of Trade and Industry.

Signed: President of the Council of People's Commissariat—V. Uliyanov (Lenin)

Executive Secretary of Council of People's Commissariat—V. Bonch-Bruevich (Collection of Laws and Orders)

EXHIBIT 39.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE FIRST ALL-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF THE COUNCILS OF NATIONAL ECONOMY ON THE 26TH OF MAY 1918.

I. The economic consequences of the Brest-Litovsk peace.

1. The Brest-Litovsk peace, by tearing away from Russia the industrial districts of Poland, the Baltic provinces, the Donetz basin and the most fertile regions of Ukraine, has decreased the productive forces of Russia's economic life and has made very difficult the work of healing the wounds inflicted by the war, which work can be carried on systematically and in harmony with the interests of the masses of the people only on the basis of a Socialistic organization of production.

Having imposed on Russia a burden of financial obligations amounting to many billions, the Brest-Litovsk peace is making of Russia at the time of her difficult economic crisis, a tributary to foreign capital, at least temporarily.

2. The Brest-Litovsk treaty with its economic consequences does not correspond to the economic interests of the masses of the people of Russia nor to the interests of the masses of the people in the occupied territories. The industry of Poland and of the Baltic provinces and the industry of the Donetz basin is bound by strong ties to the economic life of Russia and is not in a position to compete with the technically more developed German industry on the German and Austrian market. Separated from Russia by tariff boundaries the industry and the commerce of the Baltic provinces is doomed to a slow extinction. The Donetz basin and the industry of Ukraine, already in view of their geographical position, are dependent on the Russian North. The Ukrainian bread stuffs, at present so much desired by Germany and Austria, will be excluded from those countries after the war by a wall of custom duties, levied in the interests of the Hungarian and Prussian land owners. All this will call into life, in the districts torn away from Russia, a tendency toward a close economic union with the Russian economic organism.

Territories until present time kept by coercion within the boundaries of the Russian Empire will seek economic relations with Russia on the basis of common interests.

3. Thus we shall have to contend with the severe economic consequences of the Brest-Litovsk peace in the first place during the transition period, while the general international consequences of the imperialistic war have not yet found their expression,—while Russia, conquered in the imperialistic war, can not yet get aid from the proletariat of the other countries and has just started the work of reconstructing her shattered economic organism.

Compelled to fulfill the conditions of the Brest-Litovsk peace the Soviet Russia has in her social legislation the best means whereby to paralyze the pernicious consequences of the Brest-Litovsk peace. The development of the productive forces of the Altai and Ural regions will give Russia iron and coal. The nationalization of various branches of industry, sufficiently centralized by the former processes of development, will increase the productivity of the decreased number of our factories.

The nationalization of the foreign trade will offer a possibility of prohibiting the import of socially nonessential commodities as it also will make possible systematically to utilize the surplus of raw materials in order gradually to honor our obligations. By attracting foreign capital to be employed in the development of the natural resources of Russia, and in the creation of new branches of industry under the strictest state control and with the direct co-operation of the State, we shall be able not only to overcome the economic consequences of the Brest-Litovsk treaty until the time comes when they will be eliminated by the social development, but also, by strengthening of the productive forces of Russia, we shall help to overcome the economic disorder, and to strengthen the Soviet regime as a power aiming at the Socialistic reorganization of Russia.

II. The economic situation and the economic policy.

1. The overthrow of the rule of the bourgeois-agrarian class and the transition of the power into the hands of the proletariat is the basis of our economic policy, the aim of which at the present time is to strengthen the Socialistic social order in Russia and to defend it in the struggle against the attacks of international imperialism. The methods whereby the transformation of Russia into a

Socialistic society is being accomplished are determined by the bitter struggle which we are compelled to wage against the bourgeoisie in Russia and outside of Russia.

2. The conditions of the economic development of Russia are determined on the one hand by the change of her boundaries due to the Brest-Litovsk peace treaty, on the other hand by the change in the character of her production.

3. The separation of Ukraine and of Poland is to be considered as the most important consequence of the Brest treaty. It changes radically the development of industry in the remaining regions of Russia. Owing to the above mentioned separation the Russian industry loses a considerable part of its fuel (up to 70% of the entire coal production). As a result of this a shifting of the main centers of our industry in the area of coal and ore production to Ural and Siberia, and a stronger development of the productive forces in these districts is inevitable.

4. Owing to the fact that the production for necessities of war now can be turned into production for the needs of the population of the country, the economic situation, despite the terrible drain on our finances, the disorganization of transportation, the decline of the production, etc. will inevitably improve. The presence of a decrease of production, i. e. the closing of factories and plants, and the growth of unemployment is due mainly to the difficulties of transition from war to peace production, and from capitalism to the Socialist system. Such a situation will be replaced by a growth of production as the new order grows stronger.

5. The present economic situation after seven months' rule of the Soviet power necessitates a further application of economic measures, which have proved useful during that time and which brought about the liquidation of the rule of landed gentry in the villages and to the removal of the bourgeoisie from the control of the economic life of the country.

6. In the domain of the organization of production the completion and application of the nationalization of various enterprises (of which 304 have been nationalized and confiscated) is necessary, as well as a systematic nationalization of branches of industry, first of all the metal and machine, and the chemical, oil, and textile industries. The nationalization must not proceed in a casual manner, and may be carried out exclusively either by the All-Russian Council of National Economy or by the Council of Peoples upon recommendation of the All-Russian Council of National Economy.

7. The development of productive forces in the country demands the establishment of standards of individual and factory production, and of a wage scale corresponding to the standards of production; the introduction of the strictest labor discipline, under the control of the workers organizations themselves; the gradual introduction of compulsory work, applied, to begin with, to people not engaged in any socially useful work; the mobilization of all technical forces of the country and of experts; the organized redistribution of labor in accordance with the replacements of centers of industry.

8. In the domain of organization of exchange and distribution of commodities centralization and concentration of the trade apparatus into the hands of government organs and of the cooperative societies is necessary as well as a gradual liquidation of the apparatus of private commerce. The system of monopoly on commodities of mass consumption makes necessary the establishment of a direct commodity exchange between various territories; and the fixing of standard prices for all products and commodities of first necessity, as well as co-ordination and gradual reduction of prices.

9. A problem of private necessity is the furnishing of the villages on a large scale with agricultural implements and machinery, with manufacturer of products and with fertilizers; the establishment on a large scale of work of amelioration and the institution of a regular exchange of commodities between the city and the village.

10. In the domain of finances the completion of the nationalization of banks, the increase of the number of branch banks, a gradual transition to obligatory current accounts comprising the whole population, the largest possible development of check circulation and money orders, and common standards of book-keeping for all nationalized undertakings.

III. Problems of Foreign Trade.

1. The four years of imperialistic war have exhausted the productive forces of all countries. A famine in commodities resulting from decreased productivity will characterize in the next years to come the national economy of all countries. The character of the foreign exchange of commodities is undergoing a change. Not competition for foreign markets but the securing for the national economic organizations of necessary products of foreign origin is the aim of the foreign trade policy of every country, altogether regardless of military successes.

2. The aim of the trade policy of Russia before the war was, on the one hand, the facilitation of the export of agricultural products, simultaneously making difficult the import of products of industry, for the sake of protection of the "national" industry; under this system raw materials have been exported in unfinished form, in a manner most unsatisfactory for us. The export of grains has not as much been the result of the existence of a surplus of products of agriculture, as of the fiscal policy of the government. All our exports in this way have been conditioned not by the abundance of our productive forces but by lack of such forces,—not by our richness but by our poverty.

3. The war and the revolution have greatly changed the position of Russia on the international market. While before the war our fiscal protectionistic-tariff policy on the one hand opposed the influx of products of industry, and on the other hand endeavored to increase the export of grains and raw materials, now the substance of our foreign trade policy will be just the opposite—the increase of the importation of the means of production and the decrease of the export of raw materials and food products.

4. Our immediate aim in the domain of commodity exchange is the securing of the means of production for the most important branches of the industries procuring raw materials and manufactured products, as also for the agriculture. In the first instance it is necessary to secure such commodities for the railway transportation and for the agriculture, the textile industry, the leather and timber industries. So far as possible a reduction of imports of commodities of mass consumption as for instance ready-made foot wear, and a complete stoppage of import of articles of luxury, must be attained. As a temporary exception the import of food stuffs (sugar, fish, grain) should be permitted.

5. The fundamental principle of our export is the exchange of commodities. The products sold abroad are valued in foreign rate of exchange with the obligation of delivery in their own tonnage products of industry of the selling country. Our export plan for the coming year contemplates the export of the following staple products: lumber, flax, flour, hemp, bristle, machine oil, raw hides, furs, tobacco, and metals. One of the forms of payment for the imported machinery may become industrial and commercial concessions in territories heretofore not touched by the Russian productive forces, on the condition of an obligatory partnership of the government in the output; whereby special social and trade legislation is to be enacted to govern the rights and duties of holders of concessions.

6. The changed conditions of our internal state of affairs necessitate a change of the organization of the foreign trade. As import of commodities necessitates export, it is necessary, for the sake of an economical utilization of our national resources, consciously to regulate the import as well as the export of commodities. The existing methods of this regulation, as the tariff policy and the license and embargo system, do not sufficiently fulfill this aim. The license system leaves the initiative of exchange of commodities to private commercial capital, which is guided not by the needs of the country but by motives of speculative character. It is necessary to regulate the foreign trade from the standpoint of the interests of the whole national economic organization in accordance with the general plan of production and distribution.

7. The nationalization of the foreign trade means that the influx of commodities from abroad is to be regulated on the basis of definite needs of the national economic organization, as determined by the organs which regulate the production and distribution and that the payment for the imported products is to be determined by the same responsible organs of production and distribution; secondly, that the profits of the intermediary commercial capital shall be decreased to minimum and limited to a fixed commission profit. The State, functioning as the sole buyer in foreign countries and the sole seller of these goods, is able to return immediately the predatory commission profits of the commercial capital of Russian or foreign origin to the domestic producer and consumer.

8. In regard to occupied territories and the independent state formations, which formerly have been a part of the economic organism of Russia, our foreign trade policy is based on common economic interests. A tariff union appears to be the pressing necessity of the interested parties. A rapid solution of this problem will render easier the transition to peace production in Russia as well as in Poland, Ukraine and the Baltic provinces.

Until a final and formal solution of this problem has been reached by means of definite commercial treaties, direct exchange of commodities with independent states, which separated from Russia, as well as with the occupied territories, is possible on the condition and under definite guarantees that such exchange of commodities shall serve the needs of the population concerned only.

9. In order to attain without hindrance the nationalization of * * *

EXHIBIT 40.

TRANSLATION OF ARTICLE IN THE "COURIER OF THE PEOPLES COMMISSARIAT OF TRADE AND INDUSTRY" AS TO CONCESSIONS.

June 20, 1918.

On the question of Concessions. For the interests of re-establishing of the peoples economy of the Russian Republic, it becomes necessary to renew economic trade relations with the Central Powers, and also to continue and develop the relations with the former Allies and neutral nations.

Without mentioning conditions, under which we could begin the realization of corresponding measures, diplomatic conditions, so to speak, we will dwell on certain material considerations of the question raised. One method for solving this question is the utilization of foreign technical and organizing forces for the development of the as yet undeveloped, productive resources of our still rich and native land, and the exploitation of the same.

The general scheme of concessions could be presented in the following manner:

The concessionaire would be obliged to perform, with his own material and at his own expense, the necessary work for the development of the natural riches of Russia, and adapting of them to exploitation. So, for example, America could be given the right to perform work on making the river Yenisey and its tributaries available for navigation. With that there could also be given to the Concessionaire the right to utilize the raw material located near the section being developed; of course it would be compulsory for the concessionaire to submit to the laws existing now, and those that might be issued in the future, in the domain of social, trade, and industrial legislation. For the purpose of utilizing the scientific and technical ability of the foreigners, the concessionaire could be bound to compose the superior and middle personnel, preferably of persons with a sufficient technical and scientific preparation, both theoretic and practical. It is desirable also to utilize the organizing ability of his compatriots. On the other hand, with the view of reducing the distress from unemployment it would be possible to compel the concessionaire to hire laborers, both skilled and unskilled, exclusively on an agreement with the proper professional unions or other workers organizations. In connection with that, it is desirable for the safeguarding of the interests of the workers, that a contract worked out by the proper professional organizations, be concluded with the workers.

If the bargain between the Republic and a foreign government ended there, it would not be a concession, but merely a contract on an order of the Russian Republic to a foreign government, for which the Republic would have to pay a certain amount of money. The contract becomes a concession only when the Russian Republic allows the concessionaire the possibility of exploiting the resources of the Republic, which have been brought to a suitable condition. The counter agent who, at his own expense, has deepened the Yenisey River, laid its bank with concrete, built wharves, and so forth; in other words, has brought the river and its tributaries to a condition where it is available for exploitation in the interests of navigation, could be given the concession on exploitation of the river for a certain period. The concessionaire could be granted the right to engage in transportation on the river and its tributaries; of course for that it would be necessary for him to invest a certain amount of capital, on which he would receive profit. This right would be in itself a form of remuneration of the development of productive forces.

This somewhat unusual form of concession presenting apparently two periods: (first period, the execution of the order, and, second, the payment for it in the form of concession), appears to be the most suitable to the interests of the Russian Republic. At the first glance it may seem that the above described form in no way differentiates from the usual form. There are, then, in the usual concessions two periods; the period of conducting the preparatory work, and the period of utilizing the work already completed for the purpose of exploitation; and, therefore, the form described above seemingly in no way differentiates from the usual.

As a matter of fact, the difference is in just what forms the important period of the concession. While in the usual form of concession the principal role is played by the second period, the utilization of work performed for the purpose of exploitation, that is, the concession is considered, so to speak, from the point of the profit to the concessionaire. In the form of concession described above, the principal role is played by the first period, the development of natural resources, that is, the concession is considered from the point of view of its benefit to the State. In the usual concession a capitalistic government, giving the right of exploitation to capitalists, acts itself in the interest of its class; or, as it is said, "supports native or some other industry." A socialist government is least of all interested in the development of an industry in the sense of bringing profits to capitalists, but the development of productive forces in a socialistic government is important in the interests of the proletariat. And only because Russia is poor in her own organizing forces, which could be adapted to the business of utilizing the unlimited riches of the republic, do we have to turn for aid to countries technically better prepared and located beyond her borders.

That is the reason why it becomes necessary to lengthen and broaden the first period of the concession, the development of the productive forces of the land. The more, complete and unbounded this work, the further off will be the advent of the second period, when the concession must be realized in the narrow sense of that word; that is, the reaping of the fruits of labor in large profits on the expended capital.

The second period of the concession, the period of the concession in the narrow sense of the word: that is, the exploitation of the prepared enterprise requires great caution on the part of the State. For formulating the contract, the following conditions must be taken into consideration: the obligation of the concessionaire to the rules of social and trade enterprise legislation, participation of the Republic in all profit exceeding a certain percentage, allotment to the Republic of a certain amount of the products of the execution of the work, prohibition of the overstepping of the concession without special permission from the government in each particular case, the right of repurchasing the enterprise before the expiration of the date of concession, etc. Of course the conditions outlined here in general, require careful working out of details and conformation with existing laws, particularly with the possible law on the limitations of profits. All details and all minutia, guaranteeing the interests of the State, must be anticipated. Without dwelling at any length on these details, it is necessary nevertheless to point out one circumstance which has an important meaning in the realization of the above mentioned aims. That is the condition on the right of the State to repurchase the enterprise before date of completion of contract.

It has already been noted above that the State is interested in the realization of the first period of the contract, the period of the development of productive forces, and only reconciling itself with the inevitable, with the realization of the concession itself, the second period of the contract. But even that obligation of the State can be annulled or softened to a certain extent by the right of the State to a before-term repurchase of the enterprise. That right enables the State, at any moment when it feels able to conduct itself, the complex economy, without the aid of private capital, when the economic life of the country is reestablished, and when the automatic pressure of foreign private capital on the economic life of the country is reduced.

Mention must also be made of the right of the State to give any concessions to foreigners. The right of the State is indisputable. The State, through its government, is the proprietor of all natural resources of the country and has the right to utilize any of them in the interests of the Republic, or on certain conditions to allow them to be utilized by a third party. In this respect the right of the Russian Republic is even broader than the rights of the bourgeois governments, as at the time of the revolution the government nationalized many branches of industrial and trade activity. The nationalization of the commercial fleet, for example, gives the State the privilege of allotting the right of monopoly on the exploitation of maritime resources to whom it may see fit. In connection with that, the legal forms of State ownership must be particularly carefully described in the contract.

It is impossible to foresee all the various forms of "compensation" which may be demanded by our future concessionaires. It is quite possible that these demands may be contrary to general policies of the Soviet authorities. Such will be the case, in all probability, in demands of an agricultural nature and others. The demands may be quite varied, and each individual case must be decided according to the facts of the case. But, no matter what the solution of separate questions may be, in each particular case, a firm, stable, economic policy must be the foundation of the whole business in its entirety.

S. B. T.

EXHIBIT 41.

DECREE ON THE REGULATION OF PRICES.

1. Although the shops in the large cities have not received any goods during the last few months, and all the articles in them were purchased earlier by the proprietors at comparatively low prices, nevertheless at the present time the proprietors demand for these goods prices much higher than those which prevailed four months ago. Accordingly an examination of all books of all shops in all cities and settlements with a population of not less than 10,000 is ordered.

2. In view of the obvious necessity of control over the fixing of prices, committees on prices are created for every class of commercial establishment (dry-goods, haberdashery, hardware, groceries, etc.).

3. The determination of those branches of commerce for each of which a special committee on prices is created is left to a commission of representatives of the local Soviet of Workmen's Deputies, the city council, and the union of commercial-industrial employees in equal numbers (three each from those organizations).

4. The same commission determines which commercial establishments are within the jurisdiction of each committee on prices.

5. Committees on prices, in accordance with this ordinance, are to be created without fail in every city and settlement with a population not less than 10,000.

6. The members of the committee on prices comprise 2 representatives of the respective section of commercial-industrial employees, 2 representatives of consumers' leagues, 2 representatives of proprietors of the respective commercial establishments, 1 statistician, and 1 book-keeper, chosen by the local Soviet of Workmen's Deputies.

7. The committee on prices controls a given branch of commerce in its entirety and directs it on the following principles:

(a) the verification of the disbursements of the commercial establishment for the acquisition, keeping and organization of the sale of goods, and additional expenses connected with the conduct of the business;

(b) the determination, on this basis, of the normal average price of each product for a given city;

(c) the fixing of an average amount of profit;

(d) the apportionment of the profit among all the shops, with the right of taking as a whole all disbursements and all incomes of all shops of a given branch of commerce in a given city, but so calculated that all proprietors who are personally engaged in their business, and their families, shall be secured at least a suitable maintenance.

8. The committee on prices controls the sources of supply of shops for articles in which they deal, and takes measures for the uninterrupted delivery to the shops of those articles in proper quantities, and in extreme cases, at the expense of the proprietors, making necessary expenditures and organizing the temporary management of those shops whose proprietors cease trading or who maliciously do not take proper measures for securing the supply of goods for the shop, or who violate the rules of the committee.

9. For the unification of the supply of goods to shops, the committee on prices assumes the duty of a purchasing centre which supplies all stores under its control; while the proprietors, for that purpose, place at its disposal all their connections, knowledge, and technical and administrative apparatus, and supply such funds as they ordinarily disburse for supplying their shops with goods. The committee on prices has the right to organize purchasing centers, and may increase, in case of necessity, the representation of the proprietors of shops on the committee to four members instead of two.

10. The committee on prices sees to it that the shops under its control carry out all regulations of the authorities regarding the distribution of products among the population whether by cards or on some other basis.

11. The committee on prices of each city elects representatives to the all-city committee on prices, which coördinates the activity of separate committees under the direction of the central, regional, and local boards of national economy, and in accordance with their regulations.

12. For the expense connected with the business of the committees on prices and the maintenance of their personnel, a deduction from the profits of the commercial establishments under their control is made in suitable proportions and by their order.

13. Executive authority for carrying out this ordinance in each city, including the formation of a commission provided for in Clause 3, is given to local trade unions of commercial-industrial employees, and, in case of the absence of such, to the local Soviet of Workmen's Deputies; or, in the absence of such Soviet to the city council, or, in case of the absence of such city council, to the local consumers' leagues.

14. This ordinance shall be put into effect not later than the month of February. Persons guilty of its violation are liable to imprisonment for a period not longer than one year, and to a fine at the discretion of the Revolutionary Tribunal.

January 30, 1918.

(The Nation, Feb. 22, 1919.)

EXHIBIT 42.

DECREE NATIONALIZING SOAP FACTORIES AND MONOPOLIZING THE SALE OF FATS AND SOAP.

The government has nationalized eight soap factories. Kristovaikof of Kazan, Sterianin-Nevsky at Petrograd, the plants of Joukof Saloline, the plants of Brocar, Ralley and Sio. The sale of fats and of soap is monopolized.

EXHIBIT 43.

DECREE ON THE NATIONALIZATION OF THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY.

The following decree of the Soviet Government, dated January 19, 1918, sets forth the regulations for the Government control of the textile industry.

1. On the strength of Clause 2 of the ordinance of the Supreme Board of National Economy, No. 34, published in the "Gazette of the Provisional Workmen's and Peasants' Government" on December 16, 1917, all textile-weaving products, such as cotton, wool, flax, hemp, and jute textures, as well as articles made from them, are taken under control.

2. Factory and mill committees are authorized to see that no goods are taken from factories or factory storehouses without permission of the Commissariat of Supplies or of institutions or persons authorized by it.

3. All establishments which manufacture products enumerated in this order are to submit to the Commissariat of Supplies, under the direction of factory and mill committees, about the first of each month, a report of the quantity of goods in the factory storehouses and the quantity of goods manufactured during those periods.

4. In regard to the arrival of goods enumerated in Clause 1 from abroad, the persons and institutions receiving them render accounts to the Commissariat of Supplies. The customs offices through which those goods pass also report to the Commissariat of Supplies.

5. The Commissariat of Supplies, utilizing the data thus obtained, apportion the goods on a national scale.

6. All persons, firms, cooperative societies and institutions which deal wholesale or retail, as well as the administration of credit institutions, pawn-shops, transport and express companies and proprietors of storehouses, together with private persons who have goods in a quantity exceeding personal needs, are required to present within five days from the publication of this order a report of all goods in their possession, measured by the yard, as well as tailored goods and single articles, to the proper supplies organizations; that is to say, in cities, to the municipal organization, in villages to the village organization, etc. The latter send the reports to the respective provincial, district, and town supplies organizations for their guidance.

7. The basis and manner of distribution, as well as the forms of control, are worked out by the provincial supplies councils, but the same must be strictly enforced so that persons who receive for a specified time or purpose cloth by the yard shall not be able to get ready-made articles.

8. The prices of all goods are to be fixed—that is to say, the price is to be listed, plus the charge for delivery and plus 10 per cent. for wholesale merchants and 25 per cent. for retail merchants. In case price-lists are lacking, the prices are fixed by special commissions, consisting of six informed persons with the active participation of three representatives of the Soviets of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies or of organizations which take their place.

9. In the case of persons and institutions who disobey this order, their goods shall be requisitioned with a discount of 50 per cent. from the fixed prices, and the discounted 50 per cent. shall be deposited to the credit of the state.

10. Supervision over the execution of this order is entrusted to the department of supplies of the Soviets of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies, factory committees, and other democratic organizations.

EXHIBIT 44.

DECREE ON THE WORKMEN'S CONTROL OF INDUSTRIES.

1. In the interests of a well-planned regulation of the national economy in all industrial, commercial, banking, agricultural, forwarding, cooperative, and productive associations and other enterprises working with hired workmen or distributing work outside, a workmen's control is now being introduced over the production, purchase, sale of products and raw materials, their storage, and also over the financial side of the enterprise.

2. This Workmen's Control is carried out by all the workmen of a given enterprise by means of their elective organizations, namely: factory committees, councils of elders, etc: these organizations are bound to include also representatives of the employees and the technical personnel.

3. For every large town, province, or industrial region a local Council (Soviet) of Workmen's Control will be formed, which being an organ of the Soviet of Workmen Soldiers and Peasant Delegates is composed of representatives of Professional Unions, factory and other labor committees, and working cooperatives.

4. Until a congress of soviets of workmen's control will be convened an All-Russian Soviet of Workmen's Control will be formed in Petrograd, which will include the representatives of the following organizations: the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Soviets of W. & S. Delegates—5 members, the All-Russian Cent. Exec. Committee of Peasant Delegates—5 members, the All-Russian Soviet of Prof. Unions—5 members, the All-Russian Centre of the working cooperation—2 members, the All-Russian Bureau of Factory committees—5 members, the All-Russ. Union of Engineers and Technicians—5 members, the All-Russ. Union of Agronomists—2 m., from each all-Russian Labor Union with at least 100,000 members—1 m., from the Unions whose number of members exceeds 100,000—2 m., the Petrograd Soviet of Professional Unions—2 members.

5. To the higher organs of the Workmen's Control there will be attached commissions of specialists—inspectors (technicians, accountants, and so on), who shall be detailed, on the initiative of said organs, or on the demand of the lower organs of the w.'s C. for the inspection of the financial and technical sides of the enterprise.

6. The organs of the W.'s C. are entitled to supervise the production, to establish the minimum production and to take measures for the elucidation of the cost price of the products.

7. The organs of the W.'s C. are entitled to control the entire correspondence of an enterprise, and the owners of the latter shall be liable to be summoned before the court of justice for concealing any correspondence. All commercial secrecy is abolished. The owners are bound to produce before the organs of the W.'s C. all their books and accounts both for the current year and for all the past accountable years.

8. The decisions of the organs of the W.'s C. are obligatory for the owners of enterprises and they may be revoked only by a resolution of the higher organs of the W.'s C.

9. The owner of the administration of an enterprise is allowed to bring a protest before the higher organs of the W.'s C. against any resolution passed by the lower organs of the Control, within the course of 3 days.

10. In all enterprises the owners and the representatives of the workmen and employees, elected for the realization of the W.'s C. shall be responsible before the State for the strictest order, discipline and protection of the property. Persons guilty of concealing materials products, or orders, or of keeping false accounts, or of other abuses, shall be responsible before the criminal laws.

11. The district soviets of the W.'s C. (cl. 3) shall decide all contested questions and conflicts arising between the lower organs of the Control, and also all complaints of the owners of enterprises, and they shall publish instructions in conformity with the local conditions and the peculiarities of the production within the limits of the regulations and dispositions of the All-Russian Soviet of W.'s C.; they shall also supervise the work of the lower organs of the control.

12. The All-Russian soviet of the Workmen's Control shall draw up the general plans of the workmen's Control, and instructions, it shall promulgate obligatory regulations, regulate the mutual relations between the district soviets of the W.'s C. and serve as a higher instance for all matters connected with the workmen's control.

13. The All-Russian Workmen's Control shall conform the action of the W.'s C. with all other institutions concerned with the organization of the national economy.

The regulations regarding the mutual relations between the All-Russian Soviet of W.'s C. and other institutions, organizing and regulating the national economy, will be published separately.

14. All laws and circulars, limiting in any way the activity of the factory and other committees and soviets of workmen and employees, are now revoked.

In the name of the Russian Republic, Chairman of the Council of P. C. Vi. Oulianoff (N. Lenin).

Alexander Shliapnikoff, Bonch-Bruevitch, N. Gorbounoff.

Accepted by the All-Russian C. Ex. C. of the Sov. of W. & S. Del. November 14th 1917.

EXHIBIT 45.

DECREE OF THE WORKMEN'S AND PEASANTS' GOVERNMENT ON THE 8 HOUR'S WORKING DAY.

1. This law extends over all enterprises and business concerns independently of their dimensions or their owners, and over all persons working for hire.

2. The time during which in accordance with the hire agreement (art. 48, 60, 96, 98 and 103 of the Stat. on Industr. Labour) the workman is bound to be on the business premises and at the disposal of the manager of the same for the execution of the work is called the working time or the number of working hours per 24 hours.

NOTE.—For underground works the time necessary for the descent and the ascent is included in the working time.

NOTE 2.—The working time of workmen detailed for the execution of any works beyond the limits of the enterprise is to be determined by special agreement with the detailed workmen.

3. The working time as established by the rules of internal order of the enterprise (1 art. 103 of Stat. on Ind. Lab.—normal working time) must not exceed eight working hours every 24 hours, or 48 hours a week, including the time necessary for the cleaning of the machinery and the putting in order of the place of the works.

On Christmas Eve. (Dec. 24th) and on the eve of Trinity Sunday all work must be stopped at noon.

4. Not later than 6 hours after the beginning of the work the workmen must be allowed an off time for rest and food. Such an off time must be of not less than one hour's duration.

The off times must be indicated in the rules of the internal order; during such intervals between the work the workmen may dispose freely of their time and even absent themselves from the business premises.

During the intervals between the work all machinery, gears and lathes must be stopped; exceptions are only admitted for such overtime works which are carried on in accordance with art. 18-22 of this law, and also for the machines and gears operating the ventilation, pumping, lighting, etc.; moreover, the works cannot be stopped in such enterprises where this is impossible for technical reasons (unfinished castings, bleachings, and so on).

NOTE 1.—Enterprises in which the work is recognised by the laws or by the Chief Labour Department to be uninterrupted and which is carried on by three shifts of workmen per 24 hours are not subject to the rule of stoppages for off time, but they are bound to give the workmen a certain time for taking food.

NOTE 2.—If according to the conditions of his work the workman cannot absent himself to take food, a suitable place should be set apart for him for this purpose. It shall be obligatory to provide a special place for such workmen who during their work come in touch with materials which are recognised by a resolution of the Chief Department for factories and mining works (or any other organization acting in its stead) as prejudicial to the health of the workmen (lead, quicksilver, etc.)

5. The total duration of all the stoppages of works during every 24 hours must not exceed 2 hours.

6. The period of time between 9 p. m. and 5 a. m. is called night time.

7. During night time it is prohibited to employ women and workmen younger than 16 years of age.

8. For the enterprises working with two shifts of workmen the night time is counted from 9 p. m. to 5 a. m. but the off time (4) may be reduced to one half hour for each shift.

9. In such cases when by the desire of the workmen (for instance in brick kilns) or for climatic reasons it may be desirable to establish off times of a longer duration the Chief Department of factories and mining works (or the organizations acting in its stead) may allow corresponding digressions from the rules established in art. 4-6 and 8 of this law.

10. In hiring minors younger than 18 years of age the following rules are to be observed in addition to those stated above: (a) boys younger than 14 years of age cannot be hired for work, (b) the working time of boys under 18 years of age cannot be of a longer duration than 7 hours.

NOTE.—From Jan. 1st, 1919, no one who has not attained 15 years of age can be hired for work, and from Jan. 1st, 1920, no one below 20 years of age.

11. In the list of holidays on which no work is allowed (2 art. 103 of Stat. on Ind. Lad.) are included all Sundays and the following feast days: Jan. 1st, and 6th, Febr. 23rd, March 25th, May 1st, Aug. 15th, Sept. 14th, Dec. 25th and 26th, Good Friday and Saturday, Easter Monday and Tuesday, the day of the Ascension of Christ, and the 2nd day of the Descent of the Holy Spirit.

NOTE 1.—Persons not belonging to the Christian faith are allowed to include in this list other holidays instead of Sundays, in accordance with their religion; as to the other holidays they are bound to include those which are not indicated in Note 2.

NOTE 2.—At the desire of the majority of the workmen of an enterprise or business, or any one of its branches the following holidays: 1st and 6th of Jan. Aug. 15th, Sept. 14th Dec. 26th, Good Saturday and Easter Monday may be replaced by any other off days.

12. When working with one shift of workmen daily, the minimum duration of a Sunday or holiday rest given each workman must be 42 hours. With two or three shifts of men the shortest duration of each Sunday or holiday rest shall be established by mutual agreement with the workmen organizations.

13. By mutual agreement between the manager of the enterprise or business and the hired persons the latter may not be made to work on any holiday instead of a working day, in digression from the list of holidays indicated in art. 11. Any such agreement must be immediately communicated to the functionaries to whom the supervision over the execution of this law is entrusted.

14. The Chief Department for factories and mining works (or the organization acting in its stead) is entitled to prescribe rules allowing for certain digressions, in so far as they are actually necessary from the forms stated in art. 3-5 and 8 for such institutions which by the nature of their production for the satisfaction of public requirements must carry on their work during night time or which must work irregularly during the different seasons of the year, as for instance the works for the lighting or water supply of towns.

15. For specially injurious manufactures and works in which the workmen are subjected to the action of specially unfavourable conditions or the danger of professional poisoning (works in drying kilns quicksilver, or bleaching works, etc.) the working time mentioned in art. 3-5 and 8 must be reduced. A list of such works and manufactures with indication of the duration of the working time and other conditions for each separate work, shall be drawn up by the Chief Department for factories and mining works (or the organization acting in its stead)

16. No women or boys under 18 years of age are allowed to be occupied in underground works.

17. Digressions from the rules stated in art. 3-5, 8-12 are allowed only by agreement with the workmen and with the approval of the labour organizations in regard to the workmen employed for auxiliary works, the heating of the factory, water supply, lighting guard and fire-brigade service and in general all such works which must be executed in order that the factory might start working and such which must necessarily be done after the stoppage of the work.

18. Any work done by a workman at a time when according to the timetable he need not work is called overtime work. Such overtime work is allowed only with observance of the conditions mentioned in art. 19-22 of this law and it is paid for at a double rate.

19. No women or boys younger than 18 years of age are allowed to work overtime.

Workmen over 18 years of age are allowed by the labour organizations to work overtime in the following cases: (a) when the overtime works are called forth by the necessity of completing work begun in due time but which in consequence of unforeseen and accidental delay owing to the mechanical conditions the manufacturing process could not be completed within the normal working time (according to the rules of internal order) and when the stoppage of such work at the usual time would be dangerous or it would damage the material and machinery (such as chemical processes, castings, etc.) (b) when the work which is being done is necessary for averting a danger threatening life or property, likewise for averting any accidental circumstances infringing on the technical conditions which are necessary for the regular working of the water supply, lighting, sewerage, or public communications at fixed terms; (c) in the case of works for the necessary repairs in the event of a sudden damage of the boilers, motors or gearings and in general all unforeseen disorders in the machines, appliances or constructions (buildings, dams, boreholes, etc.) which may call forth a stoppage in the works of the enterprise or in any of its branches (d) for the execution of necessary temporary works in some branch of the enterprise in such cases when in consequence of fire, or breakage, or other unforeseen circumstances the work of the given branch or any other one was stopped completely or for a time only and when such work is necessary for the operations of the other branches of the enterprise.

20. In the case mentioned in (d) art. 19 a special authorization for overtime work must be obtained from the Labour Commissary or the Labour Inspector in which the duration of such overtime work every day and the period of time during which it will be executed must be indicated. For overtime work in the cases mentioned in (b) and (c) art. 19 a simple notification thereof is handed in to the Inspector.

21. All overtime work shall be recorded in the workmen's settlement books separately with mention of the remuneration paid for same moreover a full and precise count is kept in the office books of all overtime work for each workman separately.

22. Overtime work under the conditions mentioned in art. 19-22 shall be allowed during at most 50 days in the year for each branch of the enterprise and a special count is kept of everyday of overtime work of each branch, even if but one workman should have been working on that day in the given branch.

23. The duration of overtime work of each separate workman shall not in any way exceed 4 hours during any 2 days running.

24. For the immediate future, until the military operations will be ended, in the enterprises working for the defence, any regulations limiting the duration of the overtime work (art. 19-23) and regarding the off time between the work (4-6) may not be applied by agreement with the workmen and the labour organizations.

25. This law is to be promulgated by telegraph and it shall enter in force immediately. For any infringement thereof the penalty will be up to one year's imprisonment by verdict of the court.

In the name of the Russian Republic.

Labour Commissary ad int.: J. Larin.

Petrograd, October 29th, 1917.

EXHIBIT 46.

DECREE ON SUSPENSION OF WORK AND TERMS OF HIRING AND DISCHARGING WORKMEN.

In connection with the curtailing of the war orders as also with the transition from war work to the production of goods for national consumption and of commercial importance, all producing establishments are herewith ordered to undertake the following measures:

(1) Enterprises which are compelled to stop producing, or, which have to go over to other work on account of the cancellation of war orders, have to cease operation on December 23rd, in the space of a month.

(2) The Managements and the Workmen's Committees have, in the course of the first two weeks after their close down to state on the basis of the technical means of their enterprise, the character of the future work, as also the absolutely necessary number of workmen of various categories for the further continuation of the production, as also the number of workmen that will be discharged.

(3) Workmen desiring to leave once for all the enterprise in question, or, who according to the foregoing paragraph, will be discharged as superfluous, will receive, at the final settlement, payment for one month in advance, this according to the normal scale, after the elapse of two weeks from the day on which the establishment will be shut down, without any additional bonus, and will be granted a respite from the calling into the military service, for five months.

(4) Payment for the time of the lay-off is fixed proportionally to two-thirds of the scale norms, but not lower than six Roubles per day.

(5) The Plant Committee jointly with the technical personnel fixes the number of workmen necessary for carrying out the repairs and installations. The Workmen who are assigned to this work, must do so. In the case of their non-appearance or their refusal, they lose the right to the pay to which they are entitled. For the work of repairs the workmen receive wages according to the normal scale.

(6) The released workmen are to be turned over to the care of the Labor Bourse. The Labor Bourse is distributing the workmen among the enterprises and is assisting the workmen who are out of work to receive the help they are entitled to and which is due them according to the Insurance Law for the case of unemployment, but this not before the expiration of the time for which they received the indemnity in advance. All workmen, who are on the pay-roll of the Labor Bourse, are obliged to take positions proposed to them. A refusal deprives the workman of both the enjoyment and the right to subvention.

(7) The observance for the carrying out of all the provisions decreed in the present order and their control, is placed under the authority of professional Unions and Local Plant Committees. (Economic Soviets.)

People's Commissary of Work: A. Shlyapnikoff.

December 20th 1917.

(Published in the 38th issue of the Journal of the Temporary Workmen and Peasant Government, December 21st 1917.)

EXHIBIT 47.

DECREE ON THE NATIONALIZATION OF THE INSURANCE BUSINESS.

1. Insurance of all kinds such as: Insurance against fire, life insurance, insurance against accidents, hail, bad crops, etc., is declared to be the monopoly of the State.

NOTE.—The mutual insurance of movable goods and property by cooperative organizations is concluded on a special basis.

2. All private insurance companies (joint stock companies, share companies and mutual associations) are subject to liquidation from the date of publication of this decree, the former insurance organizations—of the Zemstvo as well as mutual municipal insurance organizations—operating within the limits of the Russian Republic, are declared to be the property of the Russian Republic.

3. For the immediate organization of the insurance business and for the liquidation of the insurance organizations that have become the property of the Russian Republic, the Supreme Soviet of Public Economy is establishing a commission consisting of representatives of the Soviet of Public Economy, the Commissariats of: Trade and Industry, the Interior Finances, Labor, the Commissary of Insurance, State Control and the Insurance organizations of the Soviet.

NOTE.—To the same Commission will be entrusted the liquidation of private insurance companies, the entire property that will be manifested at the liquidation of these concerns will become the property of the Russian Republic.

4. The reorganization and liquidation of the existing insurance concerns mentioned in the above paragraphs must be terminated not later than April 1, 1919.

5. The Commissariat of Insurance and Measures against Fire with all organizations under its control is to be reorganized into the Insurance Department of the Supreme Soviet of Public Economy.

6. All property and concerns belonging to the Soviets are not liable to insurance.

7. The life insurance operations of the State Savings Banks will be continued on the former basis.

8. This decree enters into force from the day of its publication.

President of the Soviet of National Commissaries, V. Ulyanov (Lenin).

Manager of Affairs of the Soviet, V. Bontch-Bruevitch.

Secretary, L. Fotieva.

EXHIBIT 48.

DECREE ORGANIZING THE INSURANCE COUNCIL.

1. The Insurance Council is attached to the People's Commissariat of Labor for the management of all matters relating to the insurance of workmen.

2. The Insurance Council consists of 24 members elected by the insured, 4 by the All-Russian Central Council of Professional Unions, 4 by the All-Russian Central Council of Factory-Works and Village Committees, 3 by the People's Commissariat of Labor, 1 by the Commissariat of Justice, 8 members from the employers and by one member from the zemstvo and town self government, from the medical and legal professions.

3. The Insurance Council elects a Chairman from among its members, two deputy chairmen and two secretaries.

4. The members of the Council from the People's Commissariats are appointed by ukazes of the respective People's Commissaries.

5. The members of the Council from the zemstvo and town self-governments, the medical and legal professions, are elected for a period of one year, respectively, by the Chief Committees of the All-Russian Zemstvo Union and the Union of Towns, the Board of the Company of Russian medical men in memory of N. I. Pirogoff and the Council of Sworn Advocates of the Circuit of the Petrograd Chamber of Justice.

6. The members of the Council elected by the Insurance Fund organizations and from the employers are elected in conformity with the rules established by the All-Russian Congresses to be convened in accordance with art. Of these Regulations,—respectively,—from the participants of the Insurance Fund organizations and the employers, and confirmed by the Council.

The term of office of these members is to be one year.

7. The participants of the Insurance Fund organizations and the employers may elect persons of both sexes to be members of the Insurance Council, although such persons may not take part in the Insurance Fund or employer's organizations.

8. The members of the Insurance Council elected by the All-Russian Council of Professional Unions and the All-Russian Central Council of Factory Committees and the Committees of agricultural laborers are elected to the corresponding All-Russian Congresses.

9. The members of the Council appointed by the Government, and those elected by the zemstvo and town self-governments and the medical and legal professions, by the All-Russian Central Council of Professional Unions, the All-Russian Central Council of Factory Committees, the Central Council of the Committees of agricultural laborers may be replaced by deputy members: the former by persons appointed in the order mentioned in art. 4 of these Regulations and the others by election of the respective organizations.

For replacing the members of the Council from the employers and from the participants of Insurance Funds there shall be elected 4 and 12 deputy members in the order established for the election of members of the Council. The replacing of retiring members shall be decided by a majority of votes received at the election, or if there is an equal number of votes, then by drawing lots.

The deputy members may also attend meetings of the Council, even when the full complement of members is present, but in this case they only enjoy the right of a consultative vote.

10. After the expiration of their term of office the members of the Council by election and their deputy members continue to fulfil their functions until the new elections. Retiring members may be reelected.

11. For their services to the Council the members of the Council shall receive a remuneration out of the funds of the State Treasury at the rates established for the members of the Insurance Council.

The deputy members shall receive a remuneration established by a Nakaz (instructions) of the Council.

12. The non-appearance of a member of the Council elected by the participants of the Insurance Fund at his service or work at a time when he is fulfilling his duties as a member of the Council, will not entitle the employer to impose a fine or penalty on him for such non-appearance (stat. on Ind. Lab. publ. 1913 art. 104 and 106) or to demand the cancellation of the agreement with him.

13. Any persons from whom it will be deemed possible to obtain useful information may be invited to the meetings of the Council.

For the discussion of matters concerning any departments of the People's Commissariats which have no representatives in the Council such representatives are invited through the respective People's Commissaries. The invited persons enjoy the right of a consultative vote.

14. The management of the correspondence of the Insurance Council is entrusted to the Bureau of the Council.

The Bureau shall appoint meetings of the Council by degrees as they shall be deemed necessary.

All matters are submitted to the examinations of the Council in the order established by the Bureau of the Council. The members of the Council are entitled to submit to the Council for discussion questions relating to any subjects pertaining to its competency, through the Bureau.

15. To the competency of the Insurance Councils shall belong:

(a) the publication within the limits of the existing laws, of rules and instructions relating to all kinds of insurance of workmen and also the publication of instructions establishing the order of activity of the local institutions connected with such affairs.

(b) the examination of misunderstandings which might arise during the application of any laws concerning the insurance of workmen by the local institutions;

(c) the revocation of resolutions of Insurance Boards which according to the laws may be protested before the Councils;

(d) the decision of appeals of complaints against the resolutions of the Insurance Boards brought before the Insurance Council;

(e) the establishment of the remuneration to be paid to the members of the Insurance Boards for their participation in the work of the Boards;

(f) the publication of rules regarding the accountancy of the insurance funds and other insurance institutions;

(g) the establishment of general rules for the application of the insurance laws to persons working in 'artels' (associations) and likewise to artisans, peasant-workers (kustari), the poorer peasants working alone, without hired labor;

(h) the discussion of law projects regarding the insurance of workmen, of the nakazes (instructions) of the Council and the General Meetings of the Council, the rules for Insurance Congresses and the propositions for their convocation;

(i) the propositions to carry out inspections of the correspondence of the local institutions entrusted with the insurance affairs and also for the inspection of the insurance funds and other insurance institutions;

(j) the discussion of questions connected with matters pertaining to the competency of the Council and submitted by the Labor Commissariat and by the members of the Council through the Bureau of the Council.

16. To the competency of the Bureau of the Council belong particularly:

I. Re the insurance of workmen in case of sickness.

(a) the establishment of the form and order in which the employers must receive the requisite information, and also the order for the keeping of the books and records containing such information and the order in which the same must be produced for verifications;

(b) the publishing of model statutes for the hospital fund organizations;

(c) the appointment of the dates for the formation of the hospital funds;

(d) the publishing of rules regarding the arrangement and maintenance of medical institutions for the participants of the hospital funds, and also regarding the methods of rendering medical assistance in various forms;

(e) the establishment of the order and general rules for the transfer of the medical institutions to the participants of the hospital fund and into the management of the hospital funds organizations;

(f) the establishment of the form of accountancy of the medical institutions serving the participants of the hospital funds;

(g) the establishment of the form of the yearly accountancy of the hospital funds organizations.

II. Re the insurance of the workmen against accidents.

(a) the establishment of the form of the certificate, attesting the circumstances under which the accident has happened.

(b) the establishment of the terms within which the pensioners are bound to produce the certificates necessary for the receipt of the pensions;

(c) the confirmation of the forms of the pension books and the rules for the delivery of same;

(d) the establishment of rules and terms for the production of information regarding the kind of manufacture of work, and the number of persons employed in it;

(e) the confirmation of the tables for the calculation of the capitalized value of the pensions;

(f) the examination of the grounds for the calculation of the dimensions of the insurance payments of the employers;

(g) the establishment and the definition of the degrees of danger of different work;

(h) the confirmation of the form of the statements of the insurance companies for the count of accidents.

III. Re the insurance of the workmen against unemployment.

(a) the establishment of the amount of the payments of the employers into the Fund of the unemployed in percentage proportion to the earned pay;

(b) the establishment of the rules for the investment, custody and expenditure of the All-Russian Fund of the unemployed;

(c) the establishment of the form and order for the producing of the necessary information by the employers;

(d) the examination of complaints brought against the resolutions of the Insurance Boards.

17. The Insurance Council examines all matters at the general meetings of the Council and in separate sections of the Council.

18. Separate sections are formed by the Council for the examination of the following questions and matters: (a) the insurances against sickness, (b) the insurance against accidents, (c) the insurance against unemployment, (d) invalidity and so on. Moreover, a special juridical commission is formed to which is entrusted the examination of claims and demands of a monetary nature of all kinds of insurance.

19. The distribution of the questions to be dealt with among the different sections and the determination of their competency is effected by the Council in special instructions for each section.

20. The resolutions of the Council are final.

21. For the execution of the separate business of the Council of its sections commissions may be formed by resolutions of the General Meeting of the Council, to which persons who are not members of the Council may be invited.

22. During the inspection mentioned in par. — art. — of these Regulations the institutions and persons subject to the inspection shall be bound to open before the Auditors all the books, accounts and records relating to the subject under inspection.

23. The rules for the internal order in the general Meetings, sections and commissions, and also in the Bureau of the Council shall be determined in the Nakazes drawn up by the Council.

24. The resolutions of the Council are published in a special Bulletin which is sent free of charge to the local institutions, the insurance organizations and also to the governmental and public institutions and organizations, at the discretion of the Bureau of the Council.

Besides this, all decisions of the Council, of an obligatory nature, are published for general information in the central organ of the Government.

25. For the discussion of the principal measures of a general character relating to the insurance of the workmen the Council shall convene Congresses of the insured.

26. The secretary business of the Insurance Council is entrusted to the Section of Social Insurance of the People's Commissariat of Labor under the guidance of the Bureau of the Council.

29. Until the members of the Insurance Council from the participants of Insurance Funds according to art. — of these Regulations will be elected, said members of the Councils shall be elected by the General Petrograd Insurance Conference of Workmen, the delegates to which are elected at the rate of 1 to every 1000 workmen.

The order for the election of delegates to the Conference and the order for the election of members of the Council at this conference are determined by the Workmen's Insurance Group and confirmed by the Conference.

II. The members of the Insur. Council from the employers, until they will be elected in the order established in art. — of these Regulations, will be elected by the Petrograd Society of Manufacturers and Works Owners.

III. All complaints regarding any irregularities admitted during the elections shall be brought before the People's Commissariat of Labor.

EXHIBIT 49.

REGULATIONS ON THE INSURANCE BOARDS.

1. An Insurance Board is formed in each government or province. The office of the Board is situated in the chief town of the government or province. The Insurance Council shall be entitled to pass resolutions regarding the removal of the office to some other town of a government or province.

NOTE 1.—The Insurance Council is entitled to pass resolutions regarding the formation of an Insurance Board for several governments or provinces of Asiatic Russia.

NOTE 2.—The Insurance Council is entitled to prescribe rules regarding the time and order for the opening of Insurance Boards.

2. An Insurance Board is composed of members from the participants of Insurance Fund organizations, 3 members from the governmental or provincial Councils of Professional Unions, 3 from the Factory and Village Committees, 3 from the local Commissariat of Labor, 1 from the local Commissariat of Justice, 1 from the Zemstvo and 1 from the Town self-governments, and 6 members from the employers.

3. The Insurance Board elects a chairman from among its members, two deputy chairman and two secretaries.

4. The order for the appointment of members of the Board from the local Committees of Labor and Justice is established by the respective People's Commissaries.

The members of an Insurance Board from a government zemstvo and a municipal Duma are elected by the members of the government zemstvo or municipal Duma out of the town where the Insurance Board has its seat, and for the same period of time as the electing members themselves have been elected to their posts.

The members of the Board from the participants of the Insurance Fund Organizations are elected for one year by the Governmental or provincial Insurance Conference.

The order for the election of delegates and of members of the Council to the conference is established by the Insurance Board.

The members of the Insurance Board elected by the employers are elected for one year, by agreement with the local employers' organizations.

The order in which complaints may be brought against the elections is established by the Insurance Council.

5. The participants of the Insurance Funds and the employers may elect persons of both sexes to be members of a Board, even if such persons are not participants of the Insurance Funds organizations, or if they do not belong to the employers' organizations.

6. The order for the appointment of substitutes to the members of Boards from the local Commissariats of Labor and Justice is established by the respective Peoples' Commissaries.

7. For replacing the members elected by a governmental zemstvo or a municipal Duma one deputy member is elected by each of these institutions and for replacing the members elected by the employers and the participants of an Insurance Fund,—respectively 2 and 9 deputy members are elected. Members elected by the combined organizations of Professional Unions, Factory and Village Committees are elected by these organizations in a number equal to that of the members of the Board from these organizations.

The deputy members elected by the employers and the participants of Insurance Funds act as substitutes of the originally elected members in the order of the majority of votes received by them at the elections, and if there is no majority, then by drawing lots. The deputy members may attend meetings of the Board even when the full complement of the members of the Board is present, but in this case they shall only enjoy the right of a consultative vote.

8. The elected members of the Board and their deputies shall continue to fulfil their functions after the expiration of the term for which they had been elected until new elections will be held. Retiring members may be reelected.

9. For their participation in the work of the Board the members of an Insurance Board receive a remuneration out of the funds of the State Treasury, the amount of which is established by the Insurance Council.

The deputy members of the Board, in the event of their participating in the meetings of the Board with a decisive vote shall receive a remuneration out of the funds of the State Treasury, the amount of which shall be established by the Insurance Board.

10. The non-appearance of a member of the Board elected by the participants of the Insurance Funds at the service or work of the enterprise at a time when he is fulfilling his functions as such member of the Board shall not entitle the employer to impose a penalty on him for such non-appearance or to demand the cancellation of the hire agreement before the expiration of the term.

11. To the meetings of the Insurance Board any persons may be invited from whom it may be considered possible to obtain useful information on the matters submitted to the deliberation of the meeting. Such persons shall enjoy the right of a consultative vote.

12. To the competency of an Insurance Board shall belong:

(a) The supervision over the execution of the laws regarding the insurance of the workmen,

(b) The supervision over the execution of the rules, instructions and regulations published by the Insurance Council in addition to and development of the insurance laws,

(c) Dispositionary measures to be adopted for the application of the laws for the insurance of the workmen and also the regulations of the insurance council.

(d) To submit to the Insurance Council all difficulties and doubts arising during the application of the laws for the insurance of workmen and the rules, instructions and regulations published in supplement to the same.

(e) To order that the workmen and employees of enterprises and all separate persons liable to be insured be made to join the General Fund,

(f) To establish the term for the formation of the Town and the Circuit Fund organizations,

(g) To keep the list of the Insurance Fund Organizations,

(h) To establish the cost of a daily maintenance and treatment of a sick man in the medical institutions belonging to the towns and zemstovs,

(i) To confirm the regulations of the Hospital Fund organizations regarding the increase of the amounts to be paid by the employers,

(j) To examine the complaints brought against the resolutions of the meetings of Delegates of Insurance Fund organizations.

(k) To examine the complaints against elections to members of the Board.

(l) To appoint inspections of the cash funds of the Insurance Funds, and also of the correspondence and accountancy of the Boards of such funds.

13. The Insurance Boards examine all matters in General Meetings and in separate sections.

14. Sections are formed by the insurance Board for the examination of the following questions and matters: a/ insurances against accidents, b/ insurance against sickness, c/ insurances against unemployment, d/ invalidity, and so on.

Besides, a special juridical commission is formed to which is entrusted the examination of claims and demands of a monetary nature relating to all the existing forms of insurance.

15. The distribution of the cases among the separate sections and the establishment of their competency are carried out by the Insurance Council by means of special instructions to each section.

16. When a case is appointed for hearing by the Board, the plaintiff receives a notice thereof and the right is reserved to him or to his attorney to attend the examination of the case and to give verbal explanations or to hand in written explanations. The non-appearance of the plaintiff or his attorney shall not stop the decision of the matter, if the Board will have sufficient reason to be assured that the above notice had been duly received by the plaintiff.

17. The resolutions of the Board in regard to any complaints may consist either in the recognition of the validity of the protested disposition, or in a revocation of the same. In the first case the plaintiff shall be informed of the fact that his complaint is rejected and he shall receive a copy of the decision of the board. In the second case the plaintiff is informed of the revocation of the disposition against which he protested. This order is observed also when the disposition is revoked only in part, not as a whole.

18. The cases when members of the Board of a Hospital Fund organization may be brought before a court of justice are examined by the Insurance Board after an explanation had been previously demanded from the summoned persons. When such a case is appointed for hearing by the Board a notice is sent to the defendants and the right is reserved to them or their attorneys to attend the examination and to give verbal or written explanations on the matter. The non-appearance of the defendant or his attorney shall not stop the decision of the case if the Board has satisfactory evidence to prove that the above mentioned notice had been duly received by the defendant.

19. For the validity of the decisions of the Board the presence of at least 17 members at the meetings of the Board including the Chairman shall be necessary.

20. Questions are decided by a simple majority of votes: if there is a tie in voting, then the vote of the Chairman gives the preponderance.

21. The rules for the internal order and the secretary work in an Insurance Board are published in a Nakaz by the Ins. Council.

22. Complaints may be brought before the Insurance Council through the insurance board on the decisions of the latter within the course of one month. This term is reckoned from the day on which such decision was notified, or from the day on which it was put into execution if there had been no previous notification. The lodging of a complaint does not stop the execution of a decision of the Board if no special resolution regarding such stoppage will be passed by the Board to which the complaint had been submitted, or by any other institution on which the decision depended.

23. The secretary business of the Board is entrusted to the local Commissariats of Labor under the guidance of the Bureau of the Board. This Bureau is composed of the Chairman of the Board and two members of the Board, by election.

All the dispositional measures for the carrying out of the elections to the Insurance Board are entrusted to the local Commissariats of Labor.

Until the Insurance Council will have elaborated special rules prescribing the order in which the elections to members of the Board from the employers are to be carried out, and their verification, and the order in which such elections may be protested against such elections shall be carried out by the boards of the respective Insurance Associations.

EXHIBIT 50.

REGULATIONS ON THE INSURANCE AGAINST UNEMPLOYMENT.

1. The action of these Regulations extends over the whole territory of the Russian Republic and over all persons without distinction of age or sex who are employed for any kind of work (factory, mining, industry, construction, industry and commerce, timber-felling, forwarding business, agriculture, domicile industry, personal services, free professions, etc.) All the above named categories of workers are subject to be insured against unemployment independently of the nature or duration of their work.

2. The force of these Regulations does not extend over persons occupying the higher posts in the enterprises, such as: master-workmen, the administrators, engineers, etc., and also persons belonging to the stage or the orchestras, teachers, tutors and other free professions, in case if their regular earnings exceed three times the average pay of the workmen of the given locality as established by the local or provincial councils of Professional Unions.

3. Under the term of unemployed these Regulations class every person capable of working, whose principal source of income is work for hire, and who cannot find work at the normal labor price as established by the respective Professional Unions.

4. The fact and the duration of the period of unemployment are established by the Unemployed Fund Organizations.

NOTE.—These Regulations do not consider as unemployed the following persons:—(a) Those who are out of work but who still receive their pay; and (b) those who are out of work owing to a strike, so long as the strike lasts.

5. The Funds necessary for ensuring subsidies to the workmen are formed by the sums paid in by the employers.

6. These sums form the one single all-Russian fund of the unemployed which is placed under the management of the Unemployed Fund Organizations constituting the All-Russian Reinsurance Union.

7. The dimensions of the payments made by the employers into the Unemployed Fund are determined in percentage proportion to the pay, and they are established uniformly for the whole of Russia by the Insurance Council, at the rate of at least three per cent (of the pay).

8. By a resolution of the Fund Committee instead of establishing the dimensions of the payments in percentage proportion to the pay of each separate member, the amounts of the payments may be established according to the categories of labor.

9. The payments are made by the employers into the Unemployed's Fund within a week's term from the day of payment of the salary or pay. Any sums not paid in time shall be recovered from the employers by order of the Labor Commissariat, in accordance with the rules prescribed for the recovery of indisputable claims of the Government (Code of Laws, vol. 16, part 2, Rec. of ind. cl., publ. 1910 art. 2) and a fine is levied at the same time at the rate of 10% on the unpaid sum per month, counting every new month begun as a full month.

10. In regard to the Fund of the Unemployed, the employers shall be bound:

(a) To send information regarding every person engaged or dismissed from their works within three days.

(b) To send detailed information regarding the work done, the earnings paid out to each person separately, on each of the pay days,

(c) To keep all the books and records containing the above information in the form established by the Fund Committee, and

(d) To produce before the persons empowered thereto by the Fund Committee all the requisite books, documents, accounts and records for the verification of such information.

10. The following sums are considered as the pay or earnings in the sense meant by these Regulations:

(a) The amount earned during a year or any other period of time as salary or pay, including also the sums paid for overtime work (no matter how they were paid: by day, by month, by week, etc.) and

(b) The value of any remuneration in kind (lodgings, board, etc.) during the same period of time, if such remuneration is given by the employer; the value of a remuneration in lodgings being estimated at from 20 to 30 per cent of the pay, and the remuneration in board, etc., at its actual cost. The value of the remuneration in kind in the prescribed limits is established by the Board of Insurance of the workmen in conformity with the data furnished by the local Professional Unions or their joint organizations.

The share of a workman in the profits or any percentage remuneration received by him, is also included in the sum of his pay or earnings or salary.

12. The Funds of the Unemployed are invested, kept and expended in accordance with the rules prescribed by the Insurance Council.

13. A subsidy paid to a workman must amount to his full pay. The Fund committee is bound to establish the maximum of the subsidy; at any rate it shall not exceed the average daily pay in the given locality.

NOTE.—The average daily pay of a given locality is established by the local or provincial Councils of the Professional Unions.

14. A workman out of work is entitled to receive a subsidy from the very first day that he is unemployed. A period of unemployment of less than three days is not paid for.

NOTE.—The Fund Committee may, after passing a corresponding resolution, pay a subsidy for such days also.

15. In case of sickness of a workman when out of work the Unemployed Fund organization shall give him medical assistance free of cost, entering for this purpose into an agreement with the Hospital Fund organizations.

A subsidy in money may be paid only from one Fund.

16. The Unemployed Funds organizations are Town Funds, for the towns and Circuit Funds for the circuits.

17. The Unemployed Funds organizations are entitled to form Unions and to enter into agreements with one another and with other organizations and institutions.

18. An Unemployed Fund organization may acquire in its own name rights to property, including rights of ownership and others to real estate, also undertake liabilities, and act as plaintiff or defendant in courts of justice.

19. The Fund Committee manages the affairs of a Fund of the Unemployed and consists of an equal number of representatives of the Professional Unions, the Factory Committees and the Hospital Funds organizations.

The number of the members of the Committee is established by the above mentioned organizations by mutual consent.

20. A Fund Committee shall elect from among its members:

- (a) An executive Bureau, and
- (b) An Auditors Commission.

21. With the introduction of other forms of insurance and the formation of one general fund the management of the affairs of the Fund of the Unemployed shall be transferred to the general Fund.

22. The resolution of a Fund Committee in regard to the application of these Regulations may be protested against within the term of a fortnight before a Board of Insurance of the workmen and the resolution of the latter may be protested against within the same period of time before the Insurance Council.

A protest can not stop the putting into execution of such resolutions.

23. The dispositional measures for the formation of a Fund of the Unemployed are entrusted to the local Councils of Professional Unions, the factory Committees and the Hospital Funds.

In the event of the absence of such organizations or of their not forming a Fund of the Unemployed within a months term, such Fund organizations are formed by order of the Labor Commissary.

24. These regulations shall be put into execution by telegraph and they shall immediately enter into force of law.

25. For any infringement of these Regulations the penalty will be imprisonment up to a year by verdict of the Court.

EXHIBIT 51.

MEMORANDUM ON THE INSURANCE AGAINST UNEMPLOYMENT.

To the law project on insurance against unemployment submitted to the All-Russian Central Executive Committee of the Congress of Soviets of W. S. & P. Delegates.

Unemployment is the inevitable companion of a capitalistic society. The reserve working army is continually pressing on the labour market and by its competition is rendering worse the conditions of life and work of the laboring classes.

Insurance against unemployment is of great importance to the working classes, as by ensuring the means of subsistence to the unemployed during the time that they are out of work, it weakens their competition and enables them not to press on the labor market and thus aggravate the conditions of work.

But in order to attain its purpose the insurance must be completed.

It must cover all the workmen without any exception. Because if any category of labor will not be insured the unemployed of such a category will press on the labor market and aggravate the condition of the employed.

The insurance must be effected at the cost of the owners of enterprises, because unemployment is a product of the capitalistic order and the guaranteeing against unemployment must be the duty not of the workman, but of the capitalist as the one profiting by such an order.

The insurance against unemployment must ensure to the workman out of work at least a living minimum, because a too low subsidy will compel the unemployed to take work at a reduced rate and thus diminish the pay of the working men.

Lastly, the insurance must be in the hands of the insured, i. e. the workmen themselves, because only under the condition of a complete self-government of the insured can the insurance business be organized on the best lines.

The annexed Regulations on the Insurance of the workmen against unemployment are founded on the above-mentioned principles of the insurance program: it must extend over all workmen without exception; all the costs must be borne by the employers, a sufficient assistance is ensured to the unemployed during the time that they are out of work and the insurance business is in the hands of the insured themselves—in the Funds organization of the unemployed.

These elementary principles of the insurance do not need any explanation, they are the requirements of the working class.

The only point needing explanation are the payments of 2% from the pay, established by the laws. We have no statistical data on the unemployed in Russia. It is necessary to have recourse to the data obtained in Western Europe.

The percentage of the unemployed in the English professional unions amounted in the average during 19 years (1888–1906) to 4.4%; according to the data of the obligatory insurance against unemployment in England in 1911 in January there were 5% of unemployed, in February—4.4%.

In France the number of unemployed among the members of syndicates for the years 1896–1901 was 8.2%, and according to the census of 1901—3%. In the unions of Ghent the average percentage of the unemployed in 1896 was 4%, in the Austrian towns in accordance with the census I–XII 1900 it varied among the different categories of labor from 2.5% (trade) to 5.2% (industry).

In the professional unions of Norway the average percentage of the unemployed for the years 1903–1907 was 4.1%; in the United States 3.3% (1904), in Germany 3.4%.

In regard to the duration of the unemployment in Berlin the average was 38 days, in Bremen 45 days.

As to the costs of the insurance against unemployment they amounted to 5 roubles per member per annum in 100 of the most important English professional unions in 1906; in accordance with the law on the compulsory insurance in England in 1911 the payments for such a form of insurance amounted to 12½% per annum per insured person, in Norway—4 rbls. 80 cop., in Denmark—32 r. 60 cop. In accordance with Caillard's project (in France) the payment for each workman amounts to 4.50 cop.; according to the project of the Socialist Molkenburg in Germany to 8–10 rbls. per workman. In accordance with the project of the German national party in 1899 it was minimum 7 rbls. for workmen working at all seasons, and 18 rbls. for those working in special seasons.

On the ground of these data the calculations for the payments to be made for the insurance against unemployment in accordance with this law—project are as follows:

Assuming the number of unemployed to be 10% and the average duration of a period of unemployment to be 50 days, we shall have to every 100 workmen 10 men out of work and 500 days of unemployment, or one man will be out of work 5 days per annum. Counting the average pay of a workman in Russia to be 500–800 rbls. per annum, or 2 rbls. a day, the costs of the assistance to the unemployed will amount to 10 rubls. and with all other costs

12-13 rbls. per workman. The minimum payment of 3% of the regular pay will give 15-18 rbls. per annum per workman.

Thus the payment of 3% of the regular pay may be assumed as the minimum. In case of need this may be increased by the Insurance Council.

Manager of the Section of Social Insurance: A Vinokouroff.

Secretary of the Section of Social Insurance: Al. Paderin.

EXHIBIT 52.

DECREE ON WORKMEN'S INSURANCE AGAINST ACCIDENTS.

From now on up to the complete reorganization of the law on the insurance of workmen against accidents of June 23rd, 1912, on the basis of the workmen's insurance program, namely: the extension of the insurance on all workmen, the indemnification of his full pay to a disabled workman, the according of a self-government to the insured and the establishment of the right of the labor organizations to elect the doctor-experts performing the examination and inspection, the Council of People's Commissaries passed the following resolution on November 8th, 1917:—In consequence of the increased cost of living:

1. The pensions paid to all pensioners in consequence of accidents up to the year 1917 inclusively shall be immediately increased by 100% on the account of the Pension Fund (art. 463 and 464 of the Stat. on Ind. Lab.). The Pension Fund shall be replenished during three years from the sums of the reserve capital from all free sums remaining from the operations and, in the event of their insufficiency, by supplementary payments on the part of the owners of enterprises.

In correspondence therewith art. 459 of the Stat. on Ind. Lab. shall be supplemented as follows:

"The insurance corporation is entitled to borrow money from the pension fund for the purpose of increasing the pensions of sufferers from accidents by 100% in consequence of the increased cost of living on the condition that such borrowed sums be reimbursed within the course of three years from the reserved capital, the free sums remaining from operations and if this will be insufficient then the owners of the enterprises will have to pay supplementary sums.

Signed: Chairman of the P. C.—V. Onlanoff (Lenin).

Labor Commissary Shliapnikoff.

Manager of the Affairs of the Council of Peoples Comm., Vlad. Bonch-Brukevitch.

Secretary of the Council, N. Gorbounoff.

November 8th, 1917.

EXHIBIT 53.

DECREE ON THE INDEMNIFICATION OF SOLDIERS WHO WERE DETAILED TO WORK IN INDUSTRIAL ENTERPRISES AND WHO HAVE SUFFERED FROM ACCIDENTS.

For the future until the laws on the insurance of workmen against accidents will be reorganized on the principles of the program of the working party, soldiers detailed to work in enterprises shall be subject to the action of the Rules of July 2nd, 1903 and the Law for the insurance of workmen against accidents of June 23rd 1912. The yearly pay to a workman-soldier granted him as a pension in case of disablement, must be calculated on the basis of the pay owing to an ordinary workman employed for the same work. In accordance with this art. 375, 403, and 460 of the Stat. on Ind. Labor are to be supplemented by the following additions:

NOTE TO ART. #375.—All soldiers detailed to works in enterprises and having suffered disablement during the execution of the works shall be subject to the action of the Rules stated in this chapter (fourth), beginning from July 19th, 1914. The payment is to begin on the day that the complete disablement was recognized, according to art. 392 of Stat. on Ind. Lab.

NOTE TO ART. #403.—The yearly payment to be made to a soldier detailed to work in an enterprise and having suffered from an accident which has permanently disabled him is to be calculated at the rate of the payments made to all other workmen employed for the same work.

NOTE TO ART. #460.—The insurance corporations are entitled to recover any additional payments from the owners of the enterprises for the soldiers employed in their business, beginning from July 19th, 1914.

In the name of the Government of the Russian Republic, People's Commissary of Labor, Alexander Shliapnikoff.

EXHIBIT 54.

DECREE ON THE STATE BANK.

The Council of People's Commissaries has decreed:

I. In view thereof that the strike of the functionaries of the State Bank and the delay in the payment of the money by the Petrograd office of the Bank connected therewith may place in a disastrous position the majority of workmen and soldiers,—the Commissary of the State Bank Obolensky shall be entitled, as a temporary and exclusive measure, during at most three days counting the day of the signing of this decree,—to make payments out of the cash office of the Petrograd office of the State Bank against lawfully filled valid documents produced by: (a) the government and public institutions, and (b) by industrial-commercial enterprises, needing the money for the payment of the workmen, but without entering such payments in the books of the Bank until the operations of the Bank will be re-started, and substituting the corresponding amounts taken out of the cash office of the Bank by the produced documents.

The authenticity and validity of the documents must be verified in each separate case and confirmed by a guaranty of the factory committees and other public institutions. The chief controller of the Petrograd office of the Bank shall establish the conditions of such verification and guaranty.

II. In view thereof that the strike of the functionaries of the State Bank is preventing the practical realization of the Decree of the Council of Peoples Commissaries of November 14th regarding the advancing to the Soviet of a short-termed loan of 25 million roubles,—the Commissary of the Bank is to be entitled to make payments out of the cash office of the Petrograd office of the State Bank on the orders of the persons empowered by the Council within the limits of the aforementioned sum and in the same order and way as decreed in part 1, i. e., with substitution of the money taken from the cash office by documents until said payments will be entered in the books of the Bank.

The present regulation will be valid during three days, counting the day of the signing of this decree.

November 17th, 1917.

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaries, Vladimir Oulianoff (Lenin).

People's Commissaries: I. Stalin, L. Trotzky, Z. Menjinsky.

Manager of the Affairs of the Council of People's Commissaries, Bonch-Bruévitch.

Secretary of the Council of People's Commissaries, N. Gorbounoff.

EXHIBIT 55.

DECREE ON SUPPRESSION OF THE LAND BANK OF THE NOBILITY AND THE PEASANT LAND BANK OF THE OLD MINISTRY OF FINANCE.

In execution of the decrees on land and on the annulment of all class institutions it is now decreed:

The State Land Bank of the Nobility and the Peasant Land Bank of the department of the Ministry of Finance are suppressed and the functionaries and employees of these institutions are to be placed on the unattached list in accordance with the usual order.

The liquidation of the affairs in the central and local institutions of said banks is entrusted to the State Bank. The method and the order in which the liquidation itself is to be carried out shall be established by a special decree of the Council of People's Commissaries.

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaries, Vl. Oulianoff (Lenin).

People's Commissary of the Ministry of Finance, V. Menjinsky.

Manager of the affairs, Vl. Bouch-Bruévitch.

Secretary, N. Gorbounov.

November 25, 1917.

EXHIBIT 56.

DECREE ON THE NATIONALIZATION OF BANKS.

In the interest of the regular organization of the national economy, of the thorough eradication of bank speculation and the complete emancipation of the workmen, peasants, and the whole laboring population from the exploitation of banking capital, and with a view to the establishment of a single national bank of the Russian Republic which shall serve the real interests of the people and the poorer classes, the Central Executive Committee resolves:

1. The banking business is declared a state monopoly.
 2. All existing private joint-stock banks and banking offices are merged in the state bank.
 3. The assets and liabilities of the liquidated establishments are taken over by the state bank.
 4. The order of the merger of private banks in the state bank is to be determined by a special decree.
 5. The temporary administration of the affairs of the private banks is entrusted to the board of the state bank.
 6. The interests of the small depositors will be safeguarded.
- December 14, 1917.
Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.

EXHIBIT 57.

DECREE ON STEEL BOXES IN BANKS.

1. All money deposited in the bank's steel boxes must be entered on the clients current account in the State Bank.

NOTE.—Gold, in coin and in bars, is to be confiscated and transferred to the State's general gold fund.

2. All owners of steel boxes must, immediately upon notification, appear at the bank, with keys, to be present during the conducting of a revision of steel boxes.

3. All owners not appearing within three days from notification are considered as having maliciously evaded the revision.

4. Boxes belonging to persons who have maliciously evaded are subject to be opened by investigating commissions appointed by the Commissaries of the State Bank, and all property contained therein is confiscated by the State Bank, to be property of the people.

NOTE.—The investigating commissions can, in respective cases, postpone the liquidation.

Adopted at a session of the Central Executive Committee, December 14th.

(Published in No. 35 of the "Gazette of the Temporary Workers and Peasants Government," December 17, 1917.)

EXHIBIT 58.

DECREE ON THE CONFISCATION OF SHARES OF FORMER PRIVATE BANKS.

Decree for the confiscation of the shares of former private banks having in view, completely to remove from the direction of the recently created People's Bank of the Russian Republic, the Capitalists who owned shares in the abolished private banks and continuing in this way the liquidation of the régime of the omnipotence of bankers, the Soviet of People's Commissaries ordains:

1. The shares of former private banks (original, reserve, and special) are transferred to the People's Bank of the Russian Republic on the basis of complete confiscation.
2. All bank shares are annulled and all payment of dividends on them is unconditionally discontinued.
3. All bank shares shall be transferred without delay by their present holders to the local branches of the National Bank.
4. The owners of bank shares not having them in their possession are required to bring to the branches of the National Bank, lists of the bank shares belonging to them with a note of their present location.

5. The owners of bank shares who do not bring them (in accordance with Section 3) or who do now bring lists (in accordance with Section 4) within the space of two weeks from the day of the publication of this decree will be punished by the complete confiscation of all their property.

6. All settlement and transfer of bank shares is unconditionally forbidden. All who take part in these forbidden acts and settlements are liable to imprisonment for three years.

(Signed): President of the Soviet of People's Commissaries, Vl. Ulianov (Lenin).

Director of Administration of the Soviet, Vl. Bonch-Bruevich.

Secretary, N. Gorbunov.

Published January 27, 1918.

EXHIBIT 59.

DECREE ON THE ANNULMENT OF NATIONAL LOANS AGREED ON AT THE SESSION OF THE CENTRAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, JANUARY 21, 1918.

1. All national loans concluded by the Governments of Russian landowners and Russian Bourgeoisie enumerated in specially published lists are annulled (annihilated) from December 1, 1917. The December coupons of these loans are not subject to payment.

2. In the same manner are annulled all guarantees given by the said governments on loans for different undertakings and institutions.

3. Unconditionally and without any exceptions, all foreign loans are annulled.

4. Short term obligations and series of the National Treasury remain in force. Interest will not be paid on them but the obligations themselves have currency on an equality with credit notes.

5. Citizens of small means owning the annulled national papers of the internal loans for a sum not exceeding ten thousand (10,000) rubles (nominal value) shall receive in exchange, certificates of the new loan of the Russian Socialistic Federative Soviet Republic for a sum not exceeding ten thousand (10,000) rubles. The conditions of the loan will be determined separately.

6. Deposits in national savings banks and interest on them remain unaffected. All obligations of the annulled loans belonging to savings banks are exchanged for book debts of the Russian Socialistic Federative Soviet Republic.

7. Co-operative local self-governing and other benevolent or democratic institutions owning obligations of the annulled loans will receive compensation on the basis of rules elaborated by the Supreme Soviet of National Government together with the representatives of these institutions, if it shall be shown that these obligations were acquired before the publication of the present decree.

NOTE.—Local organs of the Supreme Soviet of National Government shall determine what local institutions come under the head of benevolent or democratic.

8. The general management of the liquidation of national loans shall be carried out by the Supreme Soviet of National Government.

9. The entire work of the liquidation of loans shall be carried out by the national bank which shall also have the duty of registering immediately all those having in their possession, obligations of national loans and other interest bearing paper whether or not subject to annulment.

10. The Soviets of Workmen's Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies shall form commissions in co-operation with the local Soviets of popular government to determine which citizens are of moderate means.

These commissions have the right to annul in entirety, savings not gained by toil, even if these savings do not exceed five thousand (5,000) rubles.

(Signed) President of the Central Executive Committee, Y. Sverdlov.

Published January 28, 1918.

EXHIBIT 60.

DECREE ON ANNULMENT OF STATE LOANS PASSED AT THE MEETING OF THE CENTRAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE JAN. 21, 1918.

1. All State loans concluded by the governments of the Russian landowners and the Russian bourgeoisie, enumerated in a specially published list, are annulled (annihilated) from the 1st of December 1917. The December coupons of the said loans will not be paid.

2. In the same fashion are annulled all guarantees given by the above mentioned governments on loans issued by various enterprises and establishments.

3. All foreign loans are annulled unconditionally and without any exception.

4. The short term obligations and series of the State Treasury remain in force. The interest on these will not be paid, but the obligations themselves will have currency just the same as bank notes (trans. note credit notes).

5. Citizens of small means possessing annulled state papers of the interior loans in sums not exceeding 10,000 rubles (nominal value) will receive in exchange denominated certificates of the new loan of the Russian Socialistic Federative Soviet Republic in sum not to exceed 10,000 rubles. The conditions of the loans will be especially decided.

6. Deposits in the state savings banks and the interest on such deposits are inviolable. All obligations of the annulled loans belonging to the savings banks will be exchanged for a book debt of the Russian Socialistic Federative Soviet Republic.

7. Cooperative societies, local self-government organizations and other mutually advantageous and democratic establishments possessing bonds of the annulled loans will have their cases adjusted on the basis of rules to be worked out by the Supreme Council of National Economy together with the representatives of the said organizations, if it be proven that the bonds in the possession of the organizations were acquired before the publication of the present decree.

REMARK.—It is for the local organs of the Supreme Council of National Economy to decide which local establishments are to be considered mutually advantageous or democratic.

8. The general administration of the liquidation of the state loans will be in charge of the Supreme Council of National Economy.

9. The execution of the liquidation of the loans will be carried out by the State Bank, to whom it is made obligatory to proceed immediately to a registration of all holders of bonds of the various state loans, as well as other interest bearing papers, both those which have been annulled and which have not been annulled.

10. The Councils of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies will form, in accord with the Local Councils of National Economy, commissions who will determine which citizens are to be considered as "possessing small means."

These commissions will have the right to annul absolutely savings acquired otherwise than by labor, even if these savings do not exceed the sum of 5,000 rubles.

(Signed) Sverdlov, President of the Central Executive Committee.

(Published in No. 20 of the Gazette of the Temporary Workmen's and Peasants' Government, Jan. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 61.

ORDER CONCERNING THE EXECUTION OF DECREES FOR THE ANNULMENT OF THE STATE LOANS.

1. Persons possessing annulled shares or other annulled valuable papers in quantity greater than 10,000 rubles, but less than 25,000 rubles, retain the right to a living dividend from the first 10,000 rubles on the same basis as those possessors of annulled state loans who have not more than 10,000 rubles.

2. In the list of the annulled state loans cited in the decree of January 21, 1918, enter all state loans, without exception, which were issued up to October 25, 1917, excepting the small coupons of the "Liberty Loan," not exceeding 100 rubles in value.

3. Obligations of the State Treasury issued abroad before Oct. 25, 1917, are annulled.

4. Under persons mentioned in paragraph 1 of this order are understood only persons possessing annulled papers which were issued on the internal Russian market and which are now in Russia.

5. Persons having in safes gold in value not to exceed 10,000 rubles, if they have not other savings exceeding the amount prescribed in paragraph 1, will receive a life interest on the same, equal to the usual interest paid by the savings bank.

6. Instead of the payment of a life interest to persons possessing annulled papers in the sum not greater than 10,000 rubles, and also persons mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 5 of this order, the State Bank and its departments and officers may, upon declaration of such desire by these persons, transfer to accounts in their name in the local savings banks the principal sums assigned to them.

For the Department of Economic Politics of the Supreme Council of National Economy.

(Signed)

V. MILYUTIN.

LARIN.

S. SHEVERDIN, Business Manager.

(Published in No. 41 of the Gazette of the Workmen's and Peasants Government, March 7 (new style), 1918.)

EXHIBIT 62.

DECREE ON THE CIRCULATION OF CERTIFICATES OF THE LIBERTY LOAN AS CURRENCY NOTES.

1. The certificates of the Liberty Loan of value not higher than one hundred (100) rubles are issued at their face value by the national bank and shall be current within the boundaries of the Russian Soviet Federative Republic on an equality with credit notes.

2. The coupons beginning with the coupons of March, 1918, in conformity with the decree of nullification of loans will not be paid. The coupons shall be cut off when the certificates are put into circulation.

3. Whoever refuses to accept the certificates of the liberty loan as currency notes at their face value shall be liable to trial and punishment with all the severity of the revolutionary laws.

(Signed):

President of the Soviet of People's Commissaries, V. Ulianov (Lenin).

Secretary of the Soviet, N. Gorbunov.

Published, February 16, 1918.

EXHIBIT 63.

ORDER CONCERNING THE CIRCULATION AS SPECIE OF OBLIGATIONS OF THE "LIBERTY LOAN" AND OF COUPONS OF THE REPUDIATED STATES LOANS. MOSCOW DISTRICT EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE COUNCILS OF WORKMEN'S SOLDIERS' AND PEASANTS' DEPUTES.

In view of the misunderstandings which are arising in practice, the People's Commissariat of Finance makes the following explanations supplementary to the decrees of the Council of People's Commissars, which have been published in the "Collection of the Laws and Ordinances of the Workmen's and Peasants' Government" (No. 24, paragraph 332, and No. 27, paragraph 353), and which supersede the circular instruction to the State Bank.

1. Obligations of the "Liberty Loan" in denominations, not exceeding 100 rubles, are to circulate on a par with bank notes, and must be accepted in payment for any sum whatever at their nominal value with coupons or without.

2. Coupons of the interest bearing papers of the State (state, rents, internal and war loans, Liberty Loan) in all denominations, as well as mortgage bonds of the Bank of the Nobility and Peasants' Land Bank due before December 1st 1917, are ordered to be accepted without any discount whatever in making payments, and for all transactions.

3. The series of the State Treasury of all denominations are to be accepted at their nominal value with or without coupons.

4. The short term obligations of the State Treasury due before the 1st of November, 1918, are to be accepted on a par with bank notes in making large payments and without subtracting the unpaid interest.

The orders concerning the limits, within which the above large denomination bonds are to be changed into money, remain in force.

(Signed) Vice People's Commissar of Finance, I. Gukovski, May 30, 1918.

(Published in No. 113 of the Izvestia of the All Russian Central Executive Committee of the Soviets, June 5, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 64.

DECREE ABOLISHING COURTS OF THE OLD RÉGIME AND INSTITUTING OTHERS.

The Council of People's Commissaries resolves:

1. To abolish all existing general judicial institutions, such as district courts, courts of appeal, and the governing Senate with all its departments, military and naval courts of all grades, as well as commercial courts, and to replace all these institutions with courts organized on the basis of democratic elections.

Regarding the further procedure and the continuation of unfinished cases a special decree will be issued.

Beginning October 25 of this year, the passage of all time limits is stopped until the issuance of a special decree.

2. To abolish the existing institution of justices of the peace, and to replace the justices of the peace heretofore elected by indirect vote, by local courts consisting of a permanent local judge and two alternating jurors, the latter of whom are summoned in pairs to each session from special lists of jurors. Local judges are henceforth to be elected on the basis of direct democratic vote, and, until the time of such elections, are to be chosen by temporary ward, and cantonal Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies.

These same Soviets make up the lists of alternating jurors and determine the time of their presence at the session.

The former justices of the peace are not deprived of the right to be elected as local judges, either temporarily by the Soviets or finally by a democratic election, if they express their consent thereto.

Local judges adjudicate all civil cases to an amount not exceeding 3,000 rubles, and criminal cases if the accused is liable to a penalty of not more than two years' deprivation of freedom and if the amount sued for does not exceed 300 rubles. The verdicts and rulings of the local courts are final and no appeal can be taken against them. In cases in which the recovery of over 100 rubles in money or deprivation of freedom for more than seven days is adjudged, a request for review is allowed.

The court of cassation is the district session, and in the capitals the metropolitan session of local judges.

For the trial of criminal cases at the fronts, local judges are elected by regimental Soviets in the same order, and where there are none by the regimental committees.

Regarding procedure in other legal cases, a special decree will be issued.

3. To abolish all existing institutions of investigating magistrates and the procurator's office, as well as the grades of counsellors-at-law and private attorneys.

Until the reformation of the entire system of legal procedure the preliminary investigation in criminal cases is made by the local judges singly, but their orders of personal detention and indictment must be confirmed by the decision of the entire local court.

As to the functions of prosecutors and counsel for defense, who are allowed even in the stage of preliminary investigation, and in civil cases the functions of solicitors, all citizens of moral integrity of either sex, who enjoy civil rights, are allowed to perform them.

4. For the transfer and further direction of cases and suits, proceedings of the legal bodies as well as of officials engaged in preliminary investigation and the procurator's office, and also of the associations of counsellors-at-law, the respective local Soviets elect special commissaries, who take charge of the archives and the properties of those bodies.

All the lower and clerical personnel of the abolished institutions are ordered to continue in their positions and to perform, under the general direction of the commissaries, all duties necessary in order to dispose of unfinished cases, and also to give information on appointed days to interested persons about the state of their cases.

5. Local judges try cases in the name of the Russian Republic, and are guided in their rulings and verdicts by the laws of the Government which have been overthrown only in so far as those laws are not annulled by the revolution, and do not contradict the revolutionary conscience and revolutionary conception of right.

NOTE.—All these laws are considered annulled which contradict the decrees of the Central Executive Committee of the Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies and the Workmen's and Peasants' Government, also the minimum programmes of the Russian Socialist Democratic Labor Party and the party of Socialist-Revolutionaries.

6. In all disputed civil as well as criminal cases, of a private character, the parties may resort to an arbitration court. The organization of the arbitration court will be determined by a special decree.

7. The right of pardon and restoration of rights of persons convicted in criminal cases belongs henceforth to the judicial authorities.

8. For the struggle against the counter-revolutionary forces by means of measures for the defense of the revolution and its accomplishments, and also for the trial of proceedings against profiteering, speculation, sabotage, and other misdeeds of merchants, manufacturers, officials and other persons, workmen's and peasants' revolutionary tribunals are established, consisting of a chairman and six jurors, serving in turn, elected by the provincial or city Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies.

For the conduct of the preliminary investigation on such cases, special investigating commissions are formed under the above Soviets.

All existing investigating commissions are abolished, and their cases and proceedings are transferred to the newly formed investigating Commissions.

Pres. of Coun. of Peo. Com.—V. Ulianov (Lenin).

Commissaries: A. Shlikhter, L. Trotsky, A. Shlapnikov, I. Dzhugashvili (Stalin), N. Avilov (N. Glabov) and P. Stuchka.

(Collection of laws and ordinances 50. Translation from Nation corrected).
November 24, 1917.

EXHIBIT 65.

INSTRUCTIONS TO THE REVOLUTIONARY TRIBUNAL.

The Revolutionary Tribunal is guided by the following instructions:

1. The Revolutionary Tribunal has jurisdiction in cases of persons (a) who organize uprisings against the authority of the Workmen's and Peasants' Government, actively oppose the latter or do not obey it, or call upon other persons to oppose or disobey it; (b) who utilize their position in the state or public service to disturb or hamper the regular progress of work in the institution or enterprise in which they are or have been serving (sabotage, concealing or destroying documents or property, etc.); (c) who stop or reduce production of articles of general use without actual necessity for so doing; (d) who violate the decrees, orders, binding ordinances and other published acts of the organs of the Workmen's and Peasants' Government, if such acts stipulate a trial by the Revolutionary Tribunal for their violation; (e) who, taking advantage of their social or administrative position, misuse the authority given them by the revolutionary people. Crimes against the people committed by means of the press are under the jurisdiction of a specially instituted Revolutionary Tribunal.

2. The Revolutionary Tribunal for offenses indicated in Article 1 imposes upon the guilty the following penalties: (1) fine, (2) deprivation of freedom, (3) exile from the capitals, from particular localities, or from the territory of the Russian Republic, (4) public censure, (5) declaring the offender a public enemy, (6) deprivation of all or some political rights, (7) sequestration or confiscation, partial or general, of property, (8) sentence of compulsory public work.

The Revolutionary Tribunal fixes the penalty, being guided by the circumstances of the case and dictates of the revolutionary conscience.

3. (a) The Revolutionary Tribunal is elected by the Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies and consists of one permanent chairman, two permanent substitutes, one permanent secretary and two substitutes, and forty jurors. All persons, except the jurors, are elected for three months and may be recalled by the Soviets before the expiration of the term.

(b) The jurors are selected for one month from a general list of jurors by the Executive Committees of the Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies by drawing lots, and lists of jurors numbering six, and one or two in addition, are made up for each session.

(c) The session of each successive jury of the Revolutionary Tribunal lasts not longer than one week.

(d) A stenographic record is kept of the entire proceedings of the Revolutionary Tribunal.

(e) The grounds for instituting proceedings are: reports of legal and administrative institutions and officials, public, trade, and party organizations, and private persons.

(f) For the conduct of the preliminary investigation in such cases an investigating commission is created under the Revolutionary Tribunal, consisting of six members elected by the Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies.

(g) Upon receiving information or complaint, the investigating commission examines it and within 48 hours either orders the dismissal of the case, if it does not find that a crime has been committed, or transfers it to the proper jurisdiction, or brings it up for trial at the session of the Revolutionary Tribunal.

(h) The orders of the investigating commission about arrests, searches, abstracts of papers, and releases of detained persons are valid if issued jointly by three members. In cases which do not permit of delay such orders may be issued by any member of the investigating commission singly, on the condition that within twelve hours the measure shall be approved by the investigating commission.

(i) The order of the investigating commission is carried out by the Red Guard, the militia, the troops, and the executive organs of the Republic.

(j) Complaints against the decisions of the investigating commission are submitted to the Revolutionary Tribunal through its president and are considered at executive sessions of the Revolutionary Tribunal.

(k) The investigating commission has the right: (a) to demand of all departments and officials, as well as of all local self-governing bodies, legal institutions and authorities, public notaries, social and trade organizations, commercial and industrial enterprises, and governmental, public, and private credit institutions, the delivery of necessary documents and information, and of unfinished cases; (b) to examine, through its members or special representatives, the transactions of all above enumerated institutions and officials in order to secure necessary information.

4. The sessions of the Revolutionary Tribunal are public.

5. The verdicts of the Revolutionary Tribunal are rendered by a majority of votes of the members of the Tribunal.

6. The legal investigation is made with the participation of the prosecution and defence.

7. (a) Citizens of either sex who enjoy political rights are admitted at the will of the parties as prosecutors and counsel for the defence, with the right to participate in the case.

(b) Under the Revolutionary tribunals a collegium of persons is created who devote themselves to the service of the law, in the form of public prosecution as well as of public defence.

(c) The above-mentioned collegium is formed by the free registration of all persons who desire to render aid to revolutionary justice, and who present recommendations from the Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies.

8. The Revolutionary Tribunal may invite for each case a public prosecutor from the membership of the above-named collegium.

9. If the accused does not for some reason use his right to invite counsel for defence, the Revolutionary Tribunal, at his request, appoints a member of the collegium for his defence.

10. Besides the above-mentioned prosecutors and defence, one prosecutor and one counsel for defence drawn from the public present at the session, may take part in the court's proceedings.

11. The verdicts of the Revolutionary Tribunal are final. In case of violation of the form of procedure established by these instructions, or the discovery of indications of obvious injustice in the verdict, the People's Commissary of Justice has the right to address to the Central Executive Committee of the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies a request to order a second and last trial of the case.

12. The maintenance of the Revolutionary Tribunal is charged to the account of the state. The amount of compensation and the daily fees are fixed by the Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies. The jurors receive the difference between the daily fees and their daily earnings, if the latter are less than the daily fees; at the same time the jurors may not be deprived of their positions during the session.

December 19, 1917

(The Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 66.

DECREE ON THE NATIONALIZATION OF THE PRESS.

In the serious decisive hour of the revolution and the days immediately following it the Provisional Revolutionary Committee was compelled to adopt a whole series of measures against the counter revolutionary press of all shades.

Immediately on all sides cries arose that the new socialistic authority was violating in this way the essential principles of its program by an attempt against the freedom of the press.

The Workers' and Soldiers' Government draws the attention of the population to the fact that in our country behind this liberal shield there is practically hidden the liberty for the richer class to seize into their hands the lion's share of the whole press and by this means to poison the minds and bring confusion into the consciousness of the masses.

Every one knows that the bourgeois press is one of the most powerful weapons of the bourgeoisie. Especially in this critical moment when the new authority, that of the workers and peasants, is in process of consolidation, it was impossible to leave this weapon in the hands of the enemy at a time when it is not less dangerous than bombs and machine guns. This is why temporary and extraordinary measures have been adopted for the purpose of cutting off the stream of mire and calumny in which the yellow and green press would be glad to drown the young victory of the people.

As soon as the new order will be consolidated, all administrative measures against the press will be suspended; full liberty will be given it within the limits of responsibility before the laws, in accordance with the broadest and most progressive regulations in this respect.

Bearing in mind, however, the fact that any restrictions of the freedom of the press, even in critical moments, are admissible only within the bounds of necessity, the Council of People's Commissaries decrees as follows:

General rules on the press.—1. The following organs of the press shall be subject to be closed: (a) Those inciting to open resistance or disobedience towards the Workers' and Peasants' Government; (b) those sowing confusion by means of an obviously-calumnious perversion of facts; (c) those inciting to acts of a criminal character punishable by the penal laws.

2. The temporary or permanent closing of any organ of the press shall be carried out only by a resolution of the Council of People's Commissaries.

3. The present decree is of a temporary nature and will be revoked by special ukaz when the normal conditions of public life will be reestablished.

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaries, Vladimir Oulianoff (Lenin).

October 28, 1917.

EXHIBIT 67.

DECREE ON THE REVOLUTIONARY TRIBUNAL OF THE PRESS.

1. Under the Revolutionary Tribunal is created a Revolutionary Tribunal of the Press. This Tribunal will have jurisdiction of crimes and offences against the people committed by means of the press.

2. Crimes and offences by means of the press are the publication and circulation of any false or perverted reports and information about events of public life, in so far as they constitute an attempt upon the rights and interests of the revolutionary people.

3. The Revolutionary Tribunal of the Press consists of three members, elected for a period not longer than three months by the Soviet of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies. These members are charged with the conduct of the preliminary investigation as well as the trial of the case.

4. The following serve as grounds for instituting proceedings: reports of legal or administrative institutions, public organizations, or private persons.

5. The prosecution and defence are conducted on the principles laid down in the instructions to the general Revolutionary Tribunal.

6. The sessions of the Revolutionary Tribunal of the Press are public.

7. The decisions of the Revolutionary Tribunal of the Press are final and are not subject to appeal.

8. The Revolutionary Tribunal imposes the following penalties: (1) Fine, (2) expression of public censure, which the convicted organ of the Press brings to the general knowledge in a way indicated by the Tribunal, (3) the publication in a prominent place or in a special edition of a denial of the false report, (4) temporary or permanent suppression of the publication or its exclusion from circulation, (5) confiscation to national ownership of the printing-shop or property of the organ of the Press if it belongs to the convicted parties.

9. The trial of an organ of the press by the Revolutionary Tribunal of the Press does not absolve the guilty persons from general criminal responsibility.

December 18, 1917.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 68.

DECREE ON GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

Taking into consideration on the one hand the idleness which for various reasons exists among printers, and on the other the scarcity of books, the People's Commission on Education, through its literary publishing department and in coöperation with the departments of education outside the schools, school departments, and departments of science and art, and with the assistance of representatives of the printers' union and other interested societies, as the Commission shall see fit, and of experts specially invited by it, shall immediately undertake extensive publication.

First in order must come a cheap popular edition of the Russian classics. Those works for which the period of authors' rights has ended must be republished.

The works of all authors thus transferred from private to public ownership may, by a special order of the National Commissioner on Education regarding each author, be declared a Government monopoly, for a period, however, not exceeding five years. The Commission is to make use of this right with regard to those literary celebrities whose works, in accordance with this law, become the property of the people.

The publication of these works may be arranged in two series:

A complete scientific edition, the editorship of which should be entrusted to the department of Russian language and letters of the Academy of Sciences (after its democratization and adaptation to the new governmental and public life of Russia);

An abbreviated edition of selected works. Each selection is to constitute a single, compact volume. In the selection the editor is to be guided, among other considerations, by the suitability of the works to the working people, for whose benefit these popular editions are intended. Both the entire collection and separate, more important works are to be accompanied by prefaces by authoritative critics, historians of literature, etc. To edit these popular publications a special college should be created of prominent representatives of educational, literary, and scientific societies, specially invited experts, and delegates of workmen's organizations. Editors, confirmed by this Commission of Publication Control, must present to that body their plans of publication together with their commentaries of every description.

The popular edition of classics is to be sold at cost, and, if means shall permit, even below cost, and may even be given free through the libraries which serve the working democracy.

The Government Publishing House should further see to the publication of all sorts of text-books. The bringing up to date and correction of old manuals should be carried on through a special commission on manuals, consisting of delegates from educational, scientific, and democratic organizations and specially invited experts.

The Government Publishing House is likewise granted the right to subsidize publications, both periodicals and books, undertaken by societies and individuals and acknowledged to be useful to the general public, with the proviso that these subsidies, if the publication proves to be profitable, shall be refunded to the Government as a first lien.

In order to undertake immediately this important public business of the Soviet of People's Commissaries, it is proposed to appropriate and place at the disposal of the Government Commission on Education the sum of a million and a half rubles.

All printing orders should be given exclusively at the direction of the Printers' Union, which regulates its distribution through the autonomous commissions of the various printing offices.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 69.

DECREE ON THE INTRODUCTION OF A STATE MONOPOLY ON ADVERTISEMENTS.

1. The printing of advertisements for a fixed price in the periodical journals and newspapers, also in digests and on playbills, and likewise the placing of advertisements in kiosks, advertising offices, etc., shall be from now on a monopoly of the State.

2. Such advertisements may be printed only in the publications of the Provisional Workmen and Peasant Government in Petrograd and in those of the local soviets of Workmen and Soldiers Delegates. All publications in which such advertisements will be printed without a special right thereto shall be closed.

3. The owners of newspapers, offices for the inserting of advertisements and also all the employees of such offices, or any other institutions of the same kind, shall be bound to remain at their posts until the enterprise will be taken over by the State in the person of the afore named organs, and they shall be responsible for the order therein, the uninterrupted continuation of the work of the enterprise and the handing over to the publications of the Soviets of all private advertisements and also of all sums of money paid for the same, together with the whole accountancy and the documents.

4. All the managers of publications and enterprises inserting advertisement for a remuneration and likewise all employees and workmen of such enterprises shall immediately assemble into meetings and form towns unions and later on an All-Russian Union for a successful and regular organization of the business of receiving and placing private advertisements in the publications of the Soviets, and for the elaboration of rules for the best methods of receiving and printing of such advertisements which would be most convenient to the population.

5. Persons guilty of holding back any documents or sums of money or of refusing to comply with clauses 3 and 4 (of sabotage) shall be punished by the confiscation of their property and they shall be liable to imprisonment for a term of up to three years.

6. The insertion of advertisements for a remuneration in private publications in the form of reports or accounts, or articles of reclamation, or in any other hidden form shall entail the same penalties.

7. The enterprises for the reception and placing of advertisements shall be confiscated by the State with the payment to their owners in case of need of temporary subsidy from the State. The owners of smaller enterprises, and all sleeping partners or shareholders of the confiscated enterprises shall be reimbursed in full.

8. All publishers, advertising officers and enterprises printing advertisements for remuneration are bound to inform immediately the Soviets of Workmen and Soldiers Delegates of their place of business and to proceed forthwith to the handing over of their affairs and advertisements under the liabilities stated in Clause 5.

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaries, V. Oulianoff (Lenin).

People's Commissary for Instruction, A. V. Lunacharsky.

Countersigned: Secretary of the Council, N. Gorbounoff.

November 12th, 1917.

EXHIBIT 70.

STATEMENT ON THE ACTIVITY OF THE LITERARY PUBLICATION'S BOARD, ATTACHED TO THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSARIAT ON EDUCATION.

On December 13th, 1917, at the session of the Literary Publication Board a committee was named to draft a decree ordering the establishment of a Technical Board to take charge of state printing shops, including all those printing shops which had been nationalized after October revolution. This committee was composed of representatives from the Literary Publication Board, from the Commissariat of Interior Printers' Trade Union and a committee of workers employed in state printing shops.

In February, 1918, owing to energetic activity of the Soviet and representatives of the printing trades, publishing business on a large scale was made possible. The state Commission on Education made up a list of Russian novelists, men, poets, and critics whose works were declared a state monopoly for 5 years. This list includes the names of over 50 Russian classics such as: Soloviev, M. Bakunin, V. Belinski, V. Garshin, A. Herten, N. Gogol, F. Dostoyevsky, A. Koltsov, M. Lermontov, Nekrasov, A. Pushkin, L. Tolstoi, J. Turgenev, A. Tchekhov and others.

July 4 at Moscow was established a committee on Literature and Art. Among its members are the writer V. Bruisov and V. Grabar the painter.

A committee was also formed to publish popular scientific books. This committee has two sections,—political-economy and natural science. The latter includes: Professors—K. A. Timiriavov, A. K. Timiriavov, A. Michailov, Wolf, P. Walden, and others.

A number of brochures, (original and translations) have been already published by the committee, the subjects being: astronomy, Physics, meteorology, botany, pedagogy. As regards the publication of text books the state Commission already on Dec. 4, 1917, created a special commission to take charge of the work.

A semi-annual appropriation of 12 million rubles has been granted to the Literary Publication Board. The appropriation for the second half year may reach 20 millions.

EXHIBIT 71.

DECREE OF THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSAR OF THE POST AND TELEGRAPH.

The Government of the Soviets of Workmen, Soldiers, and Peasants can not and does not wish to proceed, in the determination of its normal relations to the employees and workmen of the governmental institutions, in the same order as the bourgeois autocracy, in which for centuries all bourgeois governments usually proceed. The label of civil service was formerly the implement of rightlessness and the stamp of a slave. From now on all the workers of the post and telegraph shall be on full social equality with all the proletariat, proud of its struggle, its liberty and its successes.

To this effect a series of measures have been adopted as follows:

(1) All the regulations and instructions limiting the rights of the professional organisations of the post and telegraph employees, as for instance Circular No. 8 published by Tseretelli June 26th 1917, will be revised and replaced by others, or revoked.

(2) The professional unions of workers of the post and telegraph will be given the right to engage and dismiss employees and the right of recusal of the chief. The Post and Telegraph Union will be invited to the formation of the college which together with myself as the representative of the Central State Power will administer the Ministry of Post and Telegraph. All the rights of a workers' control over the management of the enterprise will be granted also to the post and telegraph workers.

(3) The post and telegraph are the property of the revolutionary people, they will be cleared of all counter revolutionary elements which shall be replaced by the faithful sons of the people. In particular there will be removed the functionaries of the administration who were dismissed in the first days of the revolution, in the beginning of March, and afterwards received again notwithstanding the protests of the professional organisation. In future, in case of a vote of mistrust against the chiefs on the part of the employees this question will be decided by the executive organs of the circuit organisations or the local ones equal to them.

(4) The complete social insurance of the proletariat against unemployment, old age, orphanage or widowhood and against the loss of working capacity shall be applied to the employees and workmen of the post and telegraph, on the account of the state, who is their employer.

(5) The material position of all the post and telegraph employees and workmen, especially the lower ones, shall be revised and made to correspond to the high prices, and in accordance with the resolution of the 2nd Post and Telegraph Congress. The conditions and the order of work will be based on the principles of democratisation and respect to the public importance of free citizens.

All this programme, the establishment of normal relations in the province of the work of the service will be the basis for a healthy development of our business itself, and the meaning of our activity—to serve the population with post and telegraphs. After the war an energetic development of the whole postal and telegraph system is to be foreseen and the soon-to-be-expected end of the war will open the way forward to all the faithful guards of the revolution, who will discontinue the criminal sabotage, return promptly to work and thus secure for themselves a solid position in the army of workers of the post and telegraph.

There shall be no return to the past. Neither will the bourgeoisie coalition return, the workmen and soldiers will not lay down their arms. The Soviet Government does not look backward but forward and it says loudly to you, workers of the post and telegraph business: here is our programme, this is whither we are going, and now choose; with us—you will drop your chains; against us—and you will acquire the burning branding hatred of the proletariat. But with or without you the post and telegraph will remain in the hands of the revolution and the revolution will not wait. The counter-revolutionary political sabotage inspired by hidden monarchists, will be removed—whether by means of a declaration of readiness to work with your comrades, or by the severe measures of the revolutionary dictatorship.

And to you, comrades, lower employees and workmen, to you, who are nearest to the original kernel of the proletariat, according to your position, spirit and interests, I, nominated Peoples Commissary by the will of the proletariat and the revolutionary soldiers, address myself with special words. Read the programme, read this declaration,—and see who is leading you to sabotage, to a struggle against the government of workmen soldiers and peasants, who is carelessly playing with your fate, your position, challenging the hardly repressed anger of the revolution. Look, are there not among you those who bowed respectfully before the Sturmers and Savotianoffs,—and for whom it is derogatory to have to do with a government of peasants and workmen. Look, lower employees and workmen, whom are you following, and whither are you being lead by the enemies of the revolution.

Petrograd, November 3rd, 1917.

In the name of the Government of the Russian Republic, People's Commissary, N. P. Aviloff.

EXHIBIT 72.

REGULATIONS OF THE COMMISSARIAT OF POST AND TELEGRAPHS FOR A NEW SCHEDULE OF SALARIES OF THE POSTAL AND TELEGRAPH OFFICIALS.

In order to bring the assessment of salaries of the Postal Telegraph employees in conformity with the high cost of living and with the assessment of salaries taken in other governmental institutions, a new schedule of salaries will be put into effect beginning with the 1st of January 1918, for three months to wit: January, February and March, in accordance with the attached herewith scale.

At the same time are annulled beginning the 1st of January 1918 all former money bonuses, to wit: rentals, boardings, diurnals, percentage bonuses, remunerations, dietals of the evacuation officials and others.

Nomenclature of employees.	Names of districts—Assessment of salaries per month in roubles.
	Petrograd, Moscow, Archangel, Murman.	Petrograd, Moscow, Orloff, Smolensk, and Tambov.	Kazan, Nizhni, Nov-Gorod, Samara, Saratov.	Kiev, Minsk, Odessa, Kishinev, Perm., Riga, and Pri-Anzur.	Jekaterinoslav, Rostok, Charkoff, Irkutsk, Dagestan, Black Sea.	Tiflis and Turkestan.	Omsk, Tomsk and Vladikavkas.
(1) Office messengers, special delivery messengers and mail drivers, watchmen, and other employees of the lower class and permanent Government workmen.	270 *300 320 360	255 280 305 330	215 270 295 320	235 *260 285 310	230 *255 280 305	205 *230 255 280	190 215 240 265
(2) Chiefs of the Post & Telegraph Dep'ts., the Post and Tel. Officials of the 6th rank, scribes of the Dep'ts., masters of the 3rd rank.	285	200z	260z	240	240	215	200.

Nomenclature of employees.	Names of districts—Assessment of salaries per month in roubles.
	Petrograd, Moscow, Archangel, Murman.	Petrograd, Moscow, Orloff, Smolensk, and Tambov.	Kazan, Nizhni, Novgorod, Samara, Saratov.	Kiev, Minsk, Odessa, Kishinev, Perm, Riga, and Fri-Amur.	Jekaterinoslav, Rostok, Charkoff, Irkutsk, Dagestan, Black Sea.	Tiflis and Turkestan.	Omsk, Tomsk and Vladivkas.
(3) Postal Tel. Officials of the 5th rank, assistant bureau-chiefs of the 6th rank, the chiefs of the Postal & Telegraph Dep'ts., Mail Delivery Officials of the 2nd rank, district accounting officials.	330	310	300	290	290	250	245
(4) Postal-Telegraph Officials of the 4th rank, bureau-chiefs of the 6th class, the assistant bureau-chiefs of the 5th class; substitute mail delivery officials of the 1st rank, the assistant district bookkeepers, overseer of the lower rank, entry-men and district archive keepers.	375	355	345	335	330	305	390
(5) The Postal and Telegraph officials of the 3rd rank; bureau-chiefs of the 4th class; overseers of higher rank; the assistants of the district executive officials, masters of 2nd rank.	405	385	375	365	360	385	320
(6) Postal-telegraph officials of the 2nd rank; bureau-chiefs of the 4th class; the assistant bureau-chiefs of the 3rd class; district officials on special duty; district bookkeepers; the younger mechanics of lower rank; district field service and telegraph officials.	450	430	420	410	405	380	365
(7) Postal-telegraph officials of the 1st rank; bureau-chiefs of the 3rd class; the assistant bureau-chiefs of the 2nd class; the younger mechanics of higher rank; post office auctioneer; officials of the money order department; district money order officials; younger district mechanics; master of the 1st rank.	500	480	470	460	455	430	415
(8) Assistant district-chiefs; assistant of the department chiefs of mail transports; bureau chiefs of 2nd class; assistant bureau-chiefs of the 1st class; elder mechanics; mail sorters at post offices; elder district mechanics.	600	580	570	560	555	535	520
(9) Assistant Post directors; assistant bureau chiefs without rank; chiefs of bureaus of the 1st class; of the Depts. of the Post transportation; chief mechanics.	700	680	670	660	655	635	620
(10) Post directors; chiefs of the telegraph Dep't; of the districts; of bureaus without denomination.	800	780	770	760	755	735	720

People's Commissary of the Ministry of Post and Telegraphs, P. Proshan.

Manager of the 5th Department bookkeeper, A. Chasov.

January 13th, 1918.

(Made public in the 14th number of the "Journal of the Workmen and Peasant" Government, on January 21st, 1918.)

ЕХНІВІТ 73.

DECREE ON THE DISSOLUTION OF THE STATE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INSTRUCTION.

In the first days of the revolution the democracy created a series of laws for the purpose of raising the public instruction interests of the popular masses.

Not one of the law projects of this Committee has been published and the Committee itself has not been up to now confirmed by the State authority as a State institution.

In my decree regarding the institution of a State Commission of Public Instructions of November 9th I pointed out that the State Commission shall enter into cooperation with the State Committee in order to transform it into a State institution for the elaboration of law projects.

But as many of the members of the Committee who had entered it as representatives of the executive organs of the democracy and the Ex-State Duma have lost their powers from the moment of the transfer of the authority into the hands of the Workmen and Peasant Government and the re-election of the Central Executive Committee of the Soviet of Workmen, Soldiers and Peasant Delegates, and as the State Committee in need of a greater democratisation.

I. DECLARE: The State Committee in its present formation is dissolved and its work is suspended until a new Committee will be formed on the following principles:

From the C. E. C. of the Soviet of W., S. & P. Delegates, 20 representatives; from the All-Russian Teacher's Union, 8 representatives; from the Soviet of the All-Russian Cooperative Congresses, 8; from the All-Russian Zemstvo Union (when the same will be reorganized on democratic principles), 2; the Pedagogical Commission of the Union of Towns, 2; the Socialistic Organisations of each nation, 1 each; the All-Russian Student Union, 3; the All-Russian Union of pupils of the middle schools, 2; the Academical Union, 5; the All-Russian Central Bureau of Professional Unions, 5; the All-Russian Central Committee of Educational proletarian organisations, 1; the All-Russian Central Bureau of the Factory Committees, 1; the Petrograd Committee of Socialistic Youth (until an All-Russian organisations will be formed), 1; the All-Russian Parents' Union (when it will be reorganised), 1.

As soon as the new State Committee will meet an extraordinary session of the State Committee with the State Commission will be convened; the subject submitted to its handling will be the revision of the law projects already elaborated by the committee, said revision being necessitated by the circumstance that in working them out the Committee had to reckon with the bourgeois spirit of the former ministries.

Signed:

People's Commissary for the Public Instruction, A. Lunacharsky.

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaries, V. Oulianoff (Lenin).

Manager of the Affairs of the Council, Vl. Bonch-Bruевичh.

Secretary of the Council, N. Gorbomoff.

November 23th, 1917.

EXHIBIT 74.

DECREE ON THE CREATION OF A STATE COMMISSION OF EDUCATION.

Provision for the organization of people's education in the Russian Socialist Proletarian Republic.

(1) General direction of work connected with people's education in the Russian Federated Socialist Soviet Republic is intrusted to a State Commission of Education whose chairman is the People's Commissary of Education.

(2) The membership of the State Commission is as follows:

(a) By appointment—members of the Commissariat's Collegium; all department heads of the Commissariat; the chief clerk of the Commissariat and the secretary of the State Commission.

(b) Elected—3 representatives of the Central Executive Committee; 3 representatives of professional teacher's organizations accepting the platform of the Soviet Government; 2 representatives of the Central Bureau of Trade Unions, 1 representative of the Central Bureau of Labor cooperatives and 1 representative of the Central Culture organization.

(c) In the capacity of representatives of Departments.—1 member of the Commissariat of Education in charge of the Bureau of Nationalities and 1 member of the Supreme Soviet of National Economy.

NOTE 1.—A right is reserved for the delegates of the People's Commissariat in charge of Nationalities to invite to the session of the State Commission, in advisory capacity, a representative of the nationality the cultural institutions of which are under discussion at the particular session.

NOTE 2.—In the course of the formation of new regional divisions their representatives, one from each region, become members of the State Commission, with the right to vote.

NOTE 3.—The State Commission has also the right to augment its membership with representatives of other organizations—cultural, professional, students, etc., in case these organizations have a clearly defined all-Russian character and accept the platform of the Soviet Government.

(3) The management of the People's Commissariat of Education is entrusted in the hands of a Collegium including: The People's Commissary, his assistant, and five members.

(4) The People's Commissary is elected by the Central Executive Committee of the Soviet of Workmen's Peasants, Red Guard Army's and Cossacks' Deputies; the assistant of the People's Commissary and the members of the Collegium are elected by the Soviet of People's Commissaries at the recommendation of the People's Commissary of Education.

(5) The Collegium appoints directors to various Departments of the Commissariat, a chief clerk of the Commissariat and a secretary of the State Commission of Education.

(6) In addition to matters enumerated in other articles of this act the following duties are also within the jurisdiction of the State Commission: The formulation of a general plan of People's Education in the Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic, and the establishment of fundamental principles governing the People's Education, as well as those of school reconstruction; the coordination of cultural activity in localities; the drafting of a budget and the distribution of means appropriated for common Federal cultural needs; as well as other matters of fundamental significance submitted for consideration to the State Commission by the Commissariat's Collegium.

NOTE.—Single members of the State Commission have the right to demand a discussion of matters they consider of principal importance only in case their statement is sustained by not less than one-third of all members of the Commission.

(7) In addition to matters enumerated in other articles of this statement, the People's Commissariat of Education has a direct charge of institutions of learning and academic instruction of a state-wide importance, and passes its final judgment on questions and conflicts arising between various organizations of educational activity.

(8) The State Commission calls and convenes, periodically, an All-Russian Congress of Education to which it submits a report of its activity and to whose consideration it submits for discussion questions of great importance coming within the jurisdiction of the State Commission.

(9) An All-Russian Congress of Education comprises: (a) Elected representatives of Departments and Soviets of People's Education from each province (gubernia) in the following ratio: 1 representative from each provincial Department and Soviet; from all county Departments and Soviets of the province—two from Departments and two from Soviets; from all volost Soviets and Departments, also two from Soviets and two from Departments of each province; (b) full representation of the state Commission, (c) competent persons in advisory capacity.

(10) The direction of affairs connected with People's Education, such as primary education and instruction outside the academic walls, with the exception of higher education, is entrusted to Departments of People's Education, accordingly formed at the Executive Committees—Regional, Provincial, County and Volost.

(11) The Soviet of People's Education functions as a controlling and advisory organ attached to each Department of People's Education.

(12) All Departments and Soviets of People's Education act within boundaries, established by fundamental laws of the Republic; coordinate their activities in accordance with enactments of the State Commission of Education and follow instructions in the order: Volost, of county; county, of provincial; and provincial, of regional department of People's Education.

(13) A Volost Department of People's Education consists of members, not less than three, elected by executive committee of the Volost Soviet of Workmen Deputies, forming thus a Collegium.

NOTE.—A right is granted to a Volost Department to augment its membership by inviting representatives of settlements and volosti, in an advisory capacity.

(14) A Volost Department of People's Education is entrusted with carrying into effect the principle of universal literacy within the boundaries of the particular volost, it shall organize the social education and spread education among the entire volost population, aids in the developments of the initiative of the population in matters of People's Education.

(15) For the realization of aims enumerated in Article 1, the Department of People's Education (a) takes all measures for carrying into execution the provisions drafted by the State Commissions of Education, particularly those relating to a general programme of education; (b) has charge of schools and cultural and educational institutions, in conformity with corresponding orders of the State Commission and direct instructions of the County Department of People's Education; (c) drafts estimates and submits them for approval to the County Department of People's Education, should a need arise for using county funds; (d) submits to the County department of People's Education a report on its activity and state of affairs in regard to People's Education, these reports being submitted at appointed periods, but not fewer than twice a year, collects and supervises statistics of children of primary and school age and supervises their school attendance; (f) draws and supervises lists of candidates qualifying for the position of a teacher or director of institutions of primary education and, in cooperation with the Soviet of People's Education, organizes elections of teachers by the population; (g) calls and convenes, at appointed times a Volost Soviet of People's Education; (h) submits to the Soviet of People's Education detailed reports on its activity and acquaints the S. P. E. with applicable legislative and governmental enactments.

(16) A Volost Soviet of People's Education is formed of: (a) Representatives of all bodies having the right to send delegates to the Soviet of Workmen Deputies, representations being the same as those of the collectives in the S. W. D.; (b) representatives of teachers' personnel and those of pupils; (c) competent persons invited in advisory capacity.

NOTE 1.—The whole number of members of the Soviet of People's Education elected by the teachers and pupils must not exceed one third of the whole number of members of the S. P. E., with the right to vote.

(17) Sessions of the Volost Soviet of People's Education are open.

(18) Sessions of the Volost S. P. E. are all held at least once a month.

(19) A Volost Soviet of People's Education discusses the reports of the Supreme Department of People's Education, analyzes the Department reports on pressing legislative and other governmental acts and discusses the plan of organization pertaining to people's education within the volost.

(21) A County Department of People's Education is formed of members, not fewer than five, elected by the Executive Committee of the County's S. W. D. thus forming Collegiums.

(22) A County Department of People's Education has the following subdivisions: primary, education, school education and self-education outside academic walls, the charge of which subdivisions may be entrusted to specially invited experts by the Department.

(23) In addition to matters enumerated in other articles of this Provision, a county Department of People's Education directs the whole business of People's Education in the county; has charge of all educational institutions; corrects and approves estimates of Volost Departments of People's Education, should a need arise for using county funds; organizes the provision and distribution among the Volost Departments of the books and school appliances; issues instructions to Volost Departments of People's Education, calls and convenes at appointed periods county Soviet of People's Education and submits annual estimates to the Provincial Department of People's Education.

(24) The membership, problems and the order of business of a county Soviet of People's Education are being determined; within its jurisdiction area, in accordance with articles 16, 17, 19 and 20 of this Provision.

NOTE.—A county soviet of People's Education convenes not less than once in two months.

(25) A Provincial Department of People's Education is composed of members not less than seven, elected by Executive Committees of the Provincial Soviet of Workmen Deputies and thus forming a Collegium.

(26) In addition to matters enumerated in other articles of this Provision, a provincial Dept. of people's Education establishes institutions of learning, academic instruction and education of common provincial importance; issues instructions to the county and Volost departments of People's Education; examines and approves annual estimates, submitted by county departments of people's education; submits an annual estimate to the Regional Department of People's Education; calls periodic conferences of representatives of County Departments of People's Education, as well as all-provincial congresses of active social workers for promotion of people's education; drafts reports on the state of affairs of people's education in the particular province.

(27) The duties of Provincial Soviets of People's Education are: to determine provincial needs pertaining to education to prepare and develop general measures for promotion of education among the population of the province; to develop projects on school reform, to aid the Regional Department of People's Education in carrying into execution provisions established by the State Commission of Education.

(28) A Regional Soviet of People's Education is formed and acts in accordance with articles 16, 17, 19, 20 and 24 of this Provision.

NOTE.—Capital cities are regarded as separate provinces and are directly subordinated to Regional Departments.

(29) A Regional Department of People's Education is composed of members, not fewer than seven, elected by a Congress of Soviets Workmen's Deputies of a Region, thus forming a Collegium.

(30) A Regional Department of People's Education develops and approves a plan of all-regional measures pertaining to people's education; systematizes all annual estimates submitted by various Provincial Departments of People's Education; call periodic Regional Educational Congresses; opens educational courses, exhibitions, excursions, etc., controls the activity of cultural and educational institutions within boundaries prescribed by corresponding legislative enactments; and submits an annual report on the state of affairs in the sphere of people's education to the state Commission of Education.

Chairman of the Soviet of People's Commissaries, V. Oulianov (Lenin).

Acting People's Commissary of Education, Michael Pokrovsky.

Chief Clerk of the Soviet of People's Commissaries, V. Borch-Bruevich.

Correct:

Secretary of the Soviet, N. Gorbunov.

EXHIBIT 75.

REGULATION CONCERNING ADMISSION TO A HIGHER SCHOOL INSTITUTION OF THE RUSSIAN SOCIALIST FEDERATIVE SOVIET REPUBLIC.

1. Every person, regardless of citizenship and sex, reaching the age of 16, can be admitted as a member of the students' body to any of the higher school institutions without submitting a diploma or testimonial papers attesting graduation from a secondary or other school.

2. It is forbidden to demand from persons gaining entrance any certificates whatsoever, except their identification papers.

3. All school institutions of the Republic, in conformity with the decree on joint instruction, dated May 27, 1918, are thrown open to all, regardless of sex. All persons responsible for violating this decree shall be tried by the Revolutionary Tribunal.

4. Entrance of students—freshmen for the 1918–1919 course, already completed on the basis of either school certificates or competitive examinations, are hereby declared void. New entrance conditions in accordance with requirements of the general Provision on higher schools of the Republic, now in course of preparation, shall be published not later than September 1, 1918.

5. Tuition fee in higher school institutions of the Russian Socialist Federative Soviet Republic are henceforth abolished. Tuition fees already paid for the first half of the 1918–1919 academic year shall be refunded accordingly.

Chairman of the Soviet of People's Commissaries, V. Ulianov (Lenin).

Acting People's Commissary of Education, Pokrovsky.

Chief Clerk of the Soviet of People's Commissaries, V. Bonch-Bruevich.
Secretary of the Soviet, N. Gorbunov.

EXHIBIT 76.

REGULATION OF THE SOVIET OF PEOPLE'S COMMISSARIES CONCERNING STANDARD REMUNERATION FOR TEACHERS.

The Soviet of People's Commissaries decrees:

1. To establish a monthly remuneration for teachers, taking as a standard length of a working day 4 school hours a day. (24 hours or lessons a week).

2. Pending the establishment of a united school system to preserve remuneration on the basis of yearly hours in secondary schools and wherever such remuneration has hitherto been in practice. In primary and higher schools, seminaries, etc. where monthly payment has been in force such payments shall continue to be in force for teachers occupied with 4 hour school work a day (24 hours a week).

3. Classification of teachers into "regularly appointed" "unattached," "substitutes," etc., is abolished.

4. All teachers (regardless of the particular subject taught, including instructors of music, singing, domestic arts, manual labor and physical exercises) shall receive a remuneration for their school labor on the basis of common standard pay and have equal pension rights.

5. Up to July 1, 1918, the same basis of remuneration shall be applied to lessons given above the prescribed 24 hours standard.

NOTE.—An increase of the number of lessons above the standard for individual teachers shall be made in each single case in accordance with a special regulation of the Department of Public Education attached to the local Soviet of Workmen's Deputies.

6. Remuneration of the labor of chairmen of pedagogic councils, up to July 1, 1918, shall be adjusted to a remuneration on the basis of 12 yearly hours; vice-chairman and members of administrative and executive committees, 6 yearly hours; secretaries of pedagogic council and librarians and also clerks and bookkeepers of schools, school superintendents, 6 yearly hours; assistant school superintendents (ladies' school superintendents not in boarding schools), 18 yearly hours; instructors and ladies' school superintendents of boarding schools, 24 yearly hour.

7. An additional remuneration of labor in preparation of laboratory work shall be made to the extent of 20% of a yearly hour; remuneration of labor in correcting written tests shall be made to the extent of 10% of an yearly hour; new and ancient languages, 10%; Russian language and mathematics, 15%.

8. All living quarters, occupied by virtue of service, shall be paid for by the occupants, the amounts being fixed by respective departments of the Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies.

9. The duties of a clerk and bookkeeper at non-boarding schools shall be executed by one person.

NOTE.—Two positions fused into one shall be allowed to be dispatched by one person only by special permission from a Department of Public Education attached to the local Soviets of Workmen's Soldiers' and Peasants' Deputies.

10. The technical personnel shall be remunerated in accordance with a decree of the Soviet of People's Commissaries.

11. The following rule applies to teachers serving above the fixed term: every five years a raise of 600 rubles a year shall be paid to teachers having not less than 6 yearly hours in all schools, this raise being paid not longer than for 4 consecutive periods.

12. New standards of payments shall be in force beginning March 1, 1918, two categories being adopted for this purpose.

13. To the first category belong:

(a) all secondary schools and

(b) all higher grammar, technical, trades, agricultural schools, teachers' seminaries, normal schools and instructors of school and school-administration work.

14. To the second category belong: lower grammar, trades, lower agricultural schools and instructors for kindergarten training.

NOTE TO ARTICLES 13 AND 14.—The difference between the aforesaid remuneration scale and that of the actually received salary shall be paid to persons of the teachers' personnel, described in articles 13 and 14, beginning March 1, and the rest, beginning June 1.

NOTE 2 TO ARTICLES 13 AND 14.—Persons leaving service before publication of said decree shall forfeit their pension rights.

15. Monthly salaries to persons of the first category shall range from 600 to 400 rubles at Petrograd and Moscow, and for the second category—from 500 to 300.

16. Present remunerations likewise apply to private schools having the same governmental rights.

Chairman of the Soviet of People's Commissaries, V. Oulianov (Lenine).

Chief Clerk, V. Bonch-Bruevich.

Secretary of the Soviet of People's Commissaries, N. Gorbunov.

EXHIBIT 77.

DECREE ON THE APPROPRIATION OF 12,520,000 ROUBLES FOR SUBSIDIES TO TEACHERS.

Upon introduction of a bill by the People's Commissar of Education, the Soviet of People's Commissars has resolved:

Not going into the details as to the salaries of the teachers for 1919 and not deciding upon same finally, to allot to the Commissariat of Education a sum of 12,520,000 roubles for the distribution of subsidies to the teachers, so that each teacher should get an increase sufficient to make his salary 100 roubles per month.

The Chairman of the Soviet of People's Commissars: N. Ulianoff (Lenin).

People's Commissar of Education: A. B. Lunacharsky.

Chief Clerk: Vladimir Bonch-Bruевич.

Secretary of the Soviet: N. Gorbounoff.

(Published in the organ of the Provisional Workers' and Peasants' Government, January 3rd, 1918.)

(NOTE.—Each decree of the Soviet of Workers' and Peasants' becomes effective and must be enforced upon its publication in the official organ of the Government.)

EXHIBIT 78.

RESOLUTION OF THE SCHOOL SANITATION BOARD.

At the Congress of medical-sanitation held at Moscow, June 19, 1918, was read and discussed at great length the report from the school-sanitation board attached to the Commissariat of Public Instruction. The Section is entrusted with safeguarding the children's health and application of preventive measures in schools against tuberculosis and neurological diseases.

Hitherto in Russia little time was devoted to physical education of children and their hygienic conditions. At the present time the School Sanitation Board does the work of spreading physical education among children and of removal of conditions detrimental to students' health. To accomplish this the Board has established an Institute of Physical Education in Russia, experimental institutions (settlements, schools of forestry, schools-sanatoriums, ambulatories, etc.) and has been aiding labor organizations interested in the establishment of such institutions.

The following resolution of the School Sanitary Board was adopted:

1. The object of school sanitation within the boundaries of the Russian Soviet Republic is the safeguarding of children's health of all ages, physical as well as mental and a proper organization of physical education.

2. For the realization of this problem a central school-sanitation soviet is established at the Commissariat of Public Instruction, representatives of proletarian organizations and large masses of the population participating in the work.

3. Likewise, similar school-sanitation soviets are established in localities regulating and directing the local school-sanitation activity.

4. The directing organs in the matters of school sanitation are medical boards, elected by medical sanitary organizations such as The Soviet of Medical Boards or the Commissariat of Health and medical sanitary sections attached to the local soviets of workmen's deputies and approved by the Commissariat of Public Instruction. All these organizations are working in close contact with the Central Commissariat of Health as well as with the Commissariat of Public Instructions and sections attached thereto.

5. A school physician is a permanent and competent member of the pedagogic soviet and is actively engaged in school work. He is elected by the school-sanitary sub-section of the medical sanitary board and is approved by the Department of Public Instruction attached to the Soviet.

6. To safeguard the health of children and to render direct mental, moral and physical aid to children of imperfect health the school-sanitary sections (medical boards) establish special institutions: sanatoriums, schools of forestry for physically weak and sick children, auxiliary schools for underdeveloped children, auxiliary dispensaries, sanatoriums and agricultural settlements for exceptional forms of mental and physical deformity. School ambulatories are established for study, medical treatment and assigning children to proper institutions.

EXHIBIT 79.

ORDERS OF THE PEOPLE'S COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION OF THE WESTERN PROVINCES AND FRONT.

The following orders are selected from a group of six educational documents published at Petrograd, March 10, 1918. The omitted orders, Nos. 3-5, relate to the budget for 1919 and to routine matters. The private libraries mentioned in No. 2 apparently include only private circulating libraries.

No. 1. To all primary and secondary educational institutions of the western provinces.—I propose to the administration of all the above-mentioned educational institutions, from the date of the publication of this order, not to discharge students for non-payment of dues. As to those who have already been discharged before this order was published, they must immediately be reinstated.

I propose to all departments of public education in local Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies, to attend strictly to the carrying out of my order. The question of the legal position of students who have not paid their school dues will be explained in the near future.

No special notification will be given to each educational institution, and the present order becomes the law of the land from the date of its publication in the newspaper Sovietskaya Pravda (Soviet Truth).

No. 2. Having in mind to afford to the large popular masses access to books, the Commissariat on Public Education will shortly proceed to regulate the library business and its reorganization on new principles. In view of this the Commissioner directs that:

I. All libraries found within the boundaries of the western provinces and front, and belonging to municipalities, public institutions, or organizations of various sorts, or to private persons, are taken over for the benefit of public educational institutions in local Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies, and, in the city of Smolensk, by the local section of public education of the provincial commissariat.

II. All institutions, organizations, and private persons possessing libraries in the city of Smolensk must, within five days following the date of the publication of this order in the newspaper Sovietskaya Pravda, present to the commissariat on public education exact information concerning:

- (1) the location of the libraries belonging to them;
- (2) the number of volumes found in the libraries;
- (3) the contents of the libraries (complete catalogues of the books must be presented; and in case such do not exist, then general information concerning the character of the books collected);
- (4) the periodical publications subscribed to by the libraries;
- (5) the number of subscribers;
- (6) the rules adopted for the use of these books.

Note: This order does not affect persons who have libraries consisting of less than 500 volumes, if these libraries are not intended for public readers.

III. In case reading-rooms are found at those libraries, it is necessary to indicate:

- (1) the list of periodical publications found in the reading-room;
- (2) statistical data, if such are at hand, regarding the reading-room visitors.

IV. Institutions, organizations, and private persons possessing libraries outside the boundaries of the city of Smolensk and of the Government of Smolensk must present the information indicated above, within a week from the date of the publication of this order, in the proper section of local Soviets of Workmen's, Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies. The latter, upon receipt of the data, must furnish copies of the same to the Commissioner of Public Education of the Western Provinces and Front.

V. Those who fail to comply with this order will be turned over to the military revolutionary tribunal.

No. 6. It is the duty of all owners of moving-picture houses in the city of Smolensk, from the date of the publication of this order in the newspaper Sovietskaya Pravda, to present for approval to the provincial commissariat on public education the programmes and librettos of the pictures proposed to be exhibited by them.

It is forbidden to show pictures not approved by the Commissariat.

In those cases in which the Commissariat shall find it necessary, the pictures, before being shown to the public, must be shown for examination to persons specially designated by the Commissariat.

Moving-picture enterprises not complying with this order will be at once confiscated.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 80.

COMMISSARY LEPESHINSKY'S PAPER ON SCHOOL REFORM READ AT THE FIRST ALL-RUSSIAN CONGRESS OF TEACHERS' INTERNATIONALISTS. JUNE 2, 1918.

The Commissariat of People's Education has yet done very little in the field of reforms of people's education since the problem of people's education could be approached intelligently only after the removal of the Commissariat to Moscow.

It has become customary to accuse the new Government of indifference toward cultural values of the past, and particularly of disrupting the schools. Such an accusation is obviously wrong. In as much as the school represents wrong principles, breeding privileges and utilitarianism and is a servant of the ruling classes, it has been destroyed. Such a school system was an instrument to befog the masses' consciousness and it crippled the children physically and spiritually. This destruction of the old school system, as an integral part of the whole old social structure, was brought about not by a group of individuals but by the elemental force of life itself. History paved the way for such a destruction and it has become a pressing necessity of the present revolutionary period.

It is, however, not sufficient to take notice of this spontaneous destruction alone. The revolutionary classes of society, particularly their more advanced upper strata, their leading elements, must introduce into these elemental processes a maximum of intelligence and system. First, a surgical application is needed to remove all useless remnants of the past, yet creative activity is also needed, although it perhaps will, of necessity, be slow and cautious to begin with. The school has ceased to be an instrument in the hands of the exploiting classes; with the people's victory it has in reality become a people's school. And now the Commissariat of Education is busily engaged in transferring it into the hands of the people's government—the Soviet organs.

The school no longer needs teachers who simply are office holders, teachers appointed from above, teachers detached from the people. Our Commissariat emphasizes this circumstance suggesting the principle of electing teachers by local organs created by the population itself.

The school has ceased to be a source of privileges based on other values than intellect and knowledge. The Commissariat, therefore, is taking prompt action to abolish diplomas and certificates that gave all sorts of privileges to persons graduated from various branches of academic schooling.

The old school system was not a channel of education but an instrument of obscuring the people's mind. The revolution has swept away this school system. Governmental activity has brought out new problems before the school. Our Commissariat, as an educational centre, as a first step is engaged in the freeing the school from church influences and encroachments, the separation of the school from the church.

These first steps are only the beginnings of the task. Before us is still a long path of a tremendous and prolonged creative work of organization which shall ultimately give to the people the school they need in this period of reconstructing the life on a new basis in the period of the international struggle of the proletariat for Socialism.

Having this task in mind the Commissariat sounded a call inviting learned and practical individuals, people of extensive pedagogic training to participate in that task. The Commissariat of People's Education has opened widely the doors to all who wanted and could help. Something has already been done in this direction. Recently we created at the Commissariat of People's Education an educators' advisory board which in turn was subdivided into a number of sub-committees, these latter conducting a preliminary campaign in favor of the school reform and gradually formulating concrete problems, the solution of which shall determine the substance of our school-organization activity.

Our conception of a school is one from which religious services and teachings are absolutely barred. Secondly, a people's general education school must be compulsory and accessible to all, regardless of sex and social distinctions; it must be a school where tuition, books, etc., are free; and, lastly, we conceive the new school as a toiling unit. The school must be homogenous in the sense of a uniform type with a definite minimum amount of knowledge,—in the sense of uniformity of aims and problems grouped between two centres of gravitation—and in the bringing up of a harmonious individual and the problem of social development of the individual; and, finally, in the sense of establishing an organized connection between the various school grades and unimpeded promotion of students from lower grades to higher.

The principles underlying the development of the school, as a toiling unit, can be summarized thus:

1. An early fusion of productive labor with academic instruction is the mightiest weapon in the task of reconstruction of the modern society.

2. The technology of the present mode of production demands an all-around development of the individual who possesses the ability to work and is equipped with polytechnic knowledge for various industrial fields. Therefore, a school of general science must assume the character of a polytechnic (vocational) school, while specialization and professionalism are outside the scope of the general science school and are the problems of the higher schools or educational training outside academic walls.

3. Manual labor must form an integral element of school life; all school children must participate in productive labor. The useful results of such labor should be made obvious to the students having for its object either direct creation of useful articles of consumption (chiefly for the needs of the particular school), or creation of productive labor which only ultimately creates material blessings, as for an example, caring for cleanliness, hygienic conditions of life in schools, etc.

4. The school becomes a productive commune, i. e., both a producing and consuming body based on the following principles guiding the social education of children:

(a) The principle of school autonomy and collective self-determination in the process of mental and manual labor;

(b) The principle of satisfying all children's needs by the children themselves;

(c) The organization of social mental endeavor (scientific bodies, magazines, collective work, etc.)

5. The school must offer the widest possible opportunities for the full play of development of the creative forces of the child. To accomplish this the child must be reared amidst surroundings favorable to its mental and physical capacity, the existence of which should be propitious of the greatest possible harmonious development of the child's body and soul. Essential pre-requisites hereof are:

(a) Self-perseverance of children in various fields of school life, their independence and initiative while at work and their spirit of self-reliance in matters of everyday routine;

(b) Introduction of an educational system stimulating creative forces of the child;

(c) Artistic activity, as the chief element in the child's esthetic development guiding the passive emotional processes of its spiritual life.

(d) Methods of child's bringing-up and educational training of children change their former character in accordance with the new problems of the school. Attention in the matter of children's education should be chiefly aimed at bringing up a human being, as a social creature, and at understanding social labor: first, at the present time, then,—labor in the past human history, and, lastly, labor's problems in the coming future. There ought to exist an organic direct connection between the educational mental work in the school and the element of productive labor. Educational training is to be conducted in full conformity with the latest discoveries in psychology, physiology and pedagogy, and in particular in the direction from the known to the unknown, from the concrete to the abstract.

It seems to me that the people should receive a qualified knowledge, and this can be made possible only when the child will be attached to the school for a considerable length of time. It is urgent to create conditions whereby the majority of children of school age should be forced to pass a long course of instruction. Compulsory schools exist in many countries, why not here in Russia?

We ought not be afraid that there will be a lack of schools, and of teachers: we will gradually introduce an extensive educational course and accelerate the formation of a teacher's force.

All persons favorably disposed towards this cause should be recruited; we must also widely propagate our ideas, and with this object in view we commence to publish our information Bulletins on school reform work. These bulletins we shall freely circulate throughout Russia. However, what is most needed is not merely word-propaganda, but deeds. With this object the Commissariat of Education is organizing experimental schools. It would be an error to assume that here in the centre a tendency prevails to introduce bureaucratic methods in the management of schools. We wish to impose nothing on the people, and when we draw up certain plans, it is chiefly because the population itself, in the person of its organs of local social administrative units, require from us a general outline and directives.

EXHIBIT 81.

STATEMENT OF THE REPERTOIRE COMMITTEE OF THE ART-EDUCATIONAL SECTION.

The object of the Repertoire Committee is first, the drawing up of a repertoire for districts' theatres, and secondly, the preparation of a list of plays for workmen's theatres.

In the opinion of the Committee the following principles must underlie the preparation of the repertoire: (1) plays on the repertoire list must be artistic creations and adapted to the needs of the theatrical art; (2) they should heighten and strengthen the revolutionary spirit of the masses; (3) they should be optimistic in spirit.

Owing to insistent and continual requests from localities a preliminary list has been prepared including the following Russian and foreign dramatists.

Russian.—Gogol, Griboyedov, Shackovsky, Ostrovsky, Leo Tolstoi, Turgenev, Tchekhov, Suchovo-Kobulin, Tschedrin, Gorky, A. Tolstoi.

Foreign.—Calderon, Lope de Vega, Cervantes, Shakespeare, Baumarche, Moliere, Schiller, Blanche, Ibsen, Shaw, Romain Rolland, Verhaeren, Della-Grazia, Mirbot, Hauptman.

The plays approved by the Committee will contain short reviews, written by the members of the Committee containing: (a) fabula and central idea of the play, (2) characterization of the stage personages, (3) possible cuts and change of scenes, (4) illustrative points on scenery and costumes (preferably accompanied by schematic drawings). These reviews will be later published by the Committee as separate leaflets.

Besides, the Committee is preparing for publication a number of books on the theatre. The subjects of these books are: (1) stage-craft, (2) scenic decorations, (3) the art of make-up, (4) costumes, (5) rhythm gymnastics, (6) drama and opera, (7) studio work, (8) working over assigned parts.

EXHIBIT 82.

DECREE OF THE COMMISSARIAT OF SOCIAL WELFARE CREATING A "PALACE OF MOTHERHOOD."

For the purpose of solving questions of immediate importance in respect to the protection and care of motherhood as a social function of a woman, and to the protection of children as a duty of the Government, the following Committee is appointed:

Madames: M. P. Shuvalova, F. K. Skobinskaya, E. N. Mindling, L. Prochorova, N. D. Koraleva, and A. M. Kollontai.

This committee is charged with the immediate organization of the Department of Protection of Mothers and Children as part of the Ministry, and to take over from it all the property of the former All-Russian organization for the protection of motherhood, as well as all the funds, if such are to be found.

This Committee must immediately organize in the building of the Women's Institute of Emperor Nicholas 1st and of the Girl's Alexandrovsk School (Moika, 48 and 50)—"a Palace of Motherhood," as a Central Department of the All-Russian State organization for protection of motherhood and children of the Republic.

Peoples Commissar of Social Welfare: A Kollontai.

(Published in the organ of the Provincial Worker's and Peasants' Government, #45, December 31st, 1917.)

(NOTE.—All decrees of the Soviet of Worker's and Peasants' become effective and must be enforced upon their publication in the official organ of the Government.)

EXHIBIT 83.

DECREE ABOLISHING INHERITANCE.

I. Inheritance, whether by law or by will, is abolished. After the death of an owner, the property which belonged to him, whether movable or immovable, becomes the property of the Government of the Russian Socialistic Soviet Federative Republic.

NOTE.—The discontinuance and transfer of rights of utilization of farm lands is determined by the rules provided in the fundamental law of the socialization of the land.

II. Until the issuance of a decree dealing with general social arrangements, relatives who are in need (i. e., those who do not possess a minimum maintenance), and who are incapable of work—such relatives being in a directly ascending or descending line, full or half brothers or sisters, or spouse, of the deceased—receive support from the property left by the deceased.

NOTE 1.—No distinction is made between the relationship that arises within wedlock and that which arises outside of wedlock.

NOTE 2.—Adopted relatives or children and their descendants are put upon the same footing as relatives by descent whether as to those who adopted them or as to those who have been adopted.

III. If there is not enough of the property remaining to support a spouse and all surviving relatives, as enumerated above, then the most needy of them must be provided for first.

IV. The amount of allowance to be given a spouse and surviving relatives from the property of the deceased is determined by the institution conducting the affairs of social security in the Governments, and in Moscow and Petrograd by the municipal Soviets of Workmen's and Peasants' Deputies, in agreement with the persons who have the right to receive the allowance, and, in case of dispute between them, by the local court, according to the usual legal procedure. Cases of this sort are under the jurisdiction of the Soviets of Workmen's and Peasants' Deputies and the local courts of the last place of residence of the deceased.

V. All property of the deceased, other than that enumerated in Article IX of this decree, comes under the jurisdiction of the local Soviet, which turns it over to the bureaus or institutions having control in those localities of similar property of the Russian Republic, according to the last place of residence of the deceased or according to the place where this property is situated.

VI. The local Soviet publishes, for the purpose of general notification, the death of the property owner, and calls upon the persons who have a right to receive support from the said property to appear within a year from the date of the publication.

VII. Those who do not declare their claims before the expiration of the year following the publication, as provided in the above article, lose their right to receive support from the property of the deceased.

VIII. From the property of the deceased are paid, first, the expenses of the administration of the property. The relatives and spouse of the deceased receive their allowances before the creditors are paid. The creditors of the deceased, if their claims are recognized as proper to be paid, are satisfied from the property after the deductions indicated above, on condition, in case the property is insufficient to cover all demands of the creditors, that the general principles of the meeting of creditors be applied.

IX. If the property of the deceased does not exceed 10,000 rubles, or in particular consists of a farm house, domestic furniture, and means for economical production by work, in either the city or the village, it comes under the immediate control of the spouse and relatives enumerated in Article II of the present decree, who are present. The method of control and management of the property is arranged by agreement between the spouse and relatives, and, in case of their disagreement, by the local tribunal.

X. The present decree is retroactive as regards all inheritances discovered before it was issued, if they have not yet been acquired by the heirs, or, if acquired, if they have not yet been taken possession of by the heirs.

XI. All suits now pending respecting inheritances, suits respecting the probate of wills, respecting the confirmation of the rights of inheritances, etc., are deemed to be discontinued, and the respective hereditary property is to be at once turned over for administration to the local Soviets or institutions indicated in Article V of the present decree.

NOTE.—Concerning hereditary properties discovered before the present decree is issued—properties enumerated in Article IX of the present decree—a special regulation will be issued.

XII. The People's Commissioner of Justice is empowered, in agreement with the Commissariat of Social Security and Work, to issue a detailed instruction concerning the enforcement of the present decree.

The present decree is of force from the date of its signature, and is to be put into operation by telegraph.

April 27, 1918.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 84.

DECREE ON MARRIAGE, CHILDREN, AND REGISTRATION OF CIVIL STATUS

The Russian Republic henceforth recognizes civil marriage only.

Civil marriage is performed on the basis of the following rules:

1. Persons who wish to contract marriage declare [their intention] orally or by a written statement to the department of registration of marriages and births at the city hall (regional, district, township, Zemstvo institutions), according to the place of their residence.

NOTE: Church marriage is a private affair of those contracting it, while civil marriage is obligatory.

2. Declarations of intention to contract marriage are not accepted (a) from persons of the male sex younger than 18 years, and of the female sex, 16 years of age; in Transcaucasia the native inhabitants may enter into marriage upon attaining the age of 16 for the groom and 13 for the bride; (b) from relatives in the direct line, full and half-brothers and sisters; consanguinity is recognized also between a child born out of wedlock and his descendants on one side and relatives on the other; (c) from married persons, and (d) from insane.

3. Those wishing to contract marriage appear at the department of registration of marriages and sign a statement concerning the absence of the obstacles to contracting marriage enumerated in Article 2 of this decree, and also a statement that they contract marriage voluntarily.

Those guilty of deliberately making false statements about the absence of the obstacles enumerated in Article 2 are criminally prosecuted for false statements and the marriage is declared invalid.

4. Upon the signing of the above-mentioned statement, the director of the Department of registration of marriages records the act of marriage in the book of marriage registries and then declares the marriage to have become legally effective.

When contracting marriage the parties are allowed to decide freely whether they will henceforth be called by the surname of the husband or wife or by a combined surname.

As proof of the act of marriage, the contracting parties immediately receive a copy of the certificate of their marriage.

5. Complaints against the refusal to perform marriage or incorrect registration are lodged, without limitation of time, with the local judge in the locality where the department of registration of marriage is; the ruling of the local judge on such complaint may be appealed in the usual way.

6. In case the former books of registration of marriages have been destroyed, or lost in some other way, or if for some other cause married persons can not obtain a certificate of their marriage, those persons are given the right to submit a declaration to the respective department of registration of marriages, according to the place of residence of both parties or one of them, to the effect that they have been in the state of wedlock since such and such time. Such declaration is attested, in addition to the statement stipulated by Article 3. by a further statement of the parties that the book of registration has really been lost or that for some other sufficient cause they cannot obtain a copy of the certificate.

Registration of Births.—7. The registration of the birth of a child is made by the same department of registration of marriages and births in the place of residence of the mother, and a special entry of each birth is made in the book of registration of births. . . .

8. The birth of a child must be reported to the department either by his parents or one of them, or by the persons in whose care, because of the death of his parents, the child remained, with an indication of the name and surname adopted for the child and the presentation of two witnesses to attest the fact of birth.

9. The book of registration of marriages as well as the books of registration of births are kept in two copies, and one copy is sent at the end of the year to the proper court for preservation.

10. Children born out of wedlock are on an equality with those born in wedlock with regard to the rights and duties of parents toward children, and likewise of children toward parents.

The persons who make a declaration and give a signed statement to that effect are registered as the father and mother of the child.

Those guilty of deliberately making false statements regarding the above are criminally prosecuted for false testimony and the registration is declared invalid.

In case the father of a child born out of wedlock does not make such a declaration, the mother of the child or the guardian or the child itself has the right to prove fatherhood by legal means.

Registration of Deaths.—11. Record of the death of a person is made in the place where the death occurred by the department which has charge of the registration of marriages and births, by entry in a special book for-registration of deaths. . . .

12. The death of a person must be reported to the department by the legal or administrative authorities or persons in whose care the deceased was.

13. Institutions in charge of cemeteries are henceforth forbidden to place obstacles in the way of the burial on cemetery grounds in accordance with the ritual of civil funerals.

14. All religious and administrative institutions which hitherto have had charge of the registration of marriages, births and deaths according to the customs of any religious cult, are ordered to transfer immediately all their registration books to the respective municipal, district, rural and Zemstvo administrations.

December 18, 1917.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 85.

DECREE ON DIVORCE.

1. Marriage is annulled by the petition of both parties or even one of them.

2. The above petition is submitted, according to the rules of local jurisdiction, to the local court.

NOTE.—A declaration of annulment of marriage by mutual consent may be filed directly with the department of registration of marriages in which a record of that marriage is kept, which department makes an entry of the annulment of the marriage in the record and issues a certificate.

3. On the day appointed for the examination of the petition for the annulment of marriage, the local judge summons both parties or their solicitors.

4. If the residence of the party who is to be summoned is unknown, the petitioner is allowed to file the petition for annulment of marriage in the place of residence of the absent party last known to the petitioner, or in the place of residence of the petitioner, stating to the court, however, the last known place of residence of the defendant.

5. If the place of residence of the party who is to be summoned is unknown, then the day for the trial of the case is set not earlier than the expiration of two months from the day of the publication of a notice of summons in the local Government gazette, and the summons is sent to the address of the last known place of residence of the defendant given by the petitioner.

6. Having convinced himself that the petition for the annulment of the marriage really comes from both parties or from one of them, the judge personally and singly renders the decision of the annulment of the marriage and issues a certificate thereof to the parties. At the same time, the judge transmits a copy of his decision to the department of registration of marriages where the annulled marriage was performed and where the book containing a record of this marriage is kept.

7. When annulling a marriage by mutual consent, the parties are obliged to state in their petition what surnames the divorced parties and their children are to bear in the future. But when dissolving the marriage by the petition of one of the parties, and in the absence of an understanding about this matter between the parties, the divorced parties preserve their own surnames, and the surname of the children is determined by the judge, and in case of disagreement of the parties, by the local court.

8. In case the parties are agreed on the matter, the judge simultaneously with the decision of annulment of the marriage, determines with which of the parents the minor children begotten of the marriage shall live, and which of the parents must bear the expense of maintenance and education of the children, and to what extent and also whether and to what extent the husband is obliged to furnish food and maintenance to his divorced wife.

9. But if no understanding shall be reached, then the participation of the husband in furnishing his divorced wife with food and maintenance when she has no means of her own or has insufficient means and is unable to work, as well as the question with whom the children are to live, are decided by a regular civil suit in the local court, irrespective of the amount of the suit. The judge, having rendered the decision annulling the marriage, determines temporarily, until the settlement of the dispute, the fate of the children, and also rules on the question of the temporary maintenance of the children and the wife, if she is in need of it.

10. Suits for adjudging marriages illegal or invalid belong henceforth to the jurisdiction of the local court.

11. The operation of this law extends to all citizens of the Russian Republic irrespective of their adherence to this or that religious cult.

12. All suits for annulment of marriage which are now tried in ecclesiastical consistories of the department of Greek-Catholic and other denominations, in the governing synod and all other institutions of the Christian and non-Christian religions, and by officials in charge of ecclesiastical affairs of all denominations, and in which no decisions have been rendered or the decisions already rendered have not become legally effective, are declared by reason of this law null and void, and are subject to immediate transfer to the local district courts for safe-keeping, with all archives in the possession of the above-enumerated institutions and persons having jurisdiction in divorce suits. The parties are given the right to file a new petition for the annulment of the marriage according to this decree without awaiting the dismissal of the first suit, and a new summons for absent parties (paragraphs 4 and 5) is not obligatory if such a summons was published in the former order.

December 18, 1917

(Nation Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 86.

DECREE ON SEPARATION OF CHURCH FROM THE STATE.

1. The church is separated from the state.

2. Within the limits of the Republic, it is prohibited to pass any local laws or regulations which would restrict or limit the freedom of conscience or establish any kind of privileges or advantages on the ground of the religious affiliations of citizens.

3. Every citizen may profess any religion or none at all. Any legal disabilities connected with the profession of any religion or none are abolished.

NOTE.—From all official acts any indication of the religious affiliation or non-affiliation of citizens is to be omitted.

4. The proceedings of state and other public legal institutions are not to be accompanied by any religious customs or ceremonies.

5. The free observance of religious customs is guaranteed in so far as the same do not disturb the public order and are not accompanied by attempts upon the rights of the citizens of the Soviet Republic. The local authorities have the right to take all necessary measures for the preservation, in such cases, of public order and security.

6. No one may decline to perform his civil duties, giving as a reason his religious views. Exemptions from this law, conditioned upon the substitution of one civil duty for another, are permitted by decision of the people's court in each individual case.

7. Religious or judicial oaths are abolished. In necessary cases a solemn promise only is given.

8. Acts of a civil nature are performed exclusively by civil authorities, such as the departments of registration of marriages and births.

9. The school is separated from the church. The teaching of religious doctrines in all state and public, as well as in private, educational institutions in which general subjects are taught, is forbidden. Citizens may teach and study religion privately.

10. All church and religious societies are subject to the general regulations governing private associations and unions, and do not enjoy any privileges or subsidies either from the state or from its local autonomous and self-governing institutions.

11. Compulsory collection of payments and assessments for the benefit of church or religious societies, or as a means of compulsion or punishment of their co-members on the part of these societies, is not allowed.

12. No church or religious society has the right to own property. They have no rights of a juridical person.

13. All the properties of the existing church and religious societies in Russia are declared national property. Buildings and articles specially designated for religious services are, by special decisions of the local or central state authorities, given for free use by corresponding religious societies.

(Nation, Dec. 28, 1918.)

EXHIBIT 87.

DECREE ON THE NATIONALIZATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

PART I.

1. To release all clergymen of all denominations who are in the service of the War Department.

2. All branches of the military clergy to be reshaped.

3. Military committees have the right if the military units, administrations, establishments and institutions so desire, to retain the clergymen.

4. $In the latter case the maintenance of retained clergymen is to be fixed not by former States but exclusively by the stipulations of the committees of the units themselves.

5. Without exception all property and all church funds of churches of military units to be handed over to the committees of the various units and in the case of reshaping of the latter—to the committees of the higher grades.

6. For the purposes of receiving and delivery of funds and property now at the disposal of the clerical department special commissions will be appointed.

People's Commissariat on Affairs of War, M. Kedrov, E. Skylyansky, V. Podvoysky, K. Mekhonoshin.

January 16, 1918.

EXHIBIT 88.

DECREE ON THE LEVYING OF DIRECT TAXES.

The council of People's Commissaires decreed:

(1) The last date for the payment of the State Income Tax at the rate established by the resolution of the Provisional Government of June 12th, 1917, is December 15th, 1917. All persons who have not received the tax-sheets, shall pay in to the respective treasuries, and cash offices, not later than December 15th, 1917, the entire amount of the tax due on the income indicated by them in their notifications.

NOTE 1.—For the supervision over the precise execution of the law the Soviets are bound to send immediately their Commissaries to the courts of exchequer until the local levying institutions will be reorganised.

NOTE 2.—To enforce the execution of the orders of the Soviets and other authorities in the matter of the payment of the taxes mentioned in  1, 3 and 4 of the present decree the Soviets shall be entitled to employ the Red Guard and the militia, who are enjoined to execute all the instructions of the Soviets concerning the levying of the taxes.

(2) Any person who will not have paid the income tax by the 20th of December, 1917, will be liable, besides the penalties prescribed by the laws, to the payment of a fine which may amount to the confiscation of the whole of his property. Persons intentionally withholding the payment of the tax shall be liable to imprisonment for a term up to five years.

(3) The tax to be paid once, established by the law of June 12th, 1917, shall be paid according to said law, by the 15th of December, 1917, the 1st of February and the 1st of April, 1918, in different parts. All prorogations established after June 12th, 1917, are now revoked.

(4) The temporary tax on the accrued profits in the industrial-commercial enterprises and for the remuneration of personal industrial work, established by the law of May 15th, 1916, with the modifications introduced by the law of June 12th, 1917, shall be paid in at present by the 15th of December, 1917. All the prorogations and modifications introduced since June 12th, 1917, are revoked.

(5) In levying the tax to be paid once, and the tax on the accrued profits, the rules for the payment of taxes prescribed in clause 2, shall be applied.

(6) The supervision over the payment of the above mentioned taxes is entrusted over and above the usual organs to the local Soviets of Workmen Soldiers and Peasant Delegates, which are also entitled to establish the dimensions of the fines to be levied for any infringement of the law.

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaries, VI. Oulianoff (Lenin).

Manager of the Affairs: VI. Bonch-Bruевич.

People's Commissaries: A. Shliapnikoff, Djughashvili-Stalin.

Secretary of the Council of People's Commissaries: Gorbounoff.

November 24th, 1917.

EXHIBIT 89.

DECREE ON THE ARREST OF THE LEADERS OF THE CIVIL WAR AGAINST THE REVOLUTION.

The members of the leading organisations of the Kadet party as being a party of the enemies of the people, are to be arrested and brought before the revolutionary tribunal.

The local Soviets are entrusted with the duty of exercising a special supervision over the Kadet party in view of its connection with the Korniloff-Kaledin civil war against the revolution.

This decree shall enter in force from the moment that it is signed.

Chairman of the Council of People's Commissaires, VI. Oulianoff (Lenin).

People's Commissaires: L. Trotzky, H. Aviloff, N. Stouchka, V. Menjinsky, Djughashvili-Stalin, G. Petrovsky, A. Schlichter, Dybenko.

Petrograd, November 28th, 1917.

EXHIBIT 90.

DECREE ON THE ORGANIZATION OF A WORKERS' MILITIA.

1. All the Soviets of Workmen's and Soldiers' Deputies shall form a workers' militia.

2. The workers' militia shall be fully and exclusively under the orders of the Soviet of Workmen and Soldiers Delegates.

3. The military and civil authorities are bound to render assistance in arming the workers' militia and to supply it with the technical means even up to providing it with the arms belonging to the war department of the government.

4. This law is to be promulgated by telegraph.

People's Commissary for the Interior: A. I. Rykoff.

Petrograd, October 28th 1917.

EXHIBIT 91.

DECREE ON THE NATIONALIZATION OF THE PROPERTY AND CAPITAL OF THE RED CROSS.

1. All property of the Red Cross is declared to be property of the Russian Republic.
2. The governing body of the Red Cross shall cease to exist.
3. The reorganization of the Red Cross is entrusted to a committee.

EXHIBIT 92.

DECREE ON THE TRANSFER OF HOSPITALS.

Decree on the transfer without charge of all medical establishments of the enterprises to the hospital fund organization, or if there are no such establishments, then of the payment of the requisite amounts for the installation of same.

For the future until the Insurance Council will draw up a law regarding the order and form of transfer of the medical establishments into the management of the hospital fund organizations the Council of People's Commissaries decreed on November 14, 1917:

1. In handing over the medical relief to the management of the hospital fund organizations the owners of the enterprises shall be bound to transfer free of cost to the hospital fund all the medical institutions of the enterprise if the hospital fund organization will consider them satisfactory and corresponding to their destination.

2. If the existing institutions of any enterprise do not satisfy the normal standard of medical relief then in case the hospital fund organization will consent to them being transferred into its hands the owners of the enterprise shall be bound to pay additional sums in order that the said medical institution be brought into a condition corresponding to the established standards.

3. In case the enterprise has no medical institutions, or if the existing ones do not correspond to their destination, the owners of the enterprise shall be bound to give to the hospital fund organization a sum for the installation of medical institutions (hospitals, day hospitals, lying-in hospitals, nursing homes and first-aid stations) according to their actual cost and at the following rate: one hospital bed for every 100 workmen or women, and 1 bed for every 200 women, for confinements.

4. The owners of enterprises are forbidden to close, or to transfer to other persons, or to reduce the dimensions of the medical institutions, hospitals, day-hospitals, lying-in hospitals, etc., attached to their enterprises, by the time of the promulgation of this decree.

Signed: Chairman V. Oulianoff (Lenin).

People's Comm. for Labor: A. Shliapnikoff.

EXHIBIT 93.

INSTRUCTIONS CONCERNING THE ERECTION OF A MONUMENT IN HONOUR OF KARL MARX.

The Soviet of People's Commissaries instructs as follows:

1. To appropriate one million rubles for the erection of a monument on the grave of Karl Marx.
2. The People's Commissary of Education is empowered to announce a competitive examination for a project of the monument.
3. The representative of the Russian Republic in London is authorized to negotiate with the heirs of Karl Marx regarding the execution of said instruction.

Chairman of the Soviet of People's Commissaries, V. Oulianov (Lenin).

Chief Clerk of the Soviet of People's Commissaries, V. Bonch-Bruевич.

Secretary of the Soviet, N. Gorbunov.

June 1st, 1918.

